"Alas! good Master Ascham," rejoined Jane, "I once thought that my life and its close would be profitable to our church—that my conduct might haply be a model to its disciples—and my name enrolled among its martyrs. Let him who standeth take heed lest he fall. I had too much confidence in myself. I yielded to impulses, which, though not culpable in the eyes of men, were so in those of God."

"Oh madam! you reproach yourself far too severely," cried Ascham. "Unhappy circumstances have made you amenable to the laws of your country, it is true, and you give up your life as a willing sacrifice to justice. But this is all that can, or will be required of you, by your earthly or your Supreme Judge. That your character might have been more absolutely faultless in the highest sense I will not deny, had you sacrificed every earthly feeling to duty. But I for one should not have admired—should not have loved you as I now love you, had you acted otherwise. What you consider a fault has proved you a true woman in heart and affection; and your constancy as a believer in the Gospel, and upholder of its doctrines, has been equally strongly manifested. Your name in after ages will be a beacon and a guiding-star to the whole Protestant church."

"Heaven grant it!" exclaimed Jane, fervently. "I once hoped—once thought so."

"Hope so—think so still," rejoined Ascham. "Ah, dear madam, when I last took my leave of you before my departure for Germany, and found you in your chamber at Bradgate, buried in the Phædo of the divine philosopher, while your noble father and his friends were hunting, and disporting themselves in the park—when, to my wondering question, as to why you did not join in their pastime, you answered, 'that all their sport in the park was but a shadow to the pleasure you found in Plato,'—adding, 'alas! good folk, they never felt what true pleasure meant;—at that time I little thought for what a sad though proud destiny you were preserved.'"

"Neither did I, good master Ascham," replied Jane; "but you now find me at a better study. I have exchanged him who you term, and truly, in a certain sense, the 'divine' philosopher, for writings derived from the highest source of inspiration—direct from heaven—and I find in this study more pleasure and far more profit than the other. And now farewell, good friend. Do me one last favor. Be present at my ending. And see how she, whom you have taught to live, will die. Heaven bless you!"

"Heaven bless you too, noble and dear lady," replied Ascham, kneeling and pressing her hand to his lips. "I will obey your wishes."

He then arose, and covering his face to hide his fast-falling tears, withdrew.

Jane, also, was much moved, for she was greatly attached to her old instructor; and to subdue her emotion, took a few turns within her chamber. In doing this, she noticed the various inscriptions and devices carved by former occupants; and taking a pin, traced with its point the following lines, on the wall of the recess where she performed her devotions:

*Non aliena putes homini que obtingere possunt;
Sors hodierna mihi, cras erit illa tibi.*

Underneath, she added the following, and subscribed them with her name:

*Deo juvante, nil nocet hinc malus;
Et non juvante, nil juvat labor gravis;
Post tenebras, spero lucem!*

The lines have been effaced. But tradition has preserved them. How deeply affecting is the wish of the patient sufferer—"Post tenebras, spero lucem!"

Scarcely had Jane resumed her devotions, when she was a second time interrupted by the jailor, who, ushering a young female into the room, departed. Jane arose, and fixed her eyes upon the new-comer, but did not appear to recognise her; while the latter, unable to restrain her tears, tottered towards her, and threw herself at her feet.

"Do you not know me, dearest madam?" she cried, in a voice suffocated by emotion.

"Can it be Cicely?" inquired Jane, eagerly. "The tones are hers."

"It is—it is," sobbed the other.

Jane instantly raised her, and pressed her affectionately to her bosom.

"Poor child!" she exclaimed, gazing at her pale and emaciated features, now bedewed with tears, "you are as much altered as I am—nay, more. You must have suffered greatly to rob you of your youth and beauty thus. But I should have known you at once, despite the change, had I not thought you dead. By what extraordinary chance do I behold you here?"

As soon as she could command herself, Angela related all that had befallen her since their last sad parting. She told how she had been betrayed into the hands of Nightgall by one of his associates, who came to Sion House with a forged order for her arrest—carried her off, and delivered her to the jailor. How she was conveyed by the subterranean passage from Tower Hill to the secret dungeons beneath the fortress—how she was removed from one cell to another by her inexorable captor, and what she endured from his importunities, threats, and cruel treatment—and how at last, when she had abandoned all hope of succor, Providence had unexpectedly and mysteriously interposed to release her, and punish her persecutor. She likewise recounted the extraordinary discovery of her birth—Nightgall's confession—Cholmondeley's interview with Feckenham—and concluded her narration thus: "The confessor having informed me that her majesty desired I should be brought before her, I yesterday obeyed the mandate. She received me most graciously—ordered me to relate my story—listened to it with profound attention—and expressed great sympathy with my misfortunes. 'Your sufferings are at an end, I trust,' she said, when I had finished, 'and brighter and happier days are in store for you. The title and estates of which you have been so long and so unjustly deprived, shall be restored to you. Were it for your happiness, I would place you near my person; but a life of retirement, if I guess your disposition rightly, will suit you best.' In this I entirely agreed, and thanking her majesty for her kindness, she replied: "You owe me no thanks, Angela. The daughter of Sir Alberic Mountjoy—my mother's trusty friend—has the strongest claims upon my gratitude. Your lover has already received a pardon, and when these unhappy affairs are ended, he shall be at liberty to quit the Tower. May you be happy with him!"

"I echo that wish with all my heart, dear Angela," cried Jane. "May heaven bless your union!—and it will bless it, I am assured, for you deserve happiness. Nor am I less rejoiced at your deliverance than at Cholmondeley's. I looked upon myself as in some degree the cause of his destruction, and unceasingly reproached myself with having allowed him to accompany me to the Tower. But now I find—as I have ever found in my severest afflictions—that all was for the best."

"Alas! madam," returned Angela, "when I see you here, I can with difficulty respond to the sentiment."

"Do not question the purposes of the Unquestionable, Angela," replied Jane, severely. "I am chastened because I deserve it, and for my own good. The wind is tempered to the shorn lamb, and fortitude is given me to bear my afflictions. Nay, they are not afflictions. I would not exchange my lot—sad as it seems to you—for that of the happiest and the freest within the realm. When the bondage of earth is once broken—when the flesh has no more power over the spirit—when the gates of heaven are open for admittance—can the world, or worldly joys, possess further charms? No. These prison walls are no restraint to me. My soul soars upward, and holds communion with God and his elect, among whom I hope to be numbered. The scaffold will have no terror for me. I shall mount it as the first step toward heaven; and shall hail the stroke of the axe as the signal to my spirit to wing its flight to the throne of everlasting joy."

"I am rebuked, madam," returned Angela, with a look of admiration. "Oh! that I might ever hope to obtain such a frame of mind."

"You may do so, dear Angela," replied Jane—"but your lot is cast differently from mine. What is required from me is not required from you. Such strong devotional feelings have been implanted in my breast, for a wise purpose, that they usurp the place of all others, and fit me for my high calling. The earnest and hearty believer in the Gospel will gladly embrace death, even if accompanied by the severest tortures, at seasons perilous to his church, in the conviction that it will be profitable to it. Such have been the deaths of the martyrs of our religion—such shall be my death."

"Amen!" exclaimed Angela, fervently.

"Must we part now?" inquired Jane.

"Not unless you desire it," replied Angela. "I have obtained the Queen's permission to remain with you to the last."

"I thank her for the boon," returned Jane. "It will be a great consolation to me to have you near me. Angela, you must not shrink from the last duty of a friend—you must accompany me to the scaffold. I may need you there."

"I will shrink from nothing you enjoin, madam," replied Angela, shuddering. "But I had rather—far rather suffer in your stead."

Jane made no reply, but pressed her hand affectionately.

"I have omitted to tell you, madam," continued Angela, "that the Queen, before I was dismissed from the presence, urged me to embrace the faith of Rome—that of my father, who perished for his adherence to it—and to use my endeavors to induce you to become reconciled with that church."

"And what answer did you make?" demanded Jane sternly.

"Such as you yourself would have made, madam," replied Angela—"I refused both."

"It is well," rejoined Jane. "And now I must return to my devotions. You will have a weary office in attending me, Angela. Nor shall I be able to address more than a few words to you—and those but seldom."

"Think not of me, madam," replied the other; "all I desire is to be near you, and to join my prayers with yours."

Both then knelt down, and both prayed long and fervently. It would have been a touching sight to see those young and beautiful creatures with eyes upturned to heaven—hands clasped—and lips murmuring prayer. But the zeal that animated Jane far surpassed that of her companion. Long before the former sought her couch, fatigue overcame the latter, and she was compelled to retire to rest; and when she arose (though it was not yet daybreak), she found the unwearied devotee had already been up for hours. And so some days were spent—Jane ever praying—Angela praying too, but more frequently engaged in watching her companion.

On the morning of Thursday, the 8th of February, the jailer appeared, with a countenance of unusual gloom, and informed his captive that the lieutenant of the Tower and Father Feckenham were without, and desired to see her.

"Admit them," replied Jane. "I know their errand. You are right welcome, sirs," she added, with a cheerful look, as they entered. "You bring me good news."

"Alas! madam," replied Feckenham, sorrowfully, "we are the bearers of ill tidings. It is our melancholy office to acquaint you that your execution is appointed for to-morrow."

"Why that is good news," returned Jane, with an unaltered countenance. "I have long and anxiously expected my release, and am glad to find it so near at hand."

"I am further charged, by the Queen's highness, who desires not to kill the soul as well as the body," pursued Feckenham, "to entreat you to use the few hours remaining to you in making your peace with heaven."

"I will strive to do so, sir," replied Jane, meekly.

"Do not mistake me, madam," rejoined Feckenham, earnestly. "Her majesty's hope is that you will reconcile yourself with the holy Catholic church, by which means you can alone ensure your salvation. For this end, she has desired me to continue near you to the last, and to use my best efforts for your conversion—and by God's grace I will do so."

"You may spare yourself the labor, sir," replied Jane. "You will more easily overturn these solid walls by your arguments than my resolution."

"At least, suffer me to make the attempt," replied Feckenham. "That I have hitherto failed in convincing you is true, and I may fail now, but my very zeal must satisfy you that I have your welfare at heart, and am eager to deliver you from the bondage of Satan."

"I have never doubted your zeal, sir," returned Jane; "nor—and I say it in all humility—do I doubt my own power to refute your arguments. But I must decline the contest now, because my time is short, and I would devote every moment to the service of God."

"That excuse shall not avail you, madam," rejoined Feckenham, significantly. "The Queen and the chancellors are as anxious as I am for your conversion, and nothing shall be left undone to accomplish it."

"I must submit, then," replied Jane, with a look of resignation. "But I repeat, you will lose your labor."

"Time will show," returned Feckenham.

"I have not yet dared to ask a question which has risen to my lips, but found no utterance," said Jane, in an altered tone. "My husband!—what of him?"

"His execution will take place at the same time with your own," replied Feckenham.

"I shall see him to-morrow, then?" cried Jane.

"Perhaps before," returned Feckenham.

"It were better not," said Jane, trembling. "I know not whether I can support the interview."

"I was right," muttered Feckenham to himself. "The way to move her is through the affections." And he made a sign to the lieutenant, who quitted the chamber.

"Prepare yourself, madam," he added, to Jane.

"For what?" she cried.

"For your husband's approach. He is here."

As he spoke, the door was opened, and Dudley rushed forward, and caught her in his arms. Not a word was uttered for some moments by the afflicted pair. Angela withdrew weeping as if her heart would break, into one of the recesses, and Feckenham and the lieutenant into another. After the lapse of a short time, thinking it a favorable opportunity for his purpose, the confessor came forward. Jane and her husband were still locked in each others embrace, and it seemed as if nothing but force could tear them asunder.

"I would not disturb you," said Feckenham, "but my orders are that this interview must be brief. I am empowered also to state, madam," he added to Jane, "that her majesty will even now pardon your husband, notwithstanding his heinous offences against her, provided you are publicly reconciled to the church of Rome."

"I cannot do it, Dudley," cried Jane, in a voice of agony—"I cannot—cannot."

"Neither do I desire it," he replied. "I would not purchase life on such terms. We will die together."

"Be it so," observed Feckenham, with a disconcerted look. "The offer will never be repeated."

"It would never have been made at all, if there had been a chance of its acceptance," returned Dudley, coldly. "Tell your royal mistress that I love my wife too well to require such a sacrifice at her hands, and that she loves me too well to make it."

"Dudley," exclaimed Jane, gazing at him with tearful eyes, "I can now die without a pang."

"Have you aught more to say to each other?" demanded Feckenham. "You will meet no more on earth!"

"Yes, on the scaffold," cried Jane.

"Not so," replied Feckenham, gloomily. "Lord Guildford Dudley will suffer on Tower Hill—you, madam, will meet your sentence on the green before the White Tower, where Anne Boleyn and Catherine Howard perished."

"We shall meet in the grave, then," rejoined Dudley, bitterly, "where Mary's tyranny can neither reach us, nor the voice of juggling priests disturb us more."

"Your prisoner," cried Feckenham, turning angrily to the lieutenant.

"Farewell, dear Dudley," exclaimed Jane, straining him to her bosom—"Be constant."

"As yourself," he replied, gently disengaging himself from her. "I am ready, sir," he added, to Brydges. And without hazarding another look at Jane, who fell back in the arms of Angela, he quitted the chamber.

Half an hour after this, when Jane had in some degree recovered from the shock, Feckenham returned, and informed her that he had obtained from the Queen a reprieve for herself and her husband for three days. "You can now no longer allege the shortness of the time allowed you, as a reason for declining a conference with me," he said; "and I pray you address yourself earnestly to the subject, for I will not desist till I have convinced and converted you."

"Then I shall have little of the time allotted me to myself," replied Jane. "But I will not repine. My troubles may benefit others—if not myself."

XIX.—How the Princess Elizabeth and Courtenay were delivered out of the Tower to further distance; and how Queen Mary was wedded, by proxy, to Philip of Spain.

Elizabeth still continued a close prisoner in the Bell Tower. But she indulged the most sanguine expectations of a speedy release. Her affections had received a severe blow in Courtenay's relinquishment of his pretensions to her hand, and it required all her pride and mastery over herself to bear up against it. She did, however, succeed in conquering her feelings, and, with her usual impetuosity, began now to hate him in the proportion of her former love. While his mistress was thus brooding over the past, and trying to regulate her conduct for the future within the narrow walls of her prison, Courtenay, who had been removed to the Flint Tower, where he was confined in the basement chamber, was likewise occupied in revolving his brief and troubled career. A captive from his youth, he had enjoyed a few months' liberty, during which, visions of glory, power, greatness, and love—such as have seldom visited the most exalted—opened upon him. The bright dream was now ended, and he was once more a captive. Slight as his experience had been, he was sickened of the intrigues and hollowness of court life, and sighed for freedom and retirement. Elizabeth still retained absolute possession of his heart, but he feared to espouse her, because he was firmly persuaded that her haughty and ambitious character would involve him in perpetual troubles. Cost what it might, he determined to resign her hand as his sole hope of future tranquility. In this resolution he was confirmed by Gardiner, who visited him in secret, and counselled him as to the best course to pursue.

"If you claim my promise," observed the crafty chancellor, "I will fulfil it, and procure you the hand of the princess, but I warn you you will not hold it long. Another rebellion will follow, in which you and Elizabeth will infallibly be mixed up, and then nothing will save you from the block."

Courtenay acquiesced, and Gardiner having gained his point, left him with the warmest assurances that he would watch over his safety. Insincere as he was, the chancellor was well-disposed towards Courtenay, but he had a difficult game to play. He was met on all hands by Renard, who was bent on the Earl's destruction and that of the princess; and every move he made with the Queen was checked by his wary and subtle antagonist. Notwithstanding her belief in their treasonable practices, Mary was inclined to pardon the offenders, but Renard entreated her to suspend her judgment upon them, till the emperor's opinion could be ascertained. This, he well knew, if agreed to, would insure their ruin, as he had written secretly in such terms to Charles the Fifth as he was satisfied would accomplish his object. Extraordinary despatch was used by the messengers; and, to Renard's infinite delight, while he and Gardiner were struggling for ascendancy over the Queen, a courier arrived from Madrid. Renard's joy was converted into positive triumph as he opened his own letters received by the same hand, and found that the emperor acquiesced in the expediency of the severest measures towards Elizabeth and her suitor, and recommended their immediate execution. The same despatches informed him that Charles, apprehensive of some further difficulty in respect to his son's projected union with Mary, had written to the Count D'Egmont at Brussels, with letters of ratification and procuration, commissioning him to repair to the court of London without delay, and conclude the engagement by espousing the Queen by proxy.

Not many hours later, the Count himself, who had set out instantly for Brussels, on receiving his commission, arrived. He was received on the Queen's part by the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl of Shrewsbury, comptroller of the household, and the Marquis of Winchester, high treasurer, and conducted to the state apartments within the palace of the Tower, where the court was then staying. Mary appointed an audience with him on the following day, and in the interim, to Renard's disappointment, remained cloistered with Gardiner, and would see no one beside. The ambassador, however, consoled himself with the certainty of success, and passed the evening in consultation with D'Egmont, to whom he detailed all that had passed since the flight of the latter.

"The heretical faction in England," he observed, "is entirely crushed—or will be so, when Jane and Elizabeth are executed. And if his highness, Prince Philip, will follow up my measures, he may not only restore the old faith throughout the realm, but establish the inquisition in the heart of London within six months."

The next day, at the appointed hour, the Count D'Egmont, attended by Renard and the whole of his suite, was conducted with much ceremony to the council-chamber in the White Tower. He found Mary surrounded by the whole of her ministers, and prostrating himself before the throne, acquainted her with his mission, and, presenting her with the letters of procuration he had received from the prince, entreated her to ratify on her side the articles already agreed upon. To this request, for which she was already prepared by the emperor's despatches, Mary vouchsafed a gracious answer, saying: "I am as impatient for the completion of the contract as the prince your master can be, and shall not hesitate a moment to comply with his wishes. 'But I would,'" she added, smiling, "that he had come to claim its fulfilment himself."

"His highness only awaits your majesty's summons, and an assurance that he can land upon your shores without occasioning further tumult," rejoined D'Egmont.

"He shall speedily receive that assurance," returned Mary. "Heaven be praised! our troubles are ended, and the spirit of disaffection and sedition checked, if not altogether extinguished. But I pray you hold me excused for a short time," she continued, motioning him to rise; "I have some needful business to conclude before I proceed with this solemnity."

Waving her hand to Sir Thomas Brydges, who stood among the group of nobles near the throne, he immediately quitted the presence, returning in a few moments with a guard of halberdiers in the midst of which were Elizabeth and Courtenay. At the approach of the prisoners, the assemblage divided into two lines to allow them passage; and preceded by the lieutenant, they advanced to within a short distance of the Queen.

Mary, meantime, had seated herself; and her countenance, hitherto radiant with smiles, assumed a severe expression. A mournful silence pervaded the courtly throng, and all seemed as ominous and lowering as if a thunder-cloud had settled over them. This was not however the case with Renard. A sinister smile lighted up his features, and he observed in an under-tone to D'Egmont, "My hour of triumph is at hand."

"Wait awhile," replied the other.

Elizabeth looked in no wise abashed or dismayed by the position in which she found herself. Throwing angry and imperious glances around, and bending her brows on those who scanned her too curiously, she turned her back upon Courtenay, and seemed utterly unconscious of his presence.

At the Queen's command, Gardiner stepped forward, and taking a roll of paper from an attendant, proceeded to read the charges against the prisoners, together with the depositions of those who had been examined, as to their share in the insurrection. When he had concluded, Elizabeth observed in a haughty tone—"There is nothing in all that to touch me, my lord. What has recanted his confession, and avowed he was suborned by Renard. And as to the rest of my accusers, they are unworthy of credit. The Queen's highness must acquit me."

"What say you, my lord?" demanded Gardiner of Courtenay.

"Nothing," replied the earl.

"Do you confess yourself guilty of the high crimes and misdemeanors laid to your charge, then?" pursued the chancellor.

"No," answered Courtenay, firmly. "But I will not seek to defend myself further. I throw myself on the Queen's mercy."

"You do wisely, my lord," returned Gardiner; "and your grace," he added to Elizabeth, "would do well to abate your pride, and imitate his example."

"In my father's time, my lord," observed the princess, scornfully, "you would not, for your head, have dared to hold such language toward me."

"I dared to plead your mother's cause with him," retorted Gardiner, with much asperity. "Your majesty will now pronounce such sentence upon the accused, as may seem meet to you," he added, turning to the Queen.

"We hold their guilt not clearly proven," replied Mary. "Nevertheless, too many suspicious circumstances appear against them to allow us to set them at large till all chance of further trouble is ended. Not desiring to deal harshly with them, we shall not confine them longer within the Tower. Which of you, my lords, will take charge of the princess Elizabeth? It will be no slight responsibility. You will answer for her security with your heads. Which of you will take charge of her, I say?"

As she spoke, she glanced inquiringly round the assemblage, but no answer was returned.

"Had not your highness better send her grace under a sure guard to the emperor's court at Brussels?" observed Renard, who could scarcely conceal his mortification at the Queen's decision.

"I will think of it," returned Mary.

"Sooner than this shall be," interposed Sir Henry Bedingfeld, "since none worthier of the office can be found, I will undertake it."

"You are my good genius, Bedingfeld," replied Mary. "To you, then, I confide her, and I will associate with you in the office, Sir John Williams, of Thame. The place of her confinement shall be my palace at Woodstock, and she will remain there till you receive further orders. You will set out with a sufficient guard for Oxfordshire."

"I am ever ready to obey your highness," replied Bedingfeld.

"Accursed meddler!" exclaimed Renard to D'Egmont, "he has marred my project."

"The Earl of Devonshire will be confined in Fotheringay Castle, in Northamptonshire," pursued Mary. "To you, Sir Thomas Tresham," she continued, addressing one of those near her, "I commit him."

"I am honored in the charge," returned Tresham, bowing.

"Your majesty will repent this ill-judged clemency," cried Renard, unable to repress his choler; "and since my counsels are unheeded, I must pray your highness to allow me to resign the post I hold near your person."

"Be it so," replied Mary, in a freezing tone; "we accept your resignation—and shall pray his imperial majesty to recall you."

"Is this my reward?" exclaimed Renard, as he retired, covered with shame and confusion. "Cursed is he that puts faith in princes!"

The prisoners were then removed, and as they walked side by side, Courtenay sought to address the princess, but she turned away her head sharply, according him neither look nor word in reply. Finding himself thus repulsed, the Earl desisted, and they proceeded in silence as long as their way lay together.

And thus, without one farewell, they parted—to meet no more. Liberated at the instance of Philip of Spain, Courtenay journeyed to Italy, where he died two years afterwards, at Padua, obtaining, as Holinshed touchingly remarks, "that quiet, which in his life he could never have." Of the glorious destiny reserved for Elizabeth, nothing need be said.

The prisoners removed, the Queen presented her hand to the Earl of Pembroke, and repaired with her whole retinue to Saint John's Chapel.

Arrived there, Mary stationed herself at the altar, around which were grouped Bonner, Tunstall, Feckenham, and a host of other priests and choristers, in their full robes. In a short time, the nave and aisles of the sacred structure were densely crowded by the lords of the council, together with other nobles and their attendants, the dames of honor, the guard, and the suite of the Count D'Egmont. Nor were the galleries above unoccupied, every available situation finding a tenant.

D'Egmont, as the representative of Philip of Spain, took up a position on the right of the Queen, and sustained his part with great dignity. As soon as Gardiner was prepared, the ceremony commenced. D'Egmont tendered his hand to Mary, who took it, and they both knelt down upon the cushion before the altar, while the customary oaths were administered, and a solemn benediction pronounced over them. This done, they arose, and Gardiner observed to the Queen, in a voice audible throughout the structure—"Your majesty is now wedded to the Prince of Spain. May God preserve you both, and bless your union!"

"God preserve Queen Mary!" cried the Earl of Pembroke, stepping forward.

And the shout was enthusiastically echoed by all within the chapel. But not a voice was raised, nor a blessing invoked for her husband.

Te Deum was then sung by the choristers, and mass performed by Bonner and the priests.

"His imperial majesty entreats your acceptance of this slight offering," said D'Egmont, when the sacred rites were concluded, presenting the Queen with a diamond ring, of inestimable value.

"I accept the gift," replied Mary, "and I beg you to offer my best thanks to the emperor. For yourself, I hope you will wear this ornament in remembrance of me, and of the occasion." And detaching a collar of gold set with precious stones from her own neck, she placed it over that of D'Egmont.

"I now go to bring your husband, gracious madam," said the count.

"Heaven grant you a safe and speedy journey!" replied Mary.

"And to your highness a prosperous union!" rejoined the count; "and may your race long occupy the throne." So saying, he bowed and parted.

D'Egmont's wish did not produce a cheering effect on Mary. Jane's words rushed to her mind, and she feared that her union would not be happy—would not be blessed with offspring. And it need scarcely be added, her forebodings were realized. Coldly treated by a haughty and neglectful husband, she went childless to the tomb.

XXXIX....Of the wedding of Sir Narcissus Le Grand with Jane the fool, and what happened at it: and of the entertainment given by him, on the occasion, to his old friends at the Stone Kitchen.

Sir Narcissus Le Grand made rapid strides in the royal favor, as well as in that of his mistress. He was now in constant attendance on the Queen, and his coxcombry afforded her so much amusement, that she gave him a post near her person, in order to enjoy it. Jane the Fool, too, who had a secret liking for him, though she affected displeasure at Mary's command, became so violently enamored, and so excessively jealous, if the slightest attentions were paid him by the dames of honor, that the Queen thought it desirable to fix an early day for the wedding.

The happy event took place on Saturday, the 10th of February, at Saint Peter's chapel on the green, and was honored by the presence of the Queen, and all her attendants. Never were merrier nuptials witnessed! And even the grave countenance of Feckenham, the officiating priest on the occasion, wore a smile, as the bridegroom, attired in his gayest habiliments, bedecked at all points with lace, tags, and fringe; curled, scented, and glistening with silver and gold, was borne into the chapel on the shoulders of Og—who had carried him from the By-ward Tower, through a vast concourse of spectators—and deposited at the altar near the bride. Behind Og came his two brethren, together with Dames Placida and Potentia; while Peter Trusbut, Ribald, and Winwike, brought up the rear.

Arrived at the height of his ambition, graced with a title, favored by the Queen, and idolized by his bride, who was not altogether destitute of personal attractions, and was, at least twice his own size, the poor dwarf's brain was almost turned, and he had some difficulty in maintaining the decorous and dignified deportment which he felt it necessary to maintain on the occasion. The ceremony was soon performed—too soon for Sir Narcissus, who would willingly have prolonged it. The royal train departed—not, however, before Mary had bestowed a well-filled purse of gold upon the bridegroom, and commanded him to bring his friends to the palace, where a supper would be provided for them. Sir Narcissus then offered his hand to his bride, and led her forth, followed by his companions.

A vast crowd had collected before the doors of the sacred edifice. But a passage having been kept clear by a band of halberdiers for the Queen, the lines were unbroken when the wedding-party appeared. Loud acclamations welcomed Sir Narcissus, who paused for a moment beneath the porch, and taking off his well-plumed cap, bowed repeatedly to the assemblage. Reiterated shouts and plaudits succeeded, and the clamor was so great from those who could not obtain a glimpse of him, that the little knight entreated Og to take him once more upon his shoulder. The request was immediately complied with; and when he was seen in this exalted situation, a deafening shout rent the skies. The applause, however, were shared by his consort, who, placed on the shoulder of Gog, became equally conspicuous.

In this way, they were carried side by side along the green, and Sir Narcissus was so enchanted that he desired the bearers to proceed as slowly as possible. His enthusiasm became at length so great, that when several of those around him jeeringly cried, "Largesse, largesse!" Sir Narcissus, he opened the purse lately given him by the Queen, and which hung at his girdle, and threw away the broad pieces in showers. "I will win more gold," he observed to Og, who remonstrated with his profusion; "but such a day as this does not occur twice in one's life."

"Happiness and long life attend you and your lovely dame, Sir Narcissus!" cried a bystander.

"There is not a knight in the Tower to be compared with you, worshipful sir!" roared another.

"You deserve the Queen's favor!" vociferated a third.

"Greater dignities are in store for you!" added a fourth.

Never was new-made and new-married knight so enchanted. Acknowledging all the compliments and fine speeches with smiles, amiles, and bows, he threw away fresh showers of gold. After making the complete circuit of the fortress, he crossed the drawbridge, and proceeded to the wharf, where he was hailed by different boats on the river: every where, his reception was the same. On the return of the party, Hairun invited them all to the Lions' Tower, and ushering them to the gallery, brought out several of the wild animals, and went through his performances as if the Queen herself had been present. In imitation of the sovereign, Sir Narcissus bestowed his last few coins, together with the purse containing them, upon the bearward. During the exhibition the knight had entertained his consort with an account of his combat with old Max; and before quitting the menagerie he led her into the open space in front of the cages, that she might have a nearer view of the formidable animal.

"It will not be necessary to read you such a lesson, sweet-heart, as my friend Magog read his dame," he observed. "But it is well you should know that I have a resource in case of need."

"I shall not require to be brought to obedience by a bear, chuck," returned Lady Le Grand, with a languishing look. "Your slightest word is law to me!"

"So she says now," observed Dame Potentia, who happened to overhear the remark, to dame Placida. "But let a week pass over their heads, and she will alter her tone."

"Perhaps so," sighed Placida. "But I have never had my own way since my encounter with old Max. Besides, these dwarfs are fiery fellows, and have twice the spirit of men of larger growth."

"There is something in that, it must be owned," rejoined Potentia, reflectively.

Max, by Sir Narcissus's command, was let out of his cage, and when within a few yards of them, sat on his hind-legs, and opened his enormous jaws. At this sight, Lady Le Grand screamed, and took refuge behind her husband, who, bidding her fear nothing, drew his sword, and put himself in a posture of defence. Suppressing a laugh, Hairun informed the knight that Max only begged for something to eat; and sundry biscuits and apples being given him, he was driven back to his cage without any misadventure. Hairun then led the party to his lodging, where a collation was spread out for them, of which they partook. At its conclusion, Peter Trusbut observed, that if Sir Narcissus and Lady Le Grand would honor him with their company at the Stone Kitchen on the following night, he would use his best endeavors to prepare a supper worthy of them.

"It will give me infinite pleasure to sup with thee, worthy Peter," replied the knight, with a patronising air; "but I must insist that the banquet be at my expense. Thou shalt cook it—I will pay for it."

"As you please, worshipful sir," rejoined Trusbut. "But I can have what I please from the royal larder."

"So much the better," returned Sir Narcissus. "But mine the entertainment shall be. And I here invite you all to it."

"My best endeavors shall be used to content your worship," replied the pantler. "We have had some good suppers in the Stone Kitchen ere now, but this shall exceed them all."

"It is well," replied the knight. Hairun, you had better bring your monkey to divert us."

"Right willingly, worshipful sir," replied the bearward; "and if you have a cast-off suit of clothes to spare, I will deck him in them for the occasion."

"You will find my last suit at the By-ward Tower," replied Sir Narcissus. "Og will give them to you; and you may, if you choose, confer upon him the same I have cast off with them."

"I will not fail to adopt your worship's suggestion," returned Hairun, smothering a laugh. "Henceforth, I shall call my ape Xit, and who knows whether in due season he may not obtain the dignity of knighthood?"

Sir Narcissus did not exactly relish this remark, which made many of the guests smile; but he thought it better not to notice it, and taking a courteous leave of the hospitable bearward, proceeded to the palace, where a lodging was now given him, and where he passed the remainder of the day with his friends in jollity and carousing. Nor was it until the clock had chimed midnight, that he was left alone with his spouse.

At what hour Sir Narcissus arose on the following morning does not appear. But at eight in the evening, attired as on the previous day, and accompanied by his dame in her wedding-dress, he repaired to the Stone Kitchen. He found the whole party assembled, including, besides those he had invited, Winwike, and his son, a clubby youth of some ten years old, Mauger, Wolfytt, and Sorrocoold. Sir Narcissus could have dispensed with the company of the three latter; but not desiring to quarrel with them, he put the best face he could upon the matter, and bade them heartily welcome. He found, too, that Hairun had literally obeyed his injunctions, and brought his monkey with him, dressed up in his old clothes.

"Allow me to present Xit, the ape, to your worship," said the bearward.

"He is welcome," replied Sir Narcissus, laughing, to conceal his vexation at the absurd resemblance which the animal bore to him.

Sir Narcissus was then conducted to a seat at the head of the table. On the right was placed his lady, on the left, Dame Placida; while the pantler, who, as usual, filled the office of carver, faced him. The giants were separated by the other guests, and Ribald sat between Dames Placida and Potentia, both of whom he contrived to keep in most excellent humor. Peter Trusbut did not assert too much when he declared that the entertainment should surpass all that had previously been given in the Stone Kitchen; and not to be behind hand, the giants exceeded all their former efforts in the eating line. They did not, it is true, trouble themselves much with the first course, which consisted of various kinds of pottage and fish; though Og spoke in terms of rapturous commendation of a sturgeon's jowl, and Magog consumed the best part of a pickled tunny-fish. But when these were removed, and the more substantial viands appeared, they set to work in earnest. Turning up their noses at the boiled capons, roasted bustards, stewed quails, and other light matters, they, by one consent, assailed a large shield of brawn, and speedily demolished it. Their next incursion was upon a venison party—a soused pig followed—and while Gog prepared himself for a copious draught of Rhenish by a dish of anchovies, Magog, who had just emptied a huge two-handed flagon of bragget, sharpened his appetite—the edge of which was a little taken off—with a plate of pickled oysters. A fawn roasted whole, with a pudding in its inside, now claimed their attention, and was pronounced delicious. Og then helped himself to a shoulder of mutton and olives; Gog to a couple of roasted ruffs; and Magog again revived his flagging powers with a dish of buttered crabs. At this juncture, the strong waters were introduced by the pantler, and proved highly acceptable to the laboring giant.

Peter Trusbut performed wonders. In the old terms of his art, he leached the brawn, reared the goose, sauced the capon, spoiled the fowls, flushed the chickens, unlaced the rabbits, winged the quails, minced the plovers, thighed the pigeons, bordered the venison pastry, tranced the sturgeon, under-tranced the tunny-fish, tamed the crab, and barbed the lobster.

The triumphs of the repast now appeared. They were a baked swan, served in a coffin of rye-paste; a crane likewise roasted whole; and a peacock, decorated with its tail. The first of these birds—to use his own terms—was reared by the pantler; the second displayed; and the last disfigured. And disfigured it was, in more ways than one; for, snatching the gaudy plumes from its tail, Sir Narcissus decorated his dame's cap with them. The discussion of these noble dishes fully occupied the giants, and when they had consumed a tolerable share of each, they declared they had done. Nor could they be tempted with the marrow toasts, the fritters, the puddings, the wafers, and other oates and sweetmeats that followed—though they did not display the like objection to the brimming cups of hippocras, which wound up the repast.

The only person who appeared to want appetite for the feast, or who, perhaps, was too busy to eat, was Sir Narcissus. For the first time in his life, he played the part of host, and he acquitted himself to admiration. Ever and anon, rising in his chair, with a goblet of wine in his hand, he would pledge some guest, or call out to Peter Trusbut to fill some empty plate. He had a jest for every one—abundance of well-turned compliments for the ladies; and the tenderest glances and whispers for his dame, who looked more lovesick and devoted than ever. By the time the cloth was removed, and the dishes replaced by flagons and pots of hydromel and wine, Sir Narcissus was in the height of his glory. The wine had got a little into his head, but not more than added to his exhilaration, and he listened with rapturous delight to the speech made by Og, who in good set terms proposed his health and that of his bride. The pledge was drunk with the utmost enthusiasm; and in the heat of his excitement, Sir Narcissus mounted on the table, and bowing all round, returned thanks in the choicest phrases he could summon. His speech received several interruptions from the applause of his guests; and Hairun, who was bent upon mischief, thought this a favorable opportunity for practicing it. During the banquet, he had kept the money in the back-ground, but he now placed him on the table behind Sir Narcissus, whose gestures and posture the animal began to mimic. Its grimaces were so absurd and extraordinary, that the company roared with laughter, to the infinite astonishment of the speaker, who at the moment was indulging in a pathetic regret at the necessity he should be under of quitting his old haunts in consequence of his new dignities and duties; but his surprise was changed to anger, as he felt his sword suddenly twitched from the sheath, and beheld the grinning countenance of the ape close behind him. Uttering an exclamation of fury, he turned with the intention of sacrificing the cause of his annoyance on the spot; but the animal was too quick for him, and springing on his shoulders, plucked off his cap, and twisted its fingers in his well-curled hair, lugging him tremendously. Screaming with pain and rage, Sir Narcissus ran round the table upsetting all in his course, but unable to free himself from his tormentor, who, keeping fast hold of his head, grinned and chattered as it in mockery of his vociferations.

Lady Le Grand had not noticed the monkey's first proceedings, her attention being diverted by Ribald, who pressed her, with many compliments upon her charms, to take a goblet of malmsey which he had poured out for her. But she no sooner perceived what was going forward, than she flew to the rescue, beat off the monkey, and hugging her little lord to her bosom, almost smothered him with kisses and caresses. Nor were Dames Placida and Potentia, less attentive to him. At first, they had treated the matter as a joke, but seeing the diminutive knight was really alarmed, they rubbed his head, patted him on the back, embraced him as tenderly as Lady Le Grand would permit, and loudly upbraided Hairun for his misconduct. Scarcely able to conceal his laughter, the offender pretended the utmost regret, and instantly sent off the monkey by one of the attendants to the Lions' Tower.

It was some time before Sir Narcissus could be fully appeased; and it required all the blandishments of the dames, and the humblest apologies from Hairun, to prevent him from quitting the party in high dudgeon. At length, however, he was persuaded by Magog to wash down his resentment in a bottle of sack, brewed by the pantler—and the generous drink restored him to instant good-humor. Called upon by the company to conclude his speech, he once more ventured upon the table, and declaiming bitterly against the interruption he had experienced, finished his oration amid the loudest cheers. He then bowed round in his most graceful manner, and returned to his chair.

It has already been stated that Mauger, Sorrocol, and Wolfytt were among the guests. The latter had pretty nearly recovered from the wound inflicted by Nightgall, which proved, on examination, by no means dangerous; and, regardless of the consequences, he ate, drank, laughed, and shouted as lustily as the rest. The other two, being of a more grave and saturnine character, seldom smiled at what was going forward; and though they did not neglect to fill their goblets, took no share in the general conversation, but sat apart in a corner near the chimney with Winwike, discussing the terrible scenes they had witnessed in their different capacities, with the true gusto of amateurs.

"And so Lady Jane Grey and her husband will positively be executed to-morrow?" observed Winwike. "There is no chance of further reprieve, I suppose?"

"None whatever," replied Mauger. "Father Feckenham, I understand, offered her two days more, if she would prolong her disputation with him, but she refused. No—no. There will be no further respite. She will suffer on the Green—her husband on Tower Hill."

"So I heard," replied Sorrocol. "Poor soul! she is very young—not seventeen, I am told."

"Poh—poh!" cried Mauger, gruffly—"there's nothing in that. Life is as sweet at seventy as seventeen. However I'll do my work as quickly as I can. If you wish to see a head cleanly taken off, get as near the scaffold as you can."

"I shall not fail to do so," returned Sorrocol. "I would not miss it for the world."

"As soon as the clock strikes twelve, and the Sabbath is ended," continued Mauger, "my assistants will begin to put up the scaffold. You know the spot before Saint Peter's chapel. They say the grass won't grow there. But that's an old woman's tale—ho! ho!"

"Old woman's tale, or not," rejoined Winwike, gravely—"it's true. I've often examined the spot, and never could find a blade of herbage there."

"Well, well," rejoined Mauger. "I won't dispute the point. Believe it, and welcome. I could tell other strange tales concerning that place. It's a great privilege to be beheaded there, and only granted to illustrious personages. The last two who fell there were Queen Catherine Howard, and her confidante, the Countess of Rochford. Lady Jane Grey would be beheaded on Tower Hill, with her husband, but they are afraid of the mob, who might compassionate the youthful pair, and occasion a riot. It's better to be on the safe side—ho! ho!"

"You said you had some other strange tales to tell concerning that place," observed Sorrocol. "What are they?"

"I don't much like talking about them," rejoined Mauger, reluctantly, "but since I've dropped a hint on the subject, I may as well speak out. You must know then, that the night before the execution of the old Countess of Salisbury, who would not lay her head upon the block, and whom I was obliged to chase round the scaffold and bring down how I could—the night before she fell—and a bright moonlight night it was—I was standing on the scaffold, putting it in order for the morrow, when all at once there issued from the church porch a female figure, shrouded from head to foot in white."

"Well!" exclaimed Sorrocol, breathlessly.

"Well," returned the headman, "though filled with alarm, I never took my eyes from it, but watched it glide slowly round the scaffold, and finally return to the porch, where it disappeared."

"Did you address it?" asked Winwike.

"Not I," replied Mauger. "My tongue clove to the roof of my mouth. I could not have spoken to save my life."

"Strange!" exclaimed Sorrocol. "Did you ever see it again?"

"Yes, on the night before Catherine Howard's execution," replied Mauger; "and I have no doubt it will appear to-night."

"Do you think so?" cried Sorrocol. "I will watch for it."

"I shall visit the scaffold myself, an hour after midnight," returned Mauger—"you can accompany me if you think proper."

"Agreed!" exclaimed the surgeon.

They were here interrupted by a boisterous roar of merriment from the other guests. While their sombre talk was going on, Ribald, who had made considerable progress in the good graces of Lady Le Grand, had related a merry tale, and at its close, which was attended with shouts of laughter, Sir Narcissus ordered a fresh supply of wine, and the vast measures were promptly replenished by the pantler. Several pleasant hours were thus consumed, until at last Sir Narcissus arose, or rather attempted to rise, for his limbs refused their office, and his gaze was rather unsteady, and addressed his friends as follows: "Farewell, my merry gossips," he hiccupped—"farewell! As I am now a married man, I must keep go-o-o-d hours." (At this moment the clock struck twelve). "I have already trespassed too much on Lady Le Grand's good nature. She is getting sleepy. So, to speak truth, am I. I shall often visit you again—as often, at least, as my dignities and duties will permit. Do not stand in awe of my presence. I shall always unbend with you—always. The truly great are never proud—at least to their inferiors. With their superiors it is a different matter. This alone would convince you of my illustrious origin."

"True," cried Gog, "no one would suspect you of being the son of a groom of the pantry, for instance."

"No one," repeated Xit, fiercely, and making an ineffectual attempt to draw his sword, "or if he did suspect it, he should never live to repeat it."

"Well, well," replied Gog, meekly. "I do n't suspect it."

"None of us suspect it," laughed Og.

"I am quite sa-sa-satisfied," replied Sir Narcissus. "More wine, old Trusbut. Fill the pots, pantler. I'll give you a r-r-r-ousing pledge."

"And so will I," cried his dame, who, like her lord, was a little the worse for the wine she had swallowed—her goblet being kept constantly filled by the assiduous Ribald—"so will I, if you do n't come home directly, you little sot."

"Lady Le Gr-and," cried Sir Narcissus, furiously, "I'll divorce you—I'll behead you as Henry the Eighth did Anne Boleyn."

"No, chuck, you won't," replied the lady. "You will think better of it to-morrow." So saying, she snatched him up in her arms, and despite his resistance carried him off to his lodging in the palace, long before reaching which he had fallen asleep, and when he awoke next morning, he had but a very confused recollection of the events of the preceding night.

And here, as it will be necessary to take leave of our little friend, we will give a hasty glance at his subsequent history. Within a year of his union, a son was born to him, who speedily eclipsed his sire in stature, and in due season became a stalwart, well-proportioned man, six feet in height, and bearing a remarkable resemblance to Ribald. Sir Narcissus was exceedingly fond of him; and it was rather a droll sight to see them together. The dwarfish knight continued to rise in favor with the Queen, and might have been constantly with the court had he pleased, but as he preferred, from old habits and associations, residing within the Tower, he was allowed apartments in the palace, of which he was termed, in derision, the grand seneschal. On Elizabeth's accession, he was not removed, but retained his post to the middle of the reign of James the First, when he died, full of years and honors—active, vain, and consequential to the last, and from his puny stature, always looking young. He was interred in front of Saint Peter's chapel on the green, near his old friends the giants, who had preceded him some years to the land of shadows, and the stone that marks his grave may still be seen.

As to the three gigantic warders, they retained their posts, and played their parts at many a feast and high solemnity during Elizabeth's golden rule, waxing in girth and bulk as they advanced in years, until they became somewhat gross and unwieldy. Og, who had been long threatened with apoplexy, his head being almost buried in his enormous shoulders, expired suddenly in his chair after a feast; and his two brethren took his loss so much to heart, that they abstained altogether from the flask, and followed him in less than six months, dying, it was thought, of grief, but more probably of dropsy. Their resting-place has been already indicated. In the same spot, also, lie Lady Le Grand, Dame Placida, and the worthy pantler and his spouse. Magog was a widower during the latter part of his life, and exhibited no anxiety to enter a second time into the holy estate of matrimony. Og and Gog died unmarried.

CHAPTER XL....Of the vision seen by Mauger and Sorrocol on the Tower Green.

After the forcible abduction of Sir Narcissus by his spouse, the party broke up—Og and Gog shaping their course to the By-ward Tower, Magog and his spouse, together with Ribald, who had taken up his quarters with them, to their lodging on the hill leading to the green—Hairun to the Lions' Tower, Winwike and his son to the Flint Tower, while Mauger, Wolfytt and Sorrocol proceeded to the cradle Tower. Unfastening his door, the headman struck a light, and, setting fire to the lamp, motioned the others to a bench, and placed a stone jar of strong waters before them, of which Wolfytt took a long, deep pull, but the surgeon declined it.

"I have had enough," he said. "Besides, I want to see the spirit."

"I care for no other spirit but this," rejoined Wolfytt, again applying his mouth to the jar.

"Take care of yourselves, masters," observed Mauger. "I must attend to business."

"Never mind us," laughed Wolfytt, observing the executioner take up an axe, and after examining its edge, begin to sharpen it, "grind away."

"This is for Lord Guilford Dudley," remarked Mauger, as he turned the wheel with his foot. "I shall need two axes to-morrow."

"Sharp work," observed Wolfytt, with a detestable grin.

"You would think so, were I to try one on you," retorted Mauger. "Ay, now it will do," he added, laying aside the implement and taking up another. "This is my favorite axe. I can make sure work with it. I always keep it for queens or dames of high degree—ho! ho! This notch, which I can never grind away, was made by the old Countess of Salisbury, that I told you about. It was a terrible sight to see her white hair dabbled with blood. Poor Lady Jane won't give me so much trouble, I'll be sworn. She'll die like a lamb."

"Ay, ay," muttered Sorrocol. "God send her a speedy death!"

"She's sure of it with me," returned Mauger, "so you may rest easy on that score." And as he turned the grindstone quickly round, drawing sparks from the steel, he chaunted, as hoarsely as a raven, the following ditty:

The axe was sharp, and heavy as lead,
As it touched the neck, off went the head!
Whir—whir—whir—whir!

And the screaming of the grindstone formed an appropriate accompaniment to the melody.

Queen Anne laid her white throat upon the block,
Quietly waiting the fatal shock;
The axe it severed it right in twain,
And so quick—so true—that she felt no pain!
Whir—whir—whir—whir!

And again he set the wheel in motion.

Salisbury's countess, she would not die
As a proud dame should—decorously.
Lifting my axe, I split her skull,
And the edge since then has been notched and dull.
Whir—whir—whir—whir!

Queen Catherine Howard gave me a sec—
A chain of gold—to die easily;
And her costly present she did not rue,
For I touched her head, and away it flew!
Whir—whir—whir—whir!

"A brave song, and well sung," cried Wolfytt, approvingly. "Have you any more of it?"

"No," replied Mauger, significantly. "I shall make another verse to-morrow. My axe is now as sharp as a razor," he added, feeling its edge. "Suppose we go to the scaffold? It must be up by this time."

"With all my heart," replied Sorrocol, whose superstitious curiosity was fully awakened.

Shouldering the heavy block with the greatest ease, Mauger directed Wolfytt to bring a bundle of straw from a heap in the corner, and extinguishing the lamp, set forth. It was a sharp, frosty night, and the hard ground rang beneath their footsteps. There was no moon, but the stars twinkled brightly down, revealing every object with sufficient distinctness. As they passed Saint Thomas's Tower, Wolfytt laughingly pointed out Bret's head stuck upon a spike on the roof, and observed—"That poor fellow made Xit a knight."

On reaching the Green, they found Mauger's conjecture right—the scaffold was nearly finished. Two carpenters were at work upon it, nailing the planks to the posts, and the noise of their hammers resounded in sharp echoes from the surrounding habitations. Hurrying forward, Mauger ascended the steps, which were placed on the north, opposite Saint Peter's chapel, and deposited his burthen on the platform. He was followed more leisurely by Sorrocol; and Wolfytt, throwing the straw upon the ground, scrambled after them as well as he could.

"If I had thought it was so cold, I would have taken another pull at the stone bottle," he said, rubbing his hands.

"Warm yourself by helping the carpenter," replied Sorrocol, gravely. "It will do you more good."

Wolfytt laughed, and dropping on his knees, grasped the block with both hands, and placed his neck in the hollow space.

"Shall I try whether I can take your head off?" demanded Mauger, feigning to draw his dagger.

Apprehensive that the jest might be carried a little too far, Wolfytt got up, and intimated, as well as his drunken condition would allow, the actions of a person addressing the multitude and preparing for execution. In bowing to receive the blessing of the priest, he missed his footing a second time, and rolled off the scaffold. He did not attempt to ascend again, but supported himself against one of the posts near the carpenters. Mauger and Sorrocol took no notice of him, but began to converse in an undertone about the apparition. In spite of himself, the executioner could not repress a feeling of dread, and the surgeon half repented his curiosity.

After a while, neither spoke, and Sorrocol's teeth clattered, partly with cold, partly with terror. Nothing broke the death-like silence around, except the noise of the hammer, and, ever and anon, a sullen and ominous roar proceeding from the direction of the Lions' Tower.

"Do you think it will appear?" inquired Sorrocol, whose blood was cold at the latter awful sounds.

"I know not!" replied Mauger, "ah! there—there it is!" And he pointed towards the Church porch, from which a figure, robed in white, but unsubstantial almost as the mist, suddenly issued. It glided noiselessly along, and without turning its face towards the beholders. No one saw it except Mauger and Sorrocol, who followed its course with their eyes. The carpenters continued their work, and Wolfytt stared at his companions in stupid and inebriate wonderment. After making the complete circuit of the scaffold, the figure entered the Church porch and disappeared.

"What think you of it?" demanded Mauger, as soon as he could find utterance.

"It is marvellous and incomprehensible; and, if I had not seen it with my own eyes, I could not have believed it," replied the surgeon. "It must be the shade of Anne Boleyn. She is buried in the chapel."

"You are right," replied the executioner, "it is her spirit. There will be no further respite. Jane will die to-morrow."

XLII.—Of the union of Cholmondeley with Cicely.

The near approach of death found Jane as unshaken as before, or rather she rejoiced that her deliverance was at hand. Compelled, to her infinite regret, to hold a disputation with Feckenham, she exerted all her powers; and, as upon a former occasion, when opposed to a more formidable antagonist, Gardiner, came off victorious. But though defeated, the zealous confessor did not give up his point, trusting he should be able to weary her out. He accordingly passed the greater part of each day in her prison, and brought with him, at different times, Gardiner, Tunstall, Bonner, and other prelates, all of whom tried the effect of their reasoning upon her, but with no avail. Bonner, who was of a fierce and intolerant nature, was so enraged that, on taking leave of her, he said with much acrimony, "Farewell, madam; I am sorry for your obstinacy, and I am assured we shall never meet again!"

"True, my lord," replied Jane, "we never shall meet again, unless it shall please God to turn your heart. And I sincerely pray that he may send you his Holy Spirit, that your eyes may be opened to His truth."

Nor had the other better success. Aware that whatever she said would be reported to the disadvantage of the Protestant faith, if it could be so perverted, she determined to give them no handle for misrepresentation, and fought the good fight so gallantly that she lost not a single point, and wrung even from her enemies a reluctant admission of defeat. Those best skilled in all the subtleties of scholastic argument could not perplex her. United to the most profound learning, she possessed a clear logical understanding, enabling her at once to unravel and expose the mysteries in which they sought to perplex her, while the questions she proposed in her turn were unanswerable. At first, she found Feckenham's visits irksome, but by degrees they became almost agreeable to her, because she felt she was at once serving the cause of the Gospel, and taken from her own thoughts. During all this time, Angela never for a moment quitted her; and, though she took no part in the conferences, she profited greatly by them.

Two days before she suffered, Jane said to Feckenham, "You have often expressed a wish to serve me, reverend sir. There is one favor you can confer upon me, if you will."

"What is it, madam?" he rejoined.

"Before I die," returned Jane, "I would fain see Angela united to her lover, Cuthbert Cholmondeley. He was ever a faithful follower of my unfortunate husband, and he has exhibited a like devoted attachment to me. I know not whether you can confer this favor upon me, or whether you will do so if you can. But I venture, from your professions of regard for me, to ask it. If you consent, send, I pray you, to Master John Bradford, prebendary of Saint Paul's, and let him perform the ceremony in this chamber."

"Bradford!" exclaimed Feckenham, frowning. "I know the obstinate and heretical preacher well. If you are willing that I should perform the ceremony, I will undertake to obtain the Queen's permission for it. But it must not be done by Bradford."

"Then I have nothing further to say," replied Jane.

"But how comes it that you, Angela," said Feckenham, addressing her in a severe tone, "the daughter of Catholic parents, both of whom suffered for their faith, abandon it?" "A better light has been vouchsafed me," she replied, and I lament that they were not equally favored."

"Well, madam," observed Feckenham, to Jane, "you shall not say I am harsh with you. I desire to serve Angela, for her parents' sake—both of whom were very dear to me. I will make known your request to the queen, and I can almost promise it shall be granted on one condition."

"On no condition affecting my opinions," said Jane.

"Nay, madam," returned the confessor, with a half-smile, "I was about to propose nothing to which you can object. My condition is, that if Bradford is admitted to your prison, you exchange no word with him, except in reference to the object of his visit. That done he must depart at once."

"I readily agree to it," replied Jane, "and I thank you for your consideration."

After some further conference, Feckenham departed, and Angela, as soon as they were alone, warmly thanked Jane for her kindness, saying—"But why think of me at such a time?"

"Because it will be a satisfaction to me to know that you are united to the object of your affections," replied Jane. "And now leave me to my devotions, and prepare yourself for what is to happen."

With this, she withdrew into the recess, and, occupied in fervent prayer, soon abstracted herself from all else. Three hours afterwards, Feckenham returned. He was accompanied by Cholmondeley, and a grave looking divine in the habit of a minister of the Reformed Church, in whom Jane immediately recognized John Bradford—the uncompromising preacher of the Gospel, who not long afterwards won his crown of martyrdom at Smithfield. Apparently, he knew why he was summoned, and the condition annexed to it, for he fixed an eye full of the deepest compassion and admiration upon Jane, but said nothing. Cholmondeley threw himself at her feet, and pressed her hand to his lips, but his utterance failed him. Jane raised him kindly, and entreated him to command himself, saying, "I have not sent for you here to afflict you, but to make you happy."

"Alas! madam," replied Cholmondeley, "you are ever more thoughtful for others than yourself."

"Proceed with the ceremony without delay, sir," said Feckenham. "I rely upon your word, madam, that you hold no conference with him."

"You may rely upon it," returned Jane.

And the confessor withdrew.

Bradford then took from his vest a book of prayers, and in that prison-chamber, with Jane only as a witness, the ceremony was performed. At its conclusion, Angela observed to her husband—

"We must separate as soon as united, for I never shall quit my dear mistress during her lifetime."

"I should deeply regret it, if you did otherwise," returned Cholmondeley. "Would I had like permission to attend on Lord Guilford. But that is denied me."

At the mention of her husband's name, a shade passed over Jane's countenance; but she instantly checked the emotion.

"My blessing upon your union!" she cried, extending her hands over the pair, "and may it be happy—happier than mine."

"Amen!" cried Bradford. "Before I take my leave, madam, I trust I shall not transgress the confessor's commands, if I request you to write your name in this book of prayers. It will stimulate me in my devotions, and may perchance cheer me in a trial like your own."

Jane readily complied, and taking the book, wrote a short prayer in the blank leaf, and subscribed it with her name.

"This is but a slight return for your compliance with my request, Master Bradford," she said, as she returned the book, "but it is all I have to offer."

"I shall prize it more than the richest gift," replied the preacher. "Farewell, madam, and doubt not I shall pray constantly for you."

"I thank you heartily, sir," she replied. "You must go with him, Cholmondeley," she continued, perceiving that he esquire lingered—"We must now part for ever."

"Farewell, madam," cried Cholmondeley, again prostrating himself before her, and pressing her hand to his lips.

"Nay, Angela, you must lead him forth," observed Jane, kindly, though a tear started to her eye. And she withdrew into an embrasure, while Cholmondeley, utterly unable to control his distress, rushed forth, and was followed by Bradford.

Jane's benediction did not fall to the ground. When the tragic event which it is the purpose of this Chronicle to relate was over, Angela fell into a dangerous illness, during which her husband watched over her with the greatest solicitude. Long before her recovery, he had been liberated by Mary; and, as soon as she was fully restored to health, they retired to his family seat, in Cheshire, where they passed many years of uninterrupted happiness, saddened, but not painfully, by the recollections of the past.

XLIII.—The Execution of Lady Jane Grey.

Monday, the 12th of February, 1554, the fatal day destined to terminate Jane's earthly sufferings, at length arrived. Excepting a couple of hours which she allowed to rest, at the urgent entreaty of her companion, she had passed the whole of the night in prayer. Angela kept watch over the lovely sleeper; and the effect produced by the contemplation of her features during this her last slumber was never afterwards effaced. The repose of an infant could not be more calm and holy. A celestial smile irradiated her countenance; her lips moved as if in prayer; and if good angels are ever permitted to visit the dreams of those they love on earth, they hovered that night over the couch of Jane.

Thinking it cruelly to disturb her from such a blissful state, Angela let an hour pass beyond the appointed time. But observing a change come over her countenance—seeing her bosom heave, and tears gather beneath her eye lashes, she touched her, and Jane instantly awoke.

"Is it four o'clock?" she inquired.

"It has just struck five, madam," replied Angela. "I have disobeyed you for the first and last time. But you seemed so happy that I could not find in my heart to waken you."

"I was happy," replied Jane, "for I dreamed that all was over—without pain to me—and that my soul was borne to regions of celestial bliss by a troop of angels who had hovered above the scaffold."

"It will be so, madam," replied Angela, fervently. "You will quit this earth immediately for heaven, where you will join your husband in everlasting happiness."

"I trust so," replied Jane, in an altered tone, "but in that blessed place I searched in vain for him. Angela, you let me sleep too long, or not long enough."

"Your pardon, dearest madam," cried the other, fearfully.

"Nay, you have given me no offence," returned Jane, kindly. "What I meant was that I had not time to find my husband."

"Oh, you will find him, dearest madam," returned Angela, "doubt it not. Your prayers would wash out his offences, if his own could not."

"I trust so," replied Jane. "And I will now pray for him, and I do so pray too."

Jane then retired to the recess, and in the gloom, for it was yet dark, continued her devotions until the clock struck seven. She then arose, and, assisted by Angela, attired herself with great care.

"I pay more attention to the decoration of my body now I am about to part with it," she observed, "than I would do, if it was to serve me longer. So joyful is the occasion to me, that were I to consult my own feelings, I would put on my richest apparel to indicate my contentment of heart. I will not, however, so brave my fate, but array myself in these weeds." And she put on a gown of black velvet, without ornament of any kind; tying round her slender throat (so soon, alas! to be severed) a simple white falling collar. Her hair was left purposely unbraided, and was confined by a caul of black velvet. As Angela performed those sad services, she sobbed audibly.

"Nay, cheer thee, child," observed Jane. "When I was clothed in the robes of royalty, and had the crown placed upon my brow—nay, when arrayed on my wedding-day—I felt not half so joyful as now."

"Ah! madam!" exclaimed Angela, in a paroxysm of grief, "My condition is more pitiable than yours. You go to certain happiness. But I lose you."

"Only for a while, dear Angela," returned Jane. "Comfort yourself with that thought. Let my fate be a warning to you. Be not dazzled by ambition. Had I not once yielded, I had never thus perished. Discharge your duty strictly to your eternal and your temporal rulers, and rest assured we shall meet again—never to part."

"Your counsel shall be graven on my heart, madam," returned Angela. "And oh! may my end be as happy as yours!"

"Heaven grant it!" ejaculated Jane, fervently. "And now," she added, as her toilette was ended, "I am ready to die."

"Will you not take some refreshment, madam?" asked Angela.

"No," replied Jane: "I have done with the body!"

The morning was damp and dark. A thaw came on a little before day-break, and a drizzling shower of rain fell. This was succeeded by a thick mist, and the whole of the fortress was for a while enveloped in vapor. It brought to Jane's mind the day on which she was taken to trial. But a moral gloom likewise overspread the fortress. Every one within it, save her few enemies, (and they were few indeed,) lamented Jane's approaching fate. Her youth, her innocence, her piety, touched the sternest breast, and moved the pity even of her persecutors. All felt that morning as if some dire calamity was at hand, and instead of looking forward to the execution as an exciting spectacle, (for so such revolting exhibitions were then considered,) they wished it over. Many a prayer was breathed for the speedy release of the sufferer; many a sigh heaved; many a groan uttered; and if ever soul was wafted to heaven by the fervent wishes of those on earth, Jane's was so.

It was late before there were any signs of stir and bustle within the fortress. Even the soldiers gathered together reluctantly—and those who conversed, spoke in whispers. Dudley, who it has been stated was imprisoned in the Beauchamp Tower, had passed the greater part of the night in devotion. But towards morning, he became restless and uneasy, and unable to compose himself, resorted to the customary employment of captives in such cases, and with a nail which he had found, carved his wife's name in two places on the walls of his prison. These inscriptions still remain.

At nine o'clock, the bell of the chapel began to toll, and an escort of halberdiers and arquebussiers drew up before the Beauchamp Tower, while Sir Thomas Brydges and Feckenham entered the chamber of the prisoner, who received them with an unmoved countenance.

"Before you set out upon a journey from which you will never return, my lord," said Feckenham, "I would ask you for the last time, if any change has taken place in your religious sentiments—and whether you are yet alive to the welfare of your soul?"

"Why not promise me pardon if I will recant on the scaffold, and silence me by my silence the duke my father, by the axe?" replied Dudley, sternly. "No, sir, I will have naught to do with your false and idolatrous creed. I shall die a firm believer in the Gospel, and trust to be saved by it."

"Then perish, body and soul," replied Feckenham, harshly. "Sir Thomas Brydges, I commit him to your hands."

"Am I to be allowed no parting with my wife?" demanded Dudley, anxiously.

"You have parted with her for ever,—heretic and unbeliever!" rejoined Feckenham.

"That speech will haunt your death-bed, sir," retorted Dudley, sternly. And he turned to the lieutenant, and signified that he was ready.

The first object that met Dudley's gaze, as he issued from his prison, was the scaffold on the green. He looked at it a moment, wistfully.

"It is for Lady Jane," observed the lieutenant.

"I know it," replied Dudley, in a voice of intense emotion.—"I thank you for letting me die first."

"You must thank the queen, my lord," returned Brydges. "It was her order."

"Shall you see my wife, sir?" demanded Dudley anxiously.

The lieutenant answered in the affirmative.

"Tell her I will be with her on the scaffold," said Dudley.

As he was about to set forward a young man pushed through the lines of halberdiers, and threw himself at his feet. It was Cholmondeley. Dudley instantly raised and embraced him. "At least I see one whom I love," he cried.

"My lord, this interruption must not be," observed the lieutenant. "If you do not retire," he added, to Cholmondeley, "I shall place you in arrest."

"Farewell, my dear lord," cried the weeping esquire—"farewell!"

"Farewell for ever!"—returned Dudley, as Cholmondeley was forced back by the guard.

The escort then moved forward, and the lieutenant accompanied the prisoner to the gateway of the Middle Tower, where he delivered him to the sheriffs and their officers, who were waiting there for him with a Franciscan friar, and then returned to fulfil his more painful duty. A vast crowd was collected on Tower Hill, and the strongest commiseration was expressed for Dudley, as he was led to the scaffold, on which Manger had already taken his station.

On quitting the Beauchamp Tower, Feckenham proceeded to Jane's prison. He found her on her knees, but she immediately arose.

"Is it time?" she asked.

"It is, madam—to repent," replied Feckenham, sternly. "A few minutes are all that now remain to you of life; nay, at this moment, perhaps, your husband is called before his Eternal Judge. There is yet time. Do not perish like him in your sins."

"Heaven have mercy upon him!" cried Jane, falling on her knees.

And notwithstanding the importunities of the confessor, she continued in fervent prayer, till the appearance of Sir Thomas Brydges. She instantly understood why he came, and rising, prepared for departure. Almost blinded by tears, Angela rendered her the last services she required. This done, the lieutenant, who was likewise greatly affected, begged some slight remembrance of her.

"I have nothing to give you but this book of prayers, sir," she answered—"but you shall have that, when I have done with it, and may it profit you."

"You will receive it only to cast it into the flames, my son," remarked Feckenham.

"On the contrary, I shall treasure it like a priceless gem," replied Brydges.

"You will find a prayer written in my own hand," said Jane—"And again I say, may it profit you."

Brydges then passed through the door, and Jane followed him. A band of halberdiers were without. At the sight of her, a deep and general sympathy was manifested; not an eye was dry; and tears trickled down cheeks unaccustomed to such moisture. The melancholy train proceeded at a slow pace. Jane fixed her eyes upon the prayer-book, which she read aloud to drown the importunities of the confessor, who walked on her right, while Angela kept near her on the other side. And so they reached the green.

By this time, the fog had cleared off, and the rain had ceased; but the atmosphere was humid, and the day lowering and gloomy. Very few spectators were assembled; for it required firm nerves to witness such a tragedy. A flock of carrion-crows and ravens attracted by their fearful instinct, wheeled around overhead, or settled on the branches of the bare and leafless trees, and by their croaking added to the dismal character of the scene. The bell continued tolling all the time.

The sole person upon the scaffold was Wolfytt. He was occupied in scattering straw near the block. Among the by-standers was Sorrocolle leaning on his staff; and as Jane for a moment raised her eyes as she passed along, she perceived Roger Ascham. Her old preceptor had obeyed her, and she repaid him with a look of gratitude.

By the lieutenant's directions, she was conducted for a short time into the Beauchamp Tower, and here Feckenham continued his persecutions, until a deep groan arose among those without, and an officer abruptly entered the room.

"Madam," said Sir John Brydges, after the new-comer had delivered his message, "we must set forth."

Jane made a motion of assent, and the party issued from the Beauchamp Tower, in front of which a band of halberdiers was drawn up. A wide open space was kept clear around the scaffold. Jane seemed unconscious of all that was passing. Preceded by the lieutenant, who took his way toward the north of the scaffold, and attended on either side by Feckenham and Angela as before, she kept her eyes steadily fixed on her prayer-book.

Arrived within a short distance of the fatal spot, she was startled by a scream from Angela, and looking up, beheld four soldiers, carrying a litter covered with a cloth, and advancing toward her. She knew it was the body of her husband, and, unprepared for so terrible an encounter, uttered a cry of horror. The bearers of the litter passed on, and entered the porch of the chapel.

While this took place, Manger, who had limped back as fast as he could after his bloody work on Tower Hill—only tarrying a moment to exchange his axe—ascended the steps of the scaffold, and ordered Wolfytt to get down. Sir Thomas Brydges, who was greatly shocked at what had just occurred, and would have prevented it if it had been possible, returned to Jane and offered her his assistance. But she did not require it. The force of the shock had passed away, and she firmly mounted the scaffold.

When she was seen there, a groan of compassion arose from the spectators, and prayers were audibly uttered. She then advanced to the rail, and, in a clear, distinct voice, spoke as follows:

"I pray you all to bear me witness that I die a true Christian woman, and that I look to be saved by no other means except the mercy of God, and the merits of the blood of his only son Jesus Christ. I confess when I knew the word of God I neglected it, and loved myself and the world, and therefore this punishment is a just return for my sins. But I thank God of his goodness that he has given me a time and respite to repent. And now good people, while I am alive, I pray you assist me with your prayers."

Many fervent responses followed, and several of the by-standers imitated Jane's example, as on the conclusion of her speech, she fell upon her knees and recited the Miserere. At its close, Feckenham said in a loud voice, "I ask you, madam, for the last time, will you repent?"

"I pray you, sir, to desist," replied Jane, meekly. "I am now at peace with all the world, and would die so."

She then arose, and giving the prayer-book to Angela, said—"When all this is over, deliver this to the lieutenant. These," she added, taking off her gloves and collar, "I give to you."

"And to me," cried Manger, advancing and prostrating himself before her according to custom, "you give grace."

"And also my head," replied Jane. "I forgive thee heartily, fellow. Thou art my best friend."

"What ails you, madam?" remarked the lieutenant, observing Jane suddenly start and tremble.

"Not much," she replied, "but I thought I saw my husband pale and bleeding."

"Where?" demanded the lieutenant, recalling Dudley's speech.

"There, near the block," replied Jane. "I see the figure still. But it must be mere fantasy."

Whatever his thoughts were, the lieutenant made no reply; and Jane turned to Angela, who now began, with trembling hands, to remove her attire, and was trying to take off her velvet robe, when Manger offered to assist her, but was instantly repulsed.

He then withdrew, and stationing himself by the block, assumed his hideous black mask, and shouldered his axe.

Partially disrobed, Jane bowed her head while Angela tied a kerchief over her eyes, and turned her long tresses over her head to be out of the way. Unable to control herself, she then turned aside, and wept aloud. Jane moved forward in search of the block, but fearful of making a false step, felt for it with her hands, and cried—"What shall I do?—Where is it?—Where is it?"

Sir Thomas Brydges took her hand and guided her to it. At this awful moment, there was a slight movement in the crowd, some of whom pressed nearer the scaffold, and amongst others Sorrocolle and Wolfytt. The latter caught hold of the boards to obtain a better view. Angela placed her hands before her eyes, and would have suspended her being, if she could; and even Feckenham veiled his countenance with his robe. Sir Thomas Brydges gazed firmly on.

By this time, Jane had placed her head on the block, and her last words were, "Lord, into thy hand I commend my spirit!"

The axe then fell, and one of the fairest and wisest heads that ever sat on human shoulders fell likewise.

THUS ENDS THE CHRONICLE OF THE TOWER OF LONDON.

A HISTORICAL ROMANCE.

CHAPTER VII.—The Star-Chamber.

Viviana, as has already been intimated, after her capture at the house at Lambeth, was conveyed to the Star-Chamber. Here she was detained until a late hour on the following day, when she underwent a long and rigorous examination by certain members of the Privy Council, who were summoned for that purpose by the Earl of Salisbury. Throughout this arduous trial she maintained the utmost composure, and never for a single moment lost her firmness. On all occasions, her matchless beauty and dignity produced the strongest impression on the beholders; but on no occasion had they ever produced so strong an effect as the present. Her features were totally destitute of bloom, but their very paleness, contrasted as it was with her large dark eyes, which blazed with unwonted brilliancy, as well as with her jet-black hair, so far from detracting from her loveliness, appeared to add to it.

As she was brought before the Council, who were seated round a table, and remained standing at a short distance from them, guarded by Topcliffe and two halberdiers, a murmur of admiration pervaded the group; nor was this feeling lessened as the examination proceeded. Once, when the Earl of Salisbury adverted to the unworthy position in which she, the daughter of the proud and loyal Sir William Radcliffe, had placed herself, a shade passed over her brow, and a slight convulsion agitated her frame. But the next moment she recovered herself, and said,

"However circumstances may appear against me, and whatever opinion your lordships may entertain of my conduct, the King has not a more loyal subject than myself, nor have any of you made greater efforts to avert the danger by which he is threatened."

"Then you admit that his Majesty is in danger?" cried the Earl of Salisbury, eagerly.

"I admit nothing," replied Viviana. "But I affirm that I am his true and loyal subject."

"You cannot expect us to believe your assertion," replied the Earl, "unless you approve it by declaring all you know touching this conspiracy."

"I have already told you, my lord," she returned, "that my lips are sealed on that subject."

"You disclaim, then, all knowledge of a plot against the King's life, and against his government?" pursued Salisbury. Viviana shook her head.

"You refuse to give up the names of your companions, or to reveal their intentions?" continued the Earl.

"I do," she answered firmly.

"Your obstinacy will not save them," rejoined the Earl, in a severe tone, and after a brief pause. "Their names and their atrocious designs are known to us."

"If such be the case," replied Viviana, "why interrogate me on the subject?"

"Because—but it is needless to give a reason for the course which justice requires me to pursue," returned the Earl. "You are implicated in this plot, and nothing can save you from condign punishment but a frank and full confession."

"Nothing can save me, then, my lord," replied Viviana, "but Heaven knows I shall perish unjustly."

A consultation was then held by the lords of the Council, who whispered together for a few minutes. Viviana regarded them anxiously, but suffered no expression of uneasiness to escape her. As they again turned toward her, she saw from their looks, some of which exhibited great commiseration for her, that they had come to a decision (she could not doubt what!) respecting her fate. Her heart stopped beating, and she could scarcely support herself. Such, however, was the control she exercised over herself that, though filled with terror, her demeanor remained unaltered. She was not long kept in suspense. Fixing his searching gaze upon her, the Earl of Salisbury observed in a severe tone,

"Viviana Radcliffe, I ask you for the last time whether you will avow the truth?"

No answer was returned.

"I will not disguise from you," continued the Earl, "that your youth, your beauty, your constancy, and, above all, your apparent innocence, have deeply interested me, as well as the other noble persons here assembled to interrogate you, and who would willingly save you from the sufferings you will necessarily undergo, from a mistaken fidelity to the heinous traitors with whom you are so unhappily leagued. I would give you time to reflect, did I think the delay would answer any good purpose. I would remind you that no oath of secrecy, however solemn, can be binding in an unrighteous cause. I would tell you that your first duty is to your prince and governor, and that it is as great a crime, as unpardonable in the eyes of God as of man, to withhold the revelation of a conspiracy against the state, should it come to your knowledge, as to conspire against it yourself. I would lay all this before you. I would show you the magnitude of your offence, the danger in which you stand, and the utter impossibility of screening your companions, who ere long will be confronted with you—did I think it would avail. But, as you continue obstinate, justice must take its course."

"I am prepared for the worst, my lord," replied Viviana, humbly. "I thank your lordships for your consideration: but I take you all to witness that I profess the utmost loyalty and devotion for my sovereign, and that whatever may be my fate, those feelings will remain unchanged to the last."

"Your manner and your words are so sincere, that, were not your conduct at variance with them, they might convince us," returned the Earl. "As it is, even if we could credit your innocence, we are bound to act as if you were guilty. You will be committed to the Tower till his Majesty's pleasure is known. And I grieve to add, if you still continue obstinate, the severest measures will be resorted to to extract the truth from you."

As he concluded, he attached his signature to a warrant which was lying on the table, before him, and traced a few lines to Sir William Wead, lieutenant of the Tower.

This done, he handed the papers to Topcliffe, and waving his hand, Viviana was removed to the chamber in which she had been previously confined, and where she was detained under a strict guard, until Topcliffe, who had left her, returned to say that all was in readiness, and bidding her follow him, led the way to the river-side, where a wherry, manned by six rowers was waiting for them.

The night was profoundly dark, and, as none of the guard carried torches, their course was steered in perfect obscurity. But the rowers were too familiar with the river to require the guidance of light. Shooting the bridge in safety, and pausing for only a moment to give the signal of their approach to the sentinels on the ramparts, they passed swiftly under the low-browed arch of Traitor's Gate.

CHAPTER VIII.—The Jailor's Daughter.

As Viviana set foot on those fatal stairs, which so many have trod, and none without feeling that they took their first step toward the scaffold, she involuntarily shrank backward. But it was now too late to retreat; and she surrendered her hand to Topcliffe, who assisted her up the steps. Half-a-dozen men-at-arms, with a like number of wardens bearing torches, were present; and as it was necessary that Topcliffe should deliver his warrant into Sir William Wead's own hands, he committed his prisoner to the wardens, with instructions to them to take her to the guard-room near the By-ward Tower, while he proceeded to the lieutenant's lodgings.

It was the first time Viviana had beheld the terrible pile in which she was immured, though she was well acquainted with its history, and with the persecutions which many of the professors of her faith had endured within it during the recent reign of Elizabeth: and as the light of the torches flashed upon the grey walls of the Bloody Tower, and upon the adjoining ramparts, all the dreadful tales she had heard rushed to her recollection. But having recovered the first shock, the succeeding impressions were powerless in comparison, and she accompanied the wardens to the guard-room without expressing any outward emotion. Here a seat was offered her, and as the men considerably withdrew, she was able to pursue her reflections unmolested. They were sad enough, and it required all her firmness to support her.

When considering what was likely to befall her in consequence of her adherence to the fortunes of Fawkes and his companions, she had often pictured some dreadful situation like the present, but the reality far exceeded her worst anticipations. She had deemed herself equal to any emergency, but as she thought upon the dark menaces of the Earl of Salisbury, she felt it would require greater fortitude than she had hitherto displayed to bear her through her trial. Nor were her meditations entirely confined upon herself. While trembling for the perilous situation of Guy Fawkes, she reproached herself that she could not requite, even in thought, the passionate devotion of Humphrey Chetham.

"What matters it now," she thought, "that I cannot love him? I shall soon be nothing to him, or to any one. And yet I feel I have done him wrong, and that I should be happier if I could requite his attachment. But the die is cast. It is too late to repeat, or to retreat. My heart acquits me of having been influenced by any unworthy motive, and I will strive to endure the keenest pang without a murmur."

Shortly after this, Topcliffe returned with Sir William Wead. On their entrance, Viviana arose, and the lieutenant eyed her with some curiosity. He was a middle-aged man, tall, stoutly built, and having harsh features, stamped with an expression of mingled cunning and ferocity. His eyes had a fierce and bloodthirsty look, and were overshadowed by thick and scowling brows. Saluting the captive with affected courtesy, he observed,

"So you refuse to answer the interrogations of the Privy Council, madam, I understand. I am not sorry for it, because I would have the merit of wringing the truth from you. Those who have been most stubborn outside these walls, have been the most yielding within them."

"That will not be my case," replied Viviana, coldly.

"We shall see," returned the lieutenant, with a significant glance at Topcliffe.

Ordering her to follow him, he then proceeded along the ward in the direction of the Bloody Tower, and passing beneath its arched gateway, ascended the steps on the left and led her to his lodgings. Entering the habitation he mounted to the upper story, and tracking a long gallery, brought her to a small circular chamber in the Bell Tower. Its sole furniture was a chair, a table and a couch.

"Here you will remain for the present," observed the lieutenant, smiling grimly, and placing a lamp on the table. "It will depend upon yourself whether your accommodations are better hereafter."

With this, he quitted the cell with his attendants, and barred the door outside.

Left alone, Viviana, who had hitherto restrained her anguish, suffered it to find vent in tears. Never had she felt so utterly forlorn and desolate. All before her was threatening and terrible, full of dangers real and imaginary; nor could she look back upon her past career without something like remorse.

"Oh that Heaven would take me to itself!" she murmured, clasping her hands in an agony of distress, "for I feel unequal to my trials. Oh! that I had perished with my dear father! For what dreadful fate am I reserved?—Torture,—I will bear it, if I can. But death by the hands of the public executioner,—it is too horrible to think of! Is there no way of escape that?"

As this heinous thought occurred to her, she uttered a loud and prolonged scream, and fell senseless on the floor. When she recovered it was daylight; and, weak and exhausted, she crept to the couch, and throwing herself upon it, endeavored to forget her misery in sleep. But, as is usually the case with the afflicted, it fled her eyelids, and she passed several hours in the severest mental torture, unrelieved by a single cheering thought.

About the middle of the day, the door of the cell was opened by an old woman with a morose and forbidding countenance, attended by a younger female, who resembled her in all but the expression of her features, (her look was gentle and compassionate,) and who appeared to be her daughter.

Without paying any attention to Viviana, the old woman took a small loaf of bread and other provisions from a basket she had brought with her, and placed them on the table. This done, she was about to depart, when her daughter who had glanced uneasily at the couch, observed in a kindly tone,

"Shall we not inquire whether we can be of service to the poor young lady, mother?"

"Why should we concern ourselves about her, Ruth?" returned the old woman, sharply. "If she wants anything, she has a tongue, and can speak. If she desires further comforts," she added, in a significant tone, "they must be paid for."

"I desire nothing but death," groaned Viviana.

"The poor soul is dying, I believe," cried Ruth, rushing to the couch. "Have you no cordial-water about you, mother?"

"Truly have I," returned the old woman; "and I have other things besides. But I must be paid for them."

As she spoke, she drew from her pocket a small, square, Dutch-shaped bottle.

"Give it to me," cried Ruth, snatching it from her. "I am sure the young lady will pay for it."

"You are very kind," said Viviana, faintly. "But I have no means of doing so."

"I knew it!" cried the old woman, derisively. "If I and thy father, Jasper Ipgreve, had any such feeling, it would be high time for him to give up his post of jailer in the Tower of London. Pity for a poor prisoner! Thou a jailer's daughter, and talk so. I am ashamed of thee, wench. But I thought this was a rich Catholic heiress, and had powerful and wealthy friends."

"So she is," replied Ruth; "and though she may have no money with her now, she can command any amount she pleases. I heard Master Topcliffe tell young Nicholas Hardesty, the warder, so. She is the daughter of the late Sir William Radcliffe, of Ordsall Hall, in Lancashire, and sole heiress of his vast estates."

"Is it so, sweet lady?" inquired the old woman stepping toward the couch. "Are you truly Sir William Radcliffe's daughter?"

"I am," replied Viviana. "But I have said I require nothing from you. Leave me."

"No—no, dear young lady," rejoined Dame Ipgreve, in a whining tone, which was infinitely more disagreeable to Viviana than her previous harshness, "I cannot leave you in this state. Raise her head, Ruth, while I pour a few drops of the cordial down her throat."

"I will not taste it," replied Viviana, putting the flask aside.

"You will find it a sovereign restorative," replied Dame Ipgreve, with a mortified look; "but as you please. I will not urge you against your inclination. The provisions I have been obliged to bring you are too coarse for a daintily-nurtured maiden like you,—but you shall have others presently."

"It is needless," rejoined Viviana. "Pray leave me."

"Well, well, I am going," rejoined Dame Ipgreve, hesitating. "Do you want to write to any one? I can find means of conveying a letter secretly out of the Tower."

"Ah!" exclaimed Viviana, raising herself. "And yet no—no—I dare not trust you."

"You may," replied the avaricious old woman,—"provided you pay me well."

"I will think of it," returned Viviana. "But I have not strength to write now."

"You must not give way thus,—indeed, you must not, dear lady," said Ruth, in a voice of great kindness. "It will not be safe to leave you. Suffer me to remain with you."

"Willingly," replied Viviana; "most willingly."

"Stay with her, then, child," said Dame Ipgreve. "I will go and prepare a nourishing broth for her. Take heed and make a shrewd bargain with her for thy attendance," she added, in a hasty whisper, as she retired.

Greatly relieved by the old woman's departure, Viviana turned to Ruth, and thanked her in the warmest terms for her kindness. A few minutes sufficed to convert the sympathy which these two young persons evidently felt towards each other into affectionate regard, and the jailer's daughter assured Viviana, that so long as she should be detained, she would devote herself to her.

By this time, the old woman had returned with a mess of hot broth, which she carried with an air of great mystery beneath her cloak. Viviana was prevailed upon by the solicitations of Ruth to taste it, and found herself much revived in consequence. Her slight meal ended, Dame Ipgreve departed, with a promise to return in the evening with such viands as she could manage to introduce unobserved, and with a flask of wine.

"You will need it, sweet lady, I fear," she said; "for my husband tells me you are in peril of the torture. Oh! it is a sad thing, that such as you should be so cruelly dealt with! But we will take all the care of you we can. You will not forget to requite us. You must give me an order on your steward, or on some rich Catholic friend. I am half a Papist myself—that is, I like one religion as well as the other—and I like those best, whatever their creed may be, who pay best. That is my maxim. And it is the same with my husband. We do all we can to scrape together a penny for our child."

"No more of this, good mother," interrupted Ruth. "It distresses the lady. I will take care she wants nothing."

"Right, child, right," returned Dame Ipgreve;—"do not forget what I told you," she added in a whisper.

And she quitted the cell.

Ruth remained with Viviana during the rest of the day, and it was a great consolation to the latter to find that her companion was of the same faith as herself,—having been converted by Father Poole, a Romish priest who was confined in the Tower during the latter part of Elizabeth's reign, and whose sufferings and constancy for his religion had made a powerful impression on the jailer's daughter. As soon as Viviana ascertained this, she made Ruth, so far as she thought prudent, a confidante in her misfortunes, and after beguiling some hours in conversation, they both knelt down and offered up fervent prayers to the Virgin. Ruth then departed, promising to return in the evening with her mother.

Soon after it became dark, Dame Ipgreve and her daughter reappeared, the former carrying a lamp, and the latter a basket of provisions. Ruth's countenance was so troubled, that Viviana was certain that some fresh calamity was at hand.

"What is the matter?" she hastily demanded.

"Make your meal first, dear young lady," replied Dame

Ipgreve. "Our news might take away your appetite, and you will have to pay for your supper, whether you eat it or not."

"You alarm me greatly," cried Viviana, anxiously.

"What ill news do you bring?"

"I will not keep you longer in suspense, madam," said Ruth. "You are to be examined to-night by the Lieutenant and certain members of the Privy Council, and if you refuse to answer their questions, I lament to say you will be put to the torture."

"Heaven give me strength to endure it!" ejaculated Viviana, in a despairing tone.

"Eat, madam, eat," cried Dame Ipgreve, pressing the viands upon her. "You will never be able to go through with the examination, if you starve yourself in this way."

"Are you sure," inquired Viviana, appealing to Ruth, "that it will take place so soon?"

"Quite sure," replied Ruth. "My father has orders to attend the Lieutenant at midnight."

"Let me advise you to conceal nothing," insinuated the old woman. "They are determined to wring the truth from you—and they will do so."

"You are mistaken, good woman," replied Viviana, firmly. "I will die before I utter a word."

"You think so now," returned Dame Ipgreve, maliciously. "But the sight of the rack and the thumb-screws will alter your tone. At all events, support nature."

"No," replied Viviana; "as I do not desire to live, I will use no effort to sustain myself. They may kill me if they please."

"Misfortune has turned her brain," muttered the old woman. "I must take and secure my dues. Well, madam, if you will not eat the supper I have provided, it cannot be helped. I must find some one who will. You must pay for it all the same. My husband, Jasper Ipgreve, will be present at your interrogation, and I am sure, for my sake, he will use you as lightly as he can. Come, Ruth, you must not remain here longer."

"Oh, let her stay with me," implored Viviana. "I will make it well worth your while to grant me the indulgence."

"What will you give?" cried the old woman, eagerly.

"But no—no—I dare not leave her. The lieutenant may visit you, and find her, and then I should lose my place. Come along, Ruth. She shall attend you after the interrogation, madam. I shall be there myself."

"Farewell, madam," sobbed Ruth, who was almost drowned in tears. "Heaven grant you constancy to endure your trial!"

"Be ruled by me," said the old woman. "Speak out, and secure your own safety."

She would have continued in the same strain, but Ruth dragged her away. And casting a commiserating glance at Viviana, she closed the door.

The dreadful interval between their departure and midnight was passed by Viviana in fervent prayer. As she heard through the barred embrasure of her dungeon the deep strokes of the clock toll out the hour of twelve, the door opened, and a tall, gaunt personage, habited in a suit of rusty black, and with a large bunch of keys at his girdle, entered the cell.

"You are Jasper Ipgreve?" said Viviana, rising.

"Right," replied the jailer. "I am come to take you before the lieutenant and the council. Are you ready?"

Viviana replied in the affirmative, and Ipgreve, quitting the cell, outside which two other officials in sable habiliments were stationed, led the way down a short spiral staircase, which brought them to a narrow vaulted passage. Pursuing it for some time, the jailer halted before a strong door, cased with iron, and opening it, admitted the captive into a square chamber, the roof of which was supported by a heavy stone pillar, while its walls were garnished with implements of torture. At a table on the left sat the lieutenant and three other grave-looking personages. Across the lower end of the chamber a thick black curtain was stretched, hiding a deep recess; and behind it, as was evident from the glimmer that escaped from its folds, there was a light. Certain indistinct, but ominous sounds, issuing from the recess, proved that there were persons within it, and Viviana's quaking heart told her what was the nature of their proceedings.

She had ample time to survey this dismal apartment, and its occupants, for several minutes elapsed before a word was addressed to her by her interrogators, who continued to confer together in an undertone, as if unconscious of her presence. During this pause, broken only by the ominous sounds beforementioned, Viviana scanned the countenances of the group at the table, in the hope of discerning in them some glimpses of compassion; but they were inscrutable and inexorable, and scarcely less dreadful to look upon than the hideous implements on the walls.

Viviana wished the earth would open and swallow her, that she might escape from them. Anything was better than to be left at the mercy of such men. At certain times, and not unfrequently at the most awful moments, a double current of thought will flow through the brain, and at this frightful juncture it was so with Viviana. While shuddering at all she saw around her, nay, dwelling upon it, another and distinct train of thought led her back to former scenes of happiness, when she was undisturbed by any but remote apprehensions of danger. She thought of her tranquil residence at Ordsall,—of the flowers she had tended in the garden,—of her father, and of his affection for her,—of Humphrey Chetham, and of her early and scarce-acknowledged attachment to him,—and of his generosity and devotion, and how she had requited it. And then, like a sullen cloud darkening the fair prospect, arose the figure of Guy Fawkes—the sombre enthusiast—who had unwittingly exercised such a baneful influence upon her fortunes.

"Had he not crossed my path," she mentally ejaculated, "I might have been happy; might have loved Humphrey Chetham; might, perhaps have wedded him!"

These reflections were suddenly dispersed by the lieutenant, who in a stern tone commenced his interrogatories.

As upon her previous examination, Viviana observed the utmost caution, and either refused to speak, or answered such questions as only affected herself. At first, in spite of all her efforts, she trembled violently, and her tongue clove to the roof of her mouth. But after a while, she recovered her courage, and regarded the lieutenant with a look as determined as his own.

"It is useless to urge me farther," she concluded. "I have said all I will say."

"Is it your pleasure, my lord," observed Sir William Waad to the others, "to prolong the examination?"

His companions replied in the negative, and the one nearest to him remarked, "Is she aware what will follow?"

"I am," replied Viviana, resolutely, "and I am not to be intimidated."

Sir William Waad then made a sign to Ipgreve, who immediately stepped forward and seized her arm. "You will be taken to that recess," said the lieutenant, "where the question will be put to you. But as we shall remain here, you have only to utter a cry, if you are willing to avow the truth, and the torture shall be stayed. And it is our merciful hope that this may be the case."

Summoning up all her resolution, and walking with a firm foot-step, Viviana passed with Ipgreve behind the curtain. She there beheld two men and a woman; the latter was the jailer's wife, who instantly advanced to her, and besought her to confess.

"There is no help for it, if you refuse," she urged; "not all your wealth can save you."

"Mind your own business, dame," interposed Ipgreve, angrily, "and assist her to unrobe."

Saying this, he stepped aside with the two men, one of whom was the surgeon, and the other the tormentor, while Dame Ipgreve helped to take off Viviana's gown. She then tied a scarf over her shoulders, and informed her husband she was ready.

The recess was about twelve feet high, and ten wide. It was crossed near the roof, which was arched and vaulted, by a heavy beam, with pulleys and ropes at either extremity. But what chiefly attracted the unfortunate captive's attention was a couple of iron gauntlets attached to it, about a yard apart. Upon the ground under the beam, and immediately beneath that part of it where the gauntlets were fixed, were laid three pieces of wood of a few inches in thickness, and piled one upon another.

"What must I do?" inquired Viviana, in a hollow voice, but with unaltered resolution, of the old woman.

"Step upon those pieces of wood," replied dame Ipgreve, leading her towards them.

Viviana obeyed, and as soon as she had set foot upon the pile, the tormentor placed a joint-stool beside her, and mounting it, desired her to place her right hand in one of the gauntlets. She did so, and the tormentor then turned a screw, which compressed the iron glove so tightly as to give her excruciating pain. He then got down, and Ipgreve demanded if he should proceed.

A short pause ensued, but, notwithstanding her agony, Viviana made no answer. The tormentor then placed the stool on the left side, and fastened the hand which was still at liberty within the other gauntlet. The torture was dreadful—and the fingers appeared crushed by the pressure. Still Viviana uttered no cry. After another short pause Ipgreve said,

"You had better let us stop here. This is mere child's play compared with what is to come."

No answer being returned, the tormentor took a mallet and struck one of the pieces of wood from under Viviana's feet. The shock was dreadful, and seemed to dislocate her wrists, while the pressure on the hands was increased in a tenfold degree. The poor sufferer, who was resting on the points of her feet, felt that the removal of the next piece of wood would occasion almost intolerable torture. Her constancy, however, did not desert her; and, after the question had been repeated by Ipgreve, the second block was struck away. She was now suspended by her hands; and the pain was so exquisite, that nature gave way, and, uttering a piercing scream, she fainted.

On recovering, she found herself stretched upon a miserable pallet, with Ruth watching beside her. A glance round the chamber, which was of solid stone masonry, with a deep embrasure on one side, convinced her that she had been removed to some other prison.

"Where am I?" she asked, in a faint voice.

"In the Well Tower, madam," replied Ruth; "one of the fortifications near the moat, and now used as a prison-lodging. My father dwells within it, and you are under his custody."

"Your father," cried Viviana, shuddering as she recalled the sufferings she had recently undergone. "Will he torture me again?"

"Not if I can prevent it, dear lady," replied Ruth. "But hush! here comes my mother. Not a word before her."

As Ruth spoke, Dame Ipgreve, who had been lingering at the door, entered the room. She affected the greatest solicitude for Viviana—felt her pulse—looked at the bandages fastened round her swollen and crippled fingers, and concluded by counselling her not to persist in refusing to speak.

"I dare not tell you what tortures are in store for you," she said, "if you continue thus obstinate. But they will be a thousand times worse than what you endured last night."

"When will my next interrogation take place?" inquired Viviana.

"A week hence, it may be—or it may be sooner," returned the old woman. "It depends upon the state you are in—and somewhat upon the fees you give my husband—for he has a voice with the lieutenant."

"I would give him all I possess, if he could save me from further torture," cried Viviana.

"Alas! alas!" cried Dame Ipgreve, "you ask more than can be done. He would save you if he could. But you will not let him. However, we will do all we can to mitigate your sufferings—all we can—provided you pay us. Stay with her, child," she added, with a significant gesture to her daughter, as she quitted the room, "stay with her."

"My heart bleeds for you, madam," said Ruth, in accents of the deepest commiseration, as soon as they were alone. "You may depend upon my fidelity. If I can contrive your escape I will—at any risk to myself."

"On no account," replied Viviana. "Do not concern yourself about me more. My earthly sufferings, I feel, will have terminated before further cruelty can be practised upon me."

"Oh, say not so, madam," replied Ruth. "I hope—nay, I am sure you will live long and happily."

Viviana shook her head; and Ruth, finding her very Stay with her, child," she added, with a significant gesture to her daughter, as she quitted the room, "stay with her."

"My heart bleeds for you, madam," said Ruth, in accents of the deepest commiseration, as feeble, thought it better not to continue the conversation. She, accordingly, applied such restoratives as were at hand; and observing that the eyes of the sufferer closed as if in slumber, glided noiselessly out of the chamber, and left her.

In this way a week passed. At the expiration of that time, the surgeon pronounced her in so precarious a state, that if the torture were repeated, he would not answer for her life. The interrogation, therefore, was postponed for a few days, during which the surgeon constantly visited her; and by his care, and the restoratives she was compelled to take, she rapidly regained her strength.

One day, after the surgeon had departed, Ruth cautiously closed the door, and observed to her,

"You are now so far recovered, madam, as to be able to make an attempt to escape. I have devised a plan, which I will communicate to you to-morrow. It must not be delayed, or you will have to encounter a second and more dreadful examination."

"I will not attempt it if you are exposed to risk," replied Viviana.

"Heed me not," returned Ruth. "One of your friends has found out your place of confinement, and has spoken to me about you."

"What friend?" exclaimed Viviana, starting. "Gay Fawkes?—I mean." And she hesitated, while her pale cheeks were suffused with blushes.

"He is named Humphrey Chetham," returned Ruth. "Like myself, he would risk his life to preserve you."

"Tell him he must not do so," cried Viviana, eagerly. "He has done enough—too much for me already. I will not expose him to further hazard. Tell him so, and entreat him to abandon the attempt."

"But I shall not see him, dear lady," replied Ruth. "Besides, if I read him rightly, he is not likely to be turned aside by any selfish consideration."

"You are right, he is not," groaned Viviana. "But this only adds to my affliction. Oh! if you should see him, dear Ruth, try to dissuade him from his purpose."

"I will obey you, madam," replied the jailor's daughter. "But I am well assured it will be of no avail."

After some further conversation, Ruth retired, and Viviana was left alone for the night. Except the slumber procured by soporific potions, she had known no repose since she had been confined within the Tower; and this night she felt more than usually restless. After ineffectually endeavoring to compose herself, she arose, and hastily robing herself—a task she performed with no little difficulty, her fingers being almost useless—continued to pace her narrow chamber.

It has been mentioned that on one side of the cell there was a deep embrasure. It was terminated by a narrow and strongly-grated loop-hole, looking upon the moat. Pausing before it, Viviana gazed forth. The night was pitchy dark, and not even a solitary star could be discerned; but as she had no light in her chamber, the gloom outside was less profound than that within.

While standing thus, buried in thought, and longing for day-break, Viviana fancied she heard a slight sound as of some one swimming across the moat. Thinking she might be deceived, she listened more intently, and as the sound continued, she felt sure she was right in her conjecture. All at once the thought of Humphrey Chetham flashed upon her, and she had no doubt it must be he. Nor was she wrong. The next moment, a noise was heard as of some one clambering up the wall; a hand grasped the bars of the loop-hole, which was only two or three feet above the level of the water; and a low voice, which she instantly recognised, pronounced her name.

"Is it Humphrey Chetham?" she asked, advancing as near as she could to the loop-hole.

"It is," was the reply. "Do not despair. I will accomplish your liberation. I have passed three days within the Tower, and only ascertained your place of confinement a few hours ago. I have contrived a plan for your escape, with the jailor's daughter, which she will make known to you to-morrow."

"I cannot thank you sufficiently for your devotion," replied Viviana, in accents of the deepest gratitude. "But I implore you to leave me to my fate. I am wretched enough now, heaven knows, but if aught should happen to you, I shall be infinitely more so. If I possess any power over you—and that I do so, I well know—I entreat—nay, I command, you to desist from this attempt."

"I have never yet disobeyed you, Viviana," replied the young merchant, passionately—"nor will I do so now. But if you bid me abandon you, I will plunge into this moat, never to rise again."

His manner, notwithstanding the low tone in which he spoke, was so determined, that Viviana felt certain he would carry his threat into execution; she therefore rejoined in a mournful tone.

"Well, be it as you will. It is in vain to resist our fate. I am destined to bring misfortune to you."

"Not so," replied Chetham. "If I can save you, I would rather die than live. The jailor's daughter will explain her plan to you to-morrow. Promise me to accede to it."

Viviana reluctantly assented.

"I shall quit the Tower at daybreak," pursued Chetham; "and when you are once out of it, hasten to the stairs beyond the wharf at Petty Wales. I will be there with a boat. Farewell!"

As he spoke, he let himself drop into the water, but his foot slipping, the plunge was louder than he intended, and attracted the attention of a sentinel on the ramparts, who immediately called out to know what was the matter, and not receiving any answer, discharged his caliver in the direction of the sound.

Viviana, who heard the challenge and the shot, uttered a loud scream, and the next moment, Ipgreve and his wife appeared. The jailor glanced suspiciously round the room; but after satisfying himself that all was right, and putting some questions to the captive, which she refused to answer, he departed with his wife, and carefully barred the door.

It is impossible to imagine greater misery than Viviana endured the whole of the night. The uncertainty in which she was kept as to Chetham's fate was almost insupportable, and the bodily pain she had recently endured appeared light when compared with her present mental torture.

Day at length dawned. But it brought with it no Ruth. Instead of this faithful friend, Dame Ipgreve entered the chamber with the morning meal, and her looks were so morose and distrustful, that Viviana feared she must have discovered her daughter's design. She did not, however, venture to make a remark, but suffered the old woman to depart in silence.

Giving up all for lost, and concluding that Humphrey Chetham had either perished, or was, like herself, a prisoner, Viviana bitterly bewailed his fate, and reproached herself with being unintentionally the cause of it. Later in the day, Ruth entered the cell. To Viviana's eager inquiries she replied, that Humphrey Chetham had escaped. Owing to the darkness, the sentinel had missed his aim, and although the most rigorous search was instituted throughout the fortress, he had contrived to elude observation.

"Our attempt," pursued Ruth, "must be made this evening. The lieutenant has informed my father that you are to be interrogated at midnight, the surgeon having declared that you are sufficiently recovered to undergo the torture (if needful) a second time. Now listen to me. The occurrence of last night has made my mother suspicious, and she watches my proceedings with a jealous eye. She is at this moment with a female prisoner in the Beauchamp Tower, or I should not be able to visit you. She consented, however, to let me bring in your supper. You must then change dresses with me. Being about my height, you may easily pass for me, and I will take care there is no light below, so that your features will not be distinguished."

Viviana would have checked her, but the other would not be interrupted.

"As soon as you are ready," she continued, "you must lock the door upon me. You must then descend the short flight of steps before you, and pass as quickly as you can through the room where you will see my father and mother. As soon as you are out of the door, turn to the left, and go straight forward to the By-ward Tower. Show this pass to the warders. It is made out in my name, and they will suffer you to go forth. Do the same with the warders at the next gate,—the Middle Tower,—and again at the Bulwark-Gate. That passed, you are free."

"And what will become of you?" asked Viviana, with a bewildered look.

"Never mind me," rejoined Ruth: "I shall be sufficiently rewarded if I save you. And now, farewell. Be ready at the time appointed."

"I cannot consent," rejoined Viviana.

"You have no choice," replied Ruth, breaking from her, and hurrying out of the room.

Time, as it ever does, when expectation is on the rack, appeared to pass with unusual slowness. But as the hour at length drew near, Viviana wished it farther off. It was with the utmost trepidation that she heard the key turn in the lock, and beheld Ruth enter the cell with the evening meal.

Closing the door, and setting the provisions, the jailor's daughter hastily divested herself of her dress, which was of brown serge, as well as of her coil and kerchief, while Viviana imitated her example. Without pausing to attire herself in the other's garments, Ruth then assisted Viviana to put on her dress she had just laid aside, and arranged her hair and the head-gear so skillfully, that the disguise was complete.

Hastily whispering some further instructions to her, and explaining certain peculiarities in her gait and deportment, she then pressed her to her bosom, and led her to the door. Viviana would have remonstrated, but Ruth pushed her through it, and closed it.

There was now no help, so Viviana, though with great pain to herself, contrived to turn the key in the lock. Descending the steps, she found herself in a small circular chamber, in which Ipgreve and his wife were seated at a table, discussing their evening meal. The sole light was afforded by a few dying embers on the hearth.

"What, has she done already?" demanded the old woman, as Viviana appeared. "Why hast thou not brought the jelly with thee, if she has not eaten it all, and those cakes, which Master Pilchard, the surgeon, ordered her. Go and fetch them directly. They will finish our repast daintily; and there are other matters too, which I dare say she has not touched. She will pay for them that will make them the sweeter. Go back, I say. What dost thou stand there for, as if thou wert thunderstruck? Dost hear me, or not?"

"Let the wench alone, dame," growled Ipgreve. "You frighten her."

"So I mean to do," replied the old woman, "she deserves to be frightened. Hark thee, girl, we must get an order from her on some wealthy Catholic family without delay—for I don't think she will stand the trial to-night."

"Nor I," added Ipgreve, "especially as she is to be placed on the rack."

"She has a chain of gold round her throat I have observed," said the old woman; "we must get that."

"I have it," said Viviana, in a low tone, and imitating as well as she could the accents of Ruth. "Here it is."

"Did she give it thee?" cried the old woman, getting up, and grasping Viviana's lacerated fingers with such force, that she had difficulty in repressing a scream. "Did she give it thee, I say?"

"She gave it me for you," gasped Viviana. "Take it."

While the old woman held the chain to the fire, and called to her husband to light a lamp, that she might feast her greedy eyes upon it, Viviana flew to the door.

Just as she reached it, the shrill voice of Dame Ipgreve arrested her.

"Come back!" cried the dame. "Whither art thou going at this time of night? I will not have thee stir forth. Come back, I say."

"Fshaw! let her go," interposed Ipgreve. "I dare say she hath an appointment on the Green with young Nicholas Hardesty, the warder. Go, wench. Be careful of thyself, and return within the hour."

"If she does not, she will rue it," added the dame. "Go, then, and I will see the prisoner."

Viviana required no further permission. Starting off, as she had been directed, on the left, she ran as fast as her feet could carry her; and, passing between the two arched gateways, soon reached the By-ward Tower. Showing the pass to the warder, he chucked her under the chin, and, drawing an immense bolt, opened the wicket, and gallantly helped her to pass through it. The like good success attended her at the Middle Tower, and at the Bulwark Gate. Scarcely able to credit her senses, and doubting whether she was indeed free, she hurried on till she came to the opening leading to the stairs at Petty Wales. As she hesitated, uncertain what to do, a man advanced towards and addressed her by name. It was Humphrey Chetham. Overcome by emotion, Viviana sank into his arms, and in another moment she was placed in a wherry, which was ordered to be rowed towards Westminster.

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

"I am afraid, my dear friend," said the Doctor, "that there is a painful but interesting scene awaiting you. You will not, I am sure, forbear to gratify, by your momentary presence in the servants' hall, a body of your tenantry, who are there assembled, having come to pay you their parting respects."

"I would really rather be spared the painful scene," said Mr. Aubrey, with emotion, "I am unnerved as it is! Cannot you bid them adieu, in my name, and say, God bless them!"

"You must come, my dear friend! It will be but for a moment. If it be painful, it will be but for a moment; and the recollection of their hearty and humble expressions of affection and respect will be pleasant hereafter. Poor souls!" he added, with not a little emotion; "you should see how crowded in Mr. Griffiths' room with the presents they have each brought you, and which would surely keep your whole establishment for months! Cheeses, tongues, hams, bacon, and I know not what beside!"

"Come, Doctor," said Mr. Aubrey, quickly, "I will see them, my humble and worthy friends, if it be for but a moment; but I would rather have been spared the scene." He followed Dr. Tatham into the large servants' hall, which he found nearly filled by some forty or fifty of his late tenantry, who, as he entered, rose in troubled silence to receive him. There were lights, by which a hurried glance sufficed to show him the deep sorrow visible in their countenances. "Well, sir," commenced one of them after a moment's hesitation—he seemed to have been chosen the spokesman of those present—"we've come to tak' our leave; and a sad time it be for all of us, and it may be, sir, for you." He paused—"I thought I could have said a word or two, sir, in the name of all of us, but I've clean forgotten all; and I wish we could all forget that we were come to part with you, sir—but we shan't—no, never!—we shall never see your like again, sir! God help you, sir!" Again he paused, and struggled hard to conceal his emotions. Then he tried to say something further, but his voice failed him.

"Squire, it may be law; but it be not justice, we all do think, that hath taken Yaston from you, that was born to it," said one, who stood next to him that had first spoke. "Who ever heard of a scratch in a bit of paper signifying the loss of so much? It never were heard of afore, sir, an' cannot be right."

"Forgive me, Squire," said another, "but we shall never take to t' new one that's coming after you!"

"My worthy—my dear friends," commenced Mr. Aubrey, with melancholy composure, as he stood beside Dr. Tatham, "this is a sad scene—one which I had not expected. I am quite unprepared for it. I have had lately to go through many very painful scenes; few more so than the present. My dear friends, I can only say from my heart, God bless you all! I shall never forget you, whom I have always respected, and indeed been very proud of, as my tenantry, and whom I now look at as my friends only. We shall never forget you!"

"Lord Almighty bless you, sir, and Madam, and Miss, and the little squire!" said a voice, in a vehement manner, from amidst the little throng, in tones that went to Mr. Aubrey's heart. His lips quivered, and he ceased speaking for some moments. At length he resumed:

"You see my feelings are a little shaken by the sufferings I have gone through. I have only a word more to say to you. Providence has seen fit, my friends, to deprive me of that which I had deemed to be my birthright. God is good and wise; and I bow, as we must all bow, to His will, with reverence and resignation. And also, my dear friends, let us always submit cheerfully to the laws under which we live. We must not quarrel with their decision, merely because it happens to be adverse to our own wishes. I, from my heart—and so must you, from yours—acknowledge a firm, unshaken allegiance to the laws; they are ordained by God, and He demands our obedience to them!" He paused. "I have to thank you," he presently added, in a subdued tone, "my worthy friends, for many substantial tokens of your goodwill which you have brought with you this evening. I assure you sincerely, that I value them far more"—he paused, and it was some moments before he could proceed—"than if they had been of the most costly kind."

"Lord, only hearken to t' Squire!" called out a voice, as if on an impulse of eager affection, which its rough, honest speaker could not resist. This seemed entirely to deprive Mr. Aubrey of the power of utterance, and he turned suddenly towards Dr. Tatham with an overflowing eye and a convulsive quivering of the lips, that showed the powerful emotions with which he was contending. The next moment he stepped forward and shook hands with those nearest. He was quickly surrounded, and every one present grasped his hands, scarcely any of them able to utter more than a brief but ardent "God bless you, sir!"

"I am sure, my friends," said Dr. Tatham, almost as much affected as any of them, "that you cannot wish to prolong so affecting, so distressing a scene. Mr. Aubrey is much exhausted, and has a long journey to take early in the morning—and you had better now leave."

"Farewell! farewell, my kind and dear friends, farewell! May God bless you all, and all your families!" said

Mr. Aubrey, and, most powerfully affected, withdrew from a scene which he was not likely ever to forget. He retired, accompanied by Dr. Tatham, to his library, where Mr. Griffiths, his steward, was in readiness to receive his signature to various documents. This done, the steward, after a few hurried expressions of affection and respect, withdrew; and Mr. Aubrey had completed all the arrangements and transacted all the business which had required his attention before quitting Yatton, which, at an early hour in the morning, he was going to leave, and go direct to London, instead of accepting any of the numerous offers which he had received from his friends in the neighborhood to take up with them his abode for, at all events, some considerable period. That, however, would have been entirely inconsistent with the plans for his future life, which he had formed and matured. He left the whole estate in admirable order and condition. There was not a farm vacant, not a tenant dissatisfied with the terms under which he held. Every document, all the accounts connected with the estate, after having been carefully examined by Mr. Parkinson, and Mr. Aubrey, and Mr. Griffiths, was in readiness for the most scrupulous and searching investigation on the part of Mr. Aubrey's successor and his agents.

Mr. Aubrey's library was already carefully packed up, and was to follow him, on the ensuing day, to London, by water; as also were several portions of the furniture—the residue of which was to be sold off within a day or two's time. How difficult—how very difficult had it been for them to choose which articles they would part with, and which retain! The favorite old high-backed easy chair, which had been worked by Miss Aubrey herself; the beautiful ebony cabinet, which had been given by her father to her mother, who had given it to Kate: the little chairs of Charles and Agnes—and in which Mr. Aubrey and Kate, and all their brothers and sisters, had sat when children; Mrs. Aubrey's piano; these, and a few other articles, had been successfully pleaded for by Mrs. Aubrey and Kate, and were to accompany, or rather follow, them to London, instead of passing, by the auctioneer's hammer, into the hands of strangers. The two old carriage-horses, which had drawn old Mrs. Aubrey in the family coach for many years, were to be turned to grass for the rest of their days at Lady Stratton's. Poor old Peggy was, in like manner, to have to herself a little field belonging to Dr. Tatham. Little Charles's pony, a beautiful animal, and most reluctantly parted with, was sent as a present in his name, to Sir Harry Oldfield, one of his play-fellows. Hector, the magnificent Newfoundland dog, was, at the vehement instance of Pumpkin, the gardener, who almost went on his knees to beg for the animal, and declared that he loved the creature like a son—as I verily believe he did, for they were inseparable, and their attachment was mutual—given up to him, on his solemn promise to take great care of him. Then there was a poor animal that they hardly knew how to dispose of. It was a fine old favorite stag-hound, stone-blind, quite grey about the head, and so very feeble, that it could but just crawl in and out of its commodious kennel, and lie basking in the genial sunshine; wagging its tail when any one spoke to it, and affectionately licking the hand that patted it. Thus had it treated Mr. Aubrey that very morning as he stood by, and stooped down to caress it for the last time. It was, at his earnest request, assigned to Dr. Tatham, kennel and all; indeed the worthy little Doctor would have filled his premises in a similar way, by way of having "keepsakes" and "memorials" of his friends. Miss Aubrey's beautiful little Marlborough spaniel, with its brilliant black eyes, and long glossy graceful ears, was to accompany her to London.

As for the servants—the house-keeper and the butler were going to marry and quit service; as for the rest, Mr. Parkinson had, at Mr. Aubrey's desire, written about them to Messrs Quirk, Gammon and Saap; and Mr. Gammon had sent word that such of the establishment as chose might continue at Yatton, at all events till the pleasure of Mr. Titmouse upon the subject should have been known. All the servants had received a quarter's wages that morning from Mr. Griffiths, in the presence of Mr. Aubrey, who spoke kindly to each, and earnestly recommended them to conduct themselves respectfully toward his successor. Scarce any of them could answer him, otherwise than by a humbler bow or curtsy, accompanied by sobs and tears. One of them did contrive to speak, and passionately expressed a wish that the first morsel Mr. Titmouse eat in the house might choke him—a sally which received so very grave and stern a rebuke from Mr. Aubrey, as brought the hasty offender to her knees begging forgiveness, which I need hardly say, she received, with a very kind admonition. Many of them most vehemently entreated to be allowed to accompany Mr. Aubrey and his family to London, and continue in their service, but in vain. Mr. Aubrey had made his selection, having taken only his own valet, and Mrs. Aubrey's maid, and one of the nursery-maids, and declaring that on no consideration would he think of being accompanied by any other of the servants.

There were some twenty or thirty poor old cottagers, men and women, who had been for years weekly pensioners on the bounty of Yatton, and respecting whom Mr. Aubrey felt a painful anxiety. What could he do? He gave the sum of £100 to Dr. Tatham for their use; and requested him to press their claims earnestly upon the new proprietor of Yatton. He also wrote almost as many letters as there were of these poor people, on their behalf, to his friends and neighbors. Oh, it was a moving scene that occurred at each of their little cottages, when their benefactors, Mr. Aubrey, his wife, and sister, severally called to bid them farewell, and receive their humble and tearful blessings! But it was the parting with her school, which neither she nor her brother saw any probability of being kept up longer than for a month or two after their departure, that occasioned Kate the greatest distress. There were several reasons why no application should be made about the matter from her, or on her account, to Mr. Titmouse, even if she had not had reason to anticipate, from what she had heard of his character, that he was not a person to feel any interest in such an institution. Nor had she liked to trouble or burden the friends she left behind her, with the responsibility of supporting and superintending her little establishment. She had nothing for it, therefore, but to prepare the mistress and her scholars for the breaking up of the school, within a month of her departure from Yatton.

She gave the worthy woman, the mistress, a present of a five-pound note, and five shillings a-piece to each of the children. She felt quite unequal to the task of personally taking leave of them, as she had intended, and several times attempted. She, therefore, with many tears, wrote the following lines, and gave them to Dr. Tatham, to read aloud in the school, when their good and beautiful writer should be far on her way toward London. The little Doctor paused a good many times while he read it, and complained of his glasses.

"My dear little girls—You know that I have already bid each of you good-by; and though I tried to say something to all of you at once, I was not able, because I was so sorry to part with you, and tell you that my little school must be given up. So I have written these few lines, to tell you that I love you all, and have tried to be a good friend to you. Be sure not to forget your spelling and reading, and your needle. Your mothers have promised to hear you say your catechisms; you must also be sure to say your prayers, and to read your Bibles, and to behave very seriously at church, and to be always dutiful to your parents. Then God will bless you all. I hope you will not forget us, for we shall often think of you when we are a great way off; and Dr. Tatham will now and then write and tell us how you are going on. Farewell, my dear little girls; and may God bless and preserve you all! This is the prayer of both of us—Mrs. Aubrey and

CATHARINE AUBREY.

Yatton, 15th May, 18—

The above was not written in the uniform and beautiful hand usual with Miss Aubrey; it was, on the contrary, rather irregular, and evidently written hastily; but Dr. Tatham preserved it to the day of his death, and always thought it beautiful.

On the ensuing morning, at a very early hour, Dr. Tatham left the vicarage, to pay his last visit to friends whom it almost broke his heart to part with, in all human probability, for ever. He started, but on a moment's reflection ceased to be surprised, at the sight of Mr. Aubrey approaching him, from the direction of the little churchyard. He was calm, but his countenance bore the traces of very recent emotion. They greeted each other in silence, and so walked on for some time, arm in arm, slowly toward the hall. It was a dull heavy morning, almost threatening rain. The air seemed full of oppression. The only sounds audible were the hoarse clamorous sounds issuing from the old rookery, at some distance on the left. They interchanged but few words as they walked along the winding pathway to the hall. The first thing that attracted their eyes on passing under the gateway, was the large old family carriage standing opposite the hall-door, where stood some luggage, sufficient for the journey, ready to be placed upon it: the remainder having been sent on the day before to London. They were all up and dressed. The children were taking their last breakfast in the nursery; Charles making many inquiries of the weeping servants, which they could answer only by tears and kisses. In vain was the breakfast-table spread for the senior travellers. There sat poor Kate, in travelling trim, before the antique silver urn, attempting to perform, with trembling hand, her accustomed office; but neither she nor Mrs. Aubrey were equal to the task; which, summoning the housekeeper into the room, they devolved upon her, and which she performed in perturbed silence. Mr. Aubrey and Dr. Tatham were standing there; but neither of them spoke. A short time before, Mr. Aubrey had requested the servants to be summoned, as usual, to morning prayer, in the accustomed room, and requested Dr. Tatham to officiate. As soon, however, as the sorrowful little assemblage was collected before him, he whispered to Mr. Aubrey that he felt unequal to go through the duty with the composure it require; and after a pause, he said, "Let us kneel down;" and in a low voice, often interrupted by his own emotions, and the sobs of those around him, he read, with touching simplicity and solemnity, the ninety-first psalm; adding the Lord's prayer, and a benediction.

The bitter preparations for starting at an early hour, seven o'clock, were soon afterward completed. Half smothered with the kisses and caresses of the affectionate servants, little Charles and Agnes were already seated in the carriage, on the laps of their two attendants, exclaiming, "Come, papa! come, mamma! the horses are ready to start!" Just then, poor Pumpkin the gardener, scarce able to speak, made his appearance, his arms full of nosegays, which he had been cutting for the last two hours—having one a-piece for every one of the travellers, servants, and children, and all. The loud angry bark of Hector was heard from time to time, little Charles calling loudly for him; but Pumpkin had fastened him up for fear of his starting off, after the carriage. At length, scarce having tasted breakfast, the travellers made their appearance at the hall door. Kate and Mrs. Aubrey were utterly overcome at the sight of the carriage, and wept bitterly. They threw their arms passionately around, and kissed their amiable friend and pastor, Dr. Tatham, who was but little less agitated than themselves. Then they tore themselves from him, and hastily got into the carriage. As he stood alone, bareheaded, on their quitting him, he lifted his hands, but could scarce utter a parting benediction. Mr. Aubrey, with a flushed cheek and quivering lip, then grasped his hand, whispering, "Farewell, my dear and venerable friend! Farewell!"

"The Lord God of thy fathers bless thee!" murmured Dr. Tatham, clasping Mr. Aubrey's hand in both of his own, and looking solemnly upward. Mr. Aubrey, taking off his hat, turned toward him an unutterable look, then waving his hand to the group of agitated servants that stood within and without the door, he stepped into the carriage; the door was shut; and they rolled slowly away. Outside the park gates were collected more than a hundred people, to bid them farewell—all the men, when the carriage came in sight, taking off their hats. The carriage stopped for a moment. "God bless you all! God bless you!" exclaimed Mr. Aubrey, waving his hand, while from each window was extended the white hand of Kate and Mrs. Aubrey, which was fervently kissed and shaken by those who were nearest. Again the carriage moved on; and, quickening their speed, the horses soon bore them out of the village. Within less than half an hour afterward, the tearful eyes of the travellers, as they passed a familiar turning of the road, had looked their last on Yatton!

STANLEY THORN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'VALENTINE VOX.'

CHAP. XXXII.—Stanley's Introduction to the House of Commons.

Being anxious to take his seat as soon as possible, Stanley prepared to return to town the following day. Amelia earnestly begged to be allowed to accompany him. She assured him that, notwithstanding the fatigue she had undergone, she was perfectly well able to bear the journey; and with feelings of the deepest affection portrayed the delight she should derive from merely going down to the House with him in the carriage, to see him enter for the first time that which she conceived to be the theatre of his glory. Stanley, however, contended for the imprudence of such a course, and came up with Sir William alone.

Having performed the distance with great expedition, they had an early dinner, and then went at once to the house. Sir William had previously explained how slight was the ceremony which had to be performed; still Stanley, as he entered, felt tremulous, and could not help wishing that the process of introduction had been ever. With the exception, however, of being extremely pale, he appeared self-possessed, and after having been presented, took the oaths prescribed, and was greeted with loud cheers on taking his seat.

The House and its forms were quite new to him: he had never been previously, even as a "stranger," within its walls, and it must be confessed that his first impression was not of the most favorable character. He felt disappointed. The scene failed altogether to realize his anticipations; indeed, as he watched the preliminary proceedings, he could not but deem them in the last degree absurd. Petitions were presented, and when their titles had been proclaimed they were thrust without any ceremony under the table. Bills were read for the third time, nominally—bills of great importance, affecting the interests of millions—and passed as if they were valueless; for they were utterly disregarded by the members generally, who appeared to be determined to uphold the reputation of the House as a deliberative assembly, by deliberating in knots upon matters of a purely private nature.

"Order!—order!" exclaimed the Speaker, whenever the buzz became in his judgment rather too loud; and as a matter of courtesy, on all such occasions, it was for a moment subdued; but it swelled again gradually until it resembled that murmur which floats upon the air of a well-conducted national school, when the Speaker again cried, "Order!—order!" in a tone of great beauty and depth.

"Well," said Sir William, who sat next to Stanley, "how do you feel in your new position?"

"Disappointed," replied Stanley.

"Why, what did you expect?"

"More dignity, more solemnity, more attention on the part of the members instead of this levity and noise. It seems to me to be rather an odd way of conducting the business of the nation."

Sir William smiled, and having observed that the business had not yet commenced in reality, told him to suspend his judgement till after the debate.

When the third reading of bills, the presentation of petitions, and a variety of other little unimportant matters had been disposed of, an honorable member rose to open a subject which led to a long and animated discussion, during which an immense amount of bitterness was displayed and applauded far more loudly than anything which absolutely bore upon the question at issue.

To Stanley it appeared that senators and actors, were equally enamored of applause; that the vilest characteristics of both were strengthened and confirmed by the cheers which they elicited; and that, as upon the stage, rant and unnatural acting were certain to strike those who had the strongest lungs, so in the House, personalities and senseless rancor—so perfectly did they meet party views—were hailed with rapture by the superficial satellites of faction, to the utter discouragement of natural eloquence, useful discussion, and sound, sober sense.

Of course Stanley never intended to be a silent member; he had resolved from the first to make himself conspicuous by taking an active part in the debates, in the full conviction that by getting well up in his subjects, he must of necessity succeed, and that signally, seeing that he intended to introduce a new style of eloquence which would be at once natural, forcible, and suasive. The debate of that evening, instead of shaking this high resolution, had the direct effect of rendering it more firm; it excited his ambition in a greater degree than ever; he had no apprehension, he saw nothing to fear; he thought of nothing—dreamt of nothing, but speaking. He had the highest possible confidence in his own oratorical powers; he felt that he had game in his own hands, and being then in a position to distinguish himself, he determined on making the most of that position; to study deeply, and to prepare to take the country by storm.

In the mean time, those whom he had left with his honored constituents to settle the expenses of his election, were favored from morning till night with demands of the most ingenious and extraordinary character. Butchers, bakers, drapers, poulterers, tailors, iron-mongers, haberdashers, blacksmiths, weavers, farriers, saddlers, tallow-chandlers, fruiterers, post-masters, printers; in short, bills were hourly lavished upon them by respectable members of almost every trade, and the honor which under those peculiar circumstances actuates tradesmen in the aggregate, is, in general, not only conspicuous but amazing.

The victuallers, however, were collectively the most aristocratic in their claims. Each assumed that he had a carte blanche, and felt strongly that in justice to himself, he ought, in filling it up, to have the highest regard to his own interest. The quantity of beer stated to have been consumed exceeded, by several thousand gallons, the entire stock of the town; and had the charges for spirituous liquors been submitted to the exciseman, it would have tended to convince him that both smuggling and private distillation had been carried on to an alarming extent under his very nose.

As many of the claims sent in were of a palpably gross and flagrant character, the chairman of the committee—notwithstanding the widow's desire that all demands should be satisfied—raised them on the ground of their being monstrous. He was willing to satisfy all just claims; he was willing to meet the demands, however exorbitant, of all who had the slightest foundation to rest their demands upon; but he refused to pay those who could have rendered no service, and by whom nothing could have been supplied.

The immediate consequence of this refusal was a meeting of the malcontents, at which it was unanimously resolved that such resistance to those undoubted rights and privileges, which they and their forefathers generally had enjoyed by prescription from time immemorial, was unconstitutional and rotten; that the claims they had sent in were customary, and therefore correct; and that from these premises it resulted that they were bound, in strict justice to their wives and families, to call into action all the energies of which they were capable for the legitimate purpose of "trying it on."

Having carried this strong resolution namine contradicente, they had glasses round with the view of polishing their brass, and then proceeded in a body to enforce their claims.

On entering the room in which the chairman of the committee and his secretary were on the point of winding up the affairs, Mr. Bouncewell—who, being a highly respectable man in his way, had been appointed spokesman-general on this occasion—said, with the air of a man conscious of the purity of his motives,

"We've come agin' about them there little accounts of ourn: question is, do you mean to settle 'em, or don't you?"

His colleagues, by whom he was backed, highly approved of this question, and winked and nodded with the view of intimating to each other that in their judgement that was the point.

"Gentleman," said the chairman, with great calmness, in reply, "I must say that I am somewhat astonished, after what transpired when you did me the honor—"

"We don't want no flummery here," said Mr. Bouncewell, with great impatience. "We didn't come here to have any long speeches; we aint to be done in that there way; we came here expressly to give you another chance of settling them there little bills without any more bother; so all you've got to do is to say in a word, you know, whether you'll pay us or not."

"If I thought for a moment that your demands were just, gentlemen, I would do so without hesitation; but as I feel quite certain that you have no real claim, I must beg, as before, to decline."

"Then we'll law you!" exclaimed Mr. Bouncewell; and his friends with an expression of ferocity cried, "Ay! and you shall have lots on it!"

"The law is open to you, gentlemen," rejoined the chairman, with great suavity; "you must use your own discretion."

"We'll smother you with actions sir!" cried Mr. Bouncewell. "We ain't a-going to be robbed, don't suppose it! Do you think you've got hold of a pack of fools? Do you think we're a-going to give away our substance for nothing? If you do, you was never in your life more mistaken. A pretty thing, indeed!" he added, turning to his companions, who pouted and frowned with due significance, "a very pretty thing! Here! a lot of respectable tradesmen, here, swindled out of their substance, and they can't get paid! Did you ever in your born days hear of such a thing?"

"Shame!—Shame!" cried his colleagues, with deep indignation, for they felt altogether disgusted. "It's scandalous!—that it is—scandalous!"

"You may think so, gentleman," said the chairman, with a politeness which was really very provoking; "but upon my honor I cannot agree with you."

"You can't!" said Mr. Bouncewell, sarcastically. "You see nothing shameful in plundering industrious, honest, hard-working tradesmen,—eh, don't you? But what's the use of talking! You don't mean to settle with us?—that 's to be understood!"

"Certainly."

"Then I'll tell you what it is: we'll just go and blow up the whole affair! We'll serve you out in that way. The other side wants information—we'll give it!—we'll tell all we know!"

"We just will!" cried his friends.

"We'll come forward as witnesses. We know enough to upset the election! We'll learn you how to be shabby! Do you think that'll answer your purpose?"

"Gentlemen," said the chairman, "you will pursue that course which you deem most correct. I have only to repeat that I cannot and will not entertain your claims."

Mr. Bouncewell then started a groan, which his associates responded to deeply; and when this had been accomplished to their entire satisfaction, each gave full expression to his sentiments on the subject, and with a look of ineffable contempt left the room.

As this was the last application, the accounts were immediately closed, and as everything had been charged extremely reasonable considering, the sum total amounted to thirty thousand pounds.

This, however, utterly failed to alarm the widow. She would not suffer herself to think of the largeness of the sum. It was sufficient for her to feel that it had all been expended for the purpose of raising her Stanley to distinction; and to achieve that object she could have borne to be reduced to comparative beggary herself. It was therefore with unalloyed pleasure that, when all had been arranged, she bade adieu to that place of which her Stanley was then the representative in Parliament, albeit she knew that Swansdown and his agents were displaying still the utmost zeal.

CHAPTER XXXIII....In which the venerable gentleman appears to be caught at last.

On the arrival of the family in town, excitement was supplanted by deep and tranquil joy. The soul of Stanley had been fired with ambition. He studied zealously, and attended the House night after night; but, although his return home invariably fluctuated between three and four in the morning, Amelia never felt solitary, never felt dull: for she knew or believed,—which had precisely the same effect,—that the absence of her Stanley was essential to his success as a statesman, and was happy in the portrayal of the flattering details of a brilliant and glorious career.

Now, it happened that, in proportion as the intimacy between Amelia and Miss Johnson became closer and more affectionate, the friendship subsisting between Bob and his venerable friend,—both of whom had been handsomely rewarded for their exertions during the contest,—became warmer and more firm. They never appeared to be perfectly comfortable apart: they saw and drank with each other every day with the strict regularity of the sun; and the venerable gentleman met with so much kind feeling, and withal such distinguished consideration in Stanley's kitchen, that almost every evening he called with the view of playing at the noble game of cribbage with Bob.

It frequently, however, happened that Bob was absent with his master; and on all such occasions the venerable gentleman had a game with Joanna the cook, and really experienced so much genuine lady-like conduct at her hands, that, instead of regretting Bob's absence, as at first, he began to like it rather than not.

The gentle Joanna had heard much of the venerable gentleman from Bob. She had heard much of his high-toned, gentleman-like bearing, of his honorable and strictly virtuous principles, of his brilliant conversational qualities, and of the general generosity of his heart. She had, moreover, heard that he possessed some considerable property, which, in her gentle judgment, imparted an additional lustre to the whole. She had, therefore, been powerfully prepossessed in his favor before she had the honor of an introduction: and his conduct in her presence was so perfectly correct, that she felt a strong conviction that the high and noble qualities of his heart and mind had been to some considerable extent understated. It is true he was rather an elderly gentleman; but it is also true that he was, in her opinion, an exceedingly nice looking elderly gentleman, who, although in reality sixty, might pass very well for forty-six or forty-seven, considering that the hair even of young men will sometimes turn grey.

There was, however, one consideration which—as she confidentially consulted her friend, the pillow, night after night—caused her to reflect deeply upon the solemn and irrevocable step she contemplated. This consideration was a high one,—it being no other than that of what the world would say,—and therefore one which induced her to pause, and very naturally, seeing that she was known, not only to the whole of her fellow servants, but to the milkman, the laundress, the baker's man, and the butcher. It was hence in her view of the deepest importance that due deference should be paid in this matter to the opinion of the world, knowing well, as she did know, that nothing on earth tends to promote human happiness more than the consciousness of being by the world looked up to and respected. For some time this objection appeared to be insuperable. She could not get over it. Many restless days and sleepless nights did she pass in deep reflection. She even went to the most eminent astrologer of the age for the purpose of having her nativity cast, and was greatly relieved when that profoundly learned person informed her that she would have two husbands, and be with both extremely prosperous and happy; it seemed to be so very conclusive. Still the question of what the world would say was continually upon her lips while she zealously racked her imagination to conceive a sound and sufficient answer to that question; for she imagined, and very correctly, that, if the world should be up in arms in consequence of her marrying an elderly gentleman, it might to some extent interfere with her connubial bliss.

At length, however, having considered the matter in all its parts and bearings, she safely arrived at this conclusion, that it would not by any means become her to fly in the teeth of fate, and that, feeling quite sure that the venerable gentleman had been distinctly destined to be her first husband, it was her duty to surrender herself meekly to circumstances over which she could not be supposed to have control.

She therefore made a dead set at him at once, and called into action all her artillery, with the view of attacking his susceptible heart. She established in his presence one perpetual smile—which was, indeed, a very sweet one of the sort, sighed occasionally with very great effect, and glanced at him with constancy, and corresponding bashfulness, and frequently, while playing, removed the wrong peg, at the same time protesting that she actually did not know what she was about—she did not actually.

At the commencement of these affectionate proceedings the venerable gentleman rallied her gaily, and whenever he did so she felt herself bound to become so confused that she could not play at all, she could not count, she could not help pegging backwards, and the consequence was that she could not win a game; but albeit these little manoeuvres were for some time regarded by the experienced eye of her venerable partner with suspicion, her emotion was so deep, and so strong, and so strikingly developed, that while he still entertained the belief that as a general thing love was a gross imposition, he eventually could not but feel that in the gentle Joanna he had discovered the exception that established the rule. He was sure that she loved him—fondly, passionately loved him; she could not help showing it! In his view a man must be blind who could not see it; the thing was so palpable; nothing could be clearer; and to be beloved at his age, and that, too, by a finely-built, cherry-cheeked, nicely-behaved, comfortable-looking creature, nearly thirty years younger than himself, was an idea which flattered the venerable gentleman; he felt it very deeply, and thought of it constantly; and as he experienced a variety of sweet feelings which were altogether new to him, he resolved to be, if possible, more killing than ever, as the first grand preliminary to his seeing precisely what could be done. He accordingly became more refined in his language, and dressed with more care, and displayed more agility; and not only related the many feats he had performed, but dwelt upon those which he was able with ease to perform then; in short, having the most tender aspirations by which a lover could be prompted, he felt that his success as a lover was essential to the maintenance of his reputation as a man; although he knew that when two devoted persons try to win each other's hearts, they seldom, indeed, try in vain. He became much more constant in his visits, and was delighted when Bob was absent, which frequently happened, as he went with his master down to the House, and occasionally waited there for hours.

On one of these occasions, when the lovers had been playing at their favorite game for some time without the slightest interruption, the venerable gentleman, conscious of the high estimation in which wealth is held by ladies in general, and how greatly it assists the imagination in all matters of love, embraced a fine opportunity, which the fact of his having won ninepence afforded, for making the following remarkable observation:

"Wot a hexcellent thing lots o' money is, ain't it?"

Joanna blushed deeply, and felt extremely tremulous; but, conceiving it to be her duty to say something, she faintly replied,

"Why, it certainly is an excessively excellent thing; but happiness for me, Mr. Joseph, before all the money. Happiness is n't to be bought, for there 's no shop in life where it 's sold."

"That 's hall werry reg'lar," rejoined the venerable gentleman. "You 're quite correctly right in that air; still money 's a hout and hout thing! on'y go for to look at the advantages on it!—on'y see 'ow hindpendent they are, them as does peress lots; vile them as do n't, is in a wuss state of slavery than the black poppation there out by the North Pole. They 're never themselves them as ain't got no money. They can't hold their heads up: it 's clean against natur'. Jist p'int out to me a hindividual a-veindin' his vay along the streets, on'y jist let me look at him full in the face, and if I do n't tell you vether he 's got any money or not, I 'll be bound to be blessed; cos he as has n't, allus looks werry pertickler down his nose; vile he as has, takes jist about as much notice of that horgan as if he had n't got one. He can't look right straight at yer, him wot 's got all his pockets empty; he can't ketch yer heavy and vorm by the hand; he can't speak like a hinnercent man: his voice shivers and shakes jist for all the world as if it vos ashamed of itself; and he mumbles, and trembles, and wobbles, vile the corners of his mouth drops right away down in the rottenest manner alive; verehas, the man vich has got plenty in his pocket can look at yer fierce. He can take yer hand vith henergy, and speak up as if he owed yer nothink, and vornt a bit afearod on yer, vich makes great hods! Ven I meets a friend, now, vich ain't got no money, I do n't like to see him. I can't say I do—not a bit acos I 'm spungy, or anythink o' that; but I 'd rather not see him. I some 'ow or nother do n't like it. I pities him; and, as pity wounds the feelings, it ain't consequentially pleasant. If a friend in them there circumstantialities ses to me, 'Have yer got sich a thing as a couple o' shillins,' it cuts me to the quick; not acos I at all objects to lend it, nor cos I do n't hand him over double wot he arsts for, and never expects to vitness agin the color of the money, but it 's cos it hurts my sentiments to see him, and wounds me to think wot his feelings must be. That 's the p'int, you know!—that 's vere he feels it!"

"Exactly," returned Joanna: "you 're excessively correct; but that war n't by no manner of means what I meant. I did n't by any means mean to mean that money was no object, or that it was n't an excessive advantage; no, if I thought that, I should not have put by for a rainy day, as I have done. I should n't have thought of having such an amount as I have in the savings bank at the present period of time. All I meant was, that money was n't all; that money alone could n't purchase happiness, and therefore that happiness was to be preferred."

"And in the long run I agree vith yer. 'Appiness, in course, his the thing—the great thing: ve can't git through the world at all comfortable vithout it; but though it is to be found in hevery spere of society, from Vestm'ister to Vopping, vere can it be found vithout money? I do n't mean to say they 're unseparatable—that is to say, that verever there 's money there must be 'appiness consequentially also; but I do mean to say, that verever there 's 'appiness there must likewise be money. There can't be no 'appiness vithout it. It stands to reason; it ain't nat'ral! Look at them vich is in debt: 'ow can they be 'appy, from the highest spere down to the werry lowest—from him vich owes his banker arf a million, to him as owes his chandley-shop-keeper arf-a-crown. It 's onpossible! Look at me on'y jist for instance. I 've got seven houses vich brings me in fifty pound a-ear, all let to respectable tenants, substantial men of family vich never shoots the moon, and the writings is at home. Verry well. Now vet—s'pose I should be throwed out o' place—vot should I care, vith them to fall back upon? Nothink. But s'pose I had n't them, and then vos to be throwed out vithout the prospect of gettin' another, vere abouts vood be the price of my 'appiness then? Vood n't it be out of all character for me to be 'appy? In course: vere poverty is, there 'appiness can't be. They never agree together; they 're hallways a-fightin', and poverty 's safe to be victorious."

"I admire your mode of argument," observed Joanna, gently; "it 's excessively intellectual and correct; but have you never, in the course of your extensive experience, found those that are poor as happy as those that are rich?"

"Vy," replied the venerable gentleman, knitting his brows thoughtfully, "that is a p'int vich requires to be explained. You see, the poor is sometimes richer than the rich; and, on the tother side o' the pictur', the rich is sometimes poorer than the poor. I do n't call him poor, however poor he may be, vich has got enough to keep him respectable in his spere; nor I do n't call him rich, however rich he may be, vich has n't got enough to keep him respectable in his'n. A rich man may be werry rich, and a poor man may be werry poor, and between them a werry great distinction may be drawed; but the poor man, vich has but twelve shillins a week, and vith that can supply all his vonts, is richer than him vith ten thousand a-ear hif vith that he 's onable to make both ends meet. That 's the p'int! So, you see, I do n't call the poor reg'lar poor vich has enough to make 'em comfortable and tidy in their vay; but when the poor man is poor, vy he 's werry poor indeed, cos he can n't get no wittles; and, as 'appiness won't stay vere there 's no wittles, the whole p'int dissolves jist to this, that the rich is 'appier than the poor rich, mind yer—and the rich poor is 'appier than the poor poor, vich ain't got no wittles to eat."

"I understand you perfectly," said Joanna; "it 's excessively clear and precisely what I meant. I meant I 'd rather be in a poor spere of life, with sufficient to make me excessively happy, than in high spere, rolling in riches, vithout having happiness vith it."

"That 's all reg'lar!" exclaimed the venerable gentleman: "ve 're a-balancin' the werry same pole! 'Appiness, in course, is the universal thing, and consequentially ve 're hallways a-yarin' arter that vich ve think vill perure it, and vich is nayther more nor less than money; for, although vot you say is werry true, that there 's no shop in natur' vere 'appiness, like any other harticle, is ticketed and sold, there is the thousands of shops vere it is, in a hindirect manner, to be bought: as, for hinstance, if I vas werry 'ungry, and 'unger vos the on'y sore place I had about me, a crust of bread and cheese and a pint of arf-and-arf vood make me 'appy; but, if I had n't got no money to buy that bread and cheese and arf-and-arf, I should be werry onappy indeed. So, you see, it all depends upon whether you can git vot yer vont: if yer can, in course yer 'appy: if yer can't, in course you ain't. For hinstance, now I vont a wife. If I could git one—a reglar good 'un—I should then be all right; but as I can't, 'ow can I be 'appy?"

Joanna blushed deeply as she observed, with a most expressive smile, "Now, Mr. Joseph, you are joking."

"Not a bit," rejoined the venerable gentlemen; "no, upon my honer."

"Did you ever try?"

"Vy, I can't conscientiously say I ever did."

"Then how can you know? You cannot know until you try."

"But I'm gettin' rayther a hold faller now, yer know, inclin' as the poet says, 'into the wale of 'ears'; so that nobody 'll 'ave me."

"Nobody would have you!" echoed Joanna, with an expression of incredulity.

"Vell, who vood now? That 's the p'int at hissue Vood you?"

The ardent and affectionate heart of Joanna now violently throbbed; but, as she felt it to be her duty to blush and remain silent, she made no reply.

"Vell, p'raps," continued the venerable gentleman, as Joanna glanced most expressively at him—"p'raps I put the p'int rayther too close, as your werry perlience vont let you say no."

"Oh! it is n't for that," observed Joanna, very tremulously.

"Vell, then I'll tell you vot I'll do with you. Come, now, I'll bet you a pair of gloves that you can't conscientiously, mind yer, say yes."

"What a funny man you are!" said Joanna.

"It vood, I know, be a robbery. I know I should vin."

"Do you think so?"

"Safe! Come, I'll make it two to one—there, and put the money down: they shall be arf-crowners, double-stitched Frenchmen. Will you take these 're hoddas?"

"You'd lose," said Joanna, with archness—"you'd be certain to lose."

"I do n't think it, nor vont till I have lost. Now, then, vill you bet?"

"Why really!—Mr. Joseph!—I never knew!—it 's such a very droll way of doing business!"

"Vot 's the hoddas, so that business is done?"

"But indeed—depend upon it—you'd lose."

"Werry well. If I do, I shall have to stand the Frenchmen, that 's all. Come, put the money down—or I'll trust yer. Now, then," continued the venerable gentleman, kneeling upon the footstool beside her, and placing his ear quite close to her lips, "come, visper, and then nayther the kittles nor the sausepans vont 'ear. Now mark! Vood you 'ave me?"

The venerable gentleman patiently paused some considerable time for a reply; but at length Joanna did sigh and say "Now—really!"

"Only visper the word!"

"Upon my conscience I feel so frustrated—indeed so excessively confused—that I cannot for the life of me."

"Oh, but you must! Come—now then—vonce more. Vood you 'ave me?"

With a faltering voice, and a fluttering heart, the gentle creature, in a tone which scarcely violated silence, said—"Yes."

"You vood!" exclaimed the venerable gentleman—"conscientiously!"

"He drew back a trifle: and, having gazed in a state of rapture at her lustrous eyes for a moment, threw his arm round her beautiful swan-like neck and clandestinely kissed her.

"Nay, you wicked man," said the blushing Joanna, "that 's excessively naughty."

"Vell, give it me back! If you don't like to 'ave it, return it to the lips from vence it came."

"No, that I am sure I 'll not do."

"Oh, nonsense!" cried the venerable gentleman, throwing his arm again round her elegant neck, "I must test your sincerity!"

"Don't, Mr. Joseph: you 'll rumple my collar: indeed, Mr. Joseph, indeed, indeed you will!"

Joanna struggled very correctly; but the venerable gentleman's ardor increased; and just as he had succeeded in drawing her sweet lips to his, Bob, who had entered the kitchen during the struggle unperceived, cried "Hem!"

Had there been a trap-door beneath the gentle Joanna, through which she could at once have disappeared, her disappearance would certainly have been instantaneous, she felt at the moment so dreadfully alarmed; but as there happened to be no such a piece of theatrical machinery near her, she summoned all her courage, and turning promptly to Bob, said, "Isn't it too bad, Robert? Here, just because I happen to have won five shillings of Mr. Joseph, he vows he 'll have a kiss, which is very unfair, Robert, isn't it now?"

Bob looked at her fiercely, and said in answer to this strong appeal, "It ain't nothing to me." He also looked fiercely at his venerable friend, and added, "I'm a-intruding."

These indeed were very cutting observations, and they had a very powerful effect. The lovers wished he had been at that moment drinking with Pharaoh and all his host; but as they gave no expression to that wish, he gloomily seated himself near the fire, and looked into it with a most ferocious aspect.

As the venerable gentleman could not of course feel exactly comfortable then, he soon prepared to depart: he took Bob's passive hand, and having bade him good night, Joanna saw him to the door, where he kissed her again, and, singularly enough, she returned it then without any struggling at all.

CHAPTER XXXIV.... The Petition; its progress and result.

Stanley had been nearly a fortnight in the House without having on any occasion risen to speak. During that time he had heard many excellent speeches, and many more which, although delivered in an execrable style, read and told well in the papers. His ambition had therefore been constantly strengthened; and as most men, who feel that they possess the power to shine in the particular circle in which they move, are desirous of cultivating those accomplishments, whatever they may be, by which applause is obtained in that circle, it is not singular that he, possessing the necessary confidence, painted to distinguish himself in that centre from which celebrity radiates throughout the world.

Having studied one important subject deeply, and made himself conversant with all its ramifications, he went down to the House on the fourteenth day of his being a member, with the view of startling the nerves of all parties by the development of what he had in him. Previously, however, to the commencement of the debate in which he intended to take a conspicuous part, an honorable member on the opposite side presented a petition against his return!

At the moment Stanley could with great pleasure have kicked him. He felt in a rage with that man. He might have been, for aught he knew or cared, a virtuous person; but as he returned to his seat with a calm but triumphant smile, having performed what he conceived to be his duty, Stanley looked at him!—in one word he certainly would have knocked him down, if the forms of the House had allowed it.

It is, perhaps, amazing that the strongest minds are capable of being upset in an instant. A man may have a perfect command over his features; he may have an equally perfect command over his nerves; but he cannot have a perfect command, or any thing like a perfect command, over his mind. He may be able to stand and walk erect; he may be able to maintain the steadiness of his eye and the firmness of his voice; he may be able to suppress every show of emotion; but he cannot suppress the emotion itself. He may have in full bloom what is technically termed "moral courage,"—for technical the term may be said to be, seeing that physical courage is hard to be defined; he may be extremely calm and collected; he may conceal effectually his feelings from others, but from himself they will not be concealed. Within his own breast they are in full operation; their influence may rack him, although the effect be unseen; and precisely thus stood Stanley. He scorned to betray his feelings when the hateful petition was presented, but they were acute notwithstanding: indeed, so acute that they prompted him to withhold that brilliant speech with which he intended to astonish the House. The thing came upon him so unexpectedly, he was not prepared for the blow. He knew of course that the opposing party had been zealous in their efforts to get up a petition, but he had been led by his agents to believe that those efforts had utterly failed: when, however, he actually saw the unblest document, he could no longer lay the flattering unction to his soul which those agents had been from the first prescribing.

"I have been grossly deceived," said he, addressing Sir William, who sat by his side. "Those fellows assured me that the idea of a petition was, under the circumstances, absurd."

"Oh, it may come to nothing now," returned the Baronet. "This is the last day on which it could be presented. The prosecution of a petition does not of necessity follow its presentation. The chances are that it will yet be abandoned."

"I fear not," said Stanley.

"Why fear?"

"Because the grounds upon which they stand are too tenable to justify a hope that the thing will be relinquished."

"The grounds!" exclaimed Sir William. "The grounds have little indeed to do with the matter. It depends upon the committee. If you get a majority—and, of course we must have a whip for it—you are safe: you need not care then a single straw about the grounds."

Stanley appreciated this remark very highly. He knew that, although in strictly barbarous states the system of trying the merits of petitions by a directly responsible tribunal might obtain, it would be in a country so enlightened as this repudiated, not only as ridiculous but dangerous, inasmuch as the practice established was of such surpassing excellence that it rendered the operation of party bias and factious influence almost impossible, and particularly in cases in which parties are so nicely balanced that the loss of a vote on either side is of very great importance: he knew also that every member was at that happy period an honorable man, and so strictly pure in principle, that he would rather see his own party go to the dogs than sacrifice or even slightly tamper with his conscience: he, moreover, knew that, albeit certain signally uncivilized persons had attempted to upset the just and most salutary system established, their attempts had utterly and of course most deservedly failed; still, with all this knowledge, he felt apprehensive that, whether he obtained a majority or not, his seat would be lost, and was therefore at first indisposed to defend it.

Sir William, however, powerfully painted to him the almost unprecedented folly of yielding, and as most men are guided by the opinions of others, if even they conceive their own judgment to be superior, provided always that their vanity is flattered; so Stanley, although he knew that the allegations contained in the petition were true, and that, therefore, under the system proposed by the unconstitutional innovators referred to, he would have had no chance at all of retaining his seat, surrendered his own judgment to that of Sir William, in the full and lively hope of being able to whip in a just and one-sided committee.

This hope, however, although it sustained him for a time was not realized. The committee was moved for; the whip was used on both sides with great effect, and the result was to four against him. The great point of Sir William was thus at once destroyed, and Stanley again felt disposed to retire; but Sir William, knowing what the expenses of defending a seat under a seat under the circumstances usually were, and being still sincerely anxious to reduce him to a state of destitution, shifted his ground, and not only ridiculed the idea of giving in, but contended for self-conviction in such a case being comparable only with suicide; and in this he was ably seconded by the Widow.

"It would be, you know, such an extremely shocking thing," said that lady, when her opinion of the matter had been demanded; "it would be absolutely dreadful—dear me! it would be an eternal disgrace—to retire from the field without a struggle, you know, my dear!"

"Mother," said Stanley, "look at the expense."

"A fig for the expense, my love! we are not poor. I look at the thing in the abstract."

"You do, without reference to the cost. Look at that in the abstract! I confess that I have an imperfect knowledge of the expense of these things; but I know it to be something very, very considerable."

"Well, my love! let it be considerable. Thank Heaven we are not beggars! But we are not beaten yet! Where is your philosophy, my dear? Should we make ourselves wretched to-day, because it happens to be possible for us to be wretched to-morrow? Oh, dear me, no! defend the seat by all means."

"Mother," rejoined Stanley, "you know me, I think, too well to believe that I would not do so if I saw the slightest prospect of success."

"My dearest boy, I know that you would not; I am perfectly certain of that; but then, although you cannot see this prospect, others can! Good gracious me! what does Sir William say!—does he not say that these things are all a lottery?"

"But how can we reasonably hope to succeed, when we know nearly all with which we are charged to be true?"

"True! my dear! Has not Sir William again and again said that a thousand things may be true which cannot be proved?"

"I have, of course, no inclination to resign, which you know: if I conceived it to be probable that my seat could be retained, I would defend it with all the means in my power; but as the case stands at present I cannot perceive a chance."

"Oh! there are a thousand chances; rely on it, my love, there are ten thousand chances, although you do not perceive them. Besides, if even the worst should come to the worst, we are surely, my love, as capable of bearing our share of the expenses as the Swansdown faction are of bearing theirs!"

"But that may not be the worst. Suppose we are fixed with all the costs?"

"Oh, but you know, Sir William says that an instance of that kind has not occurred within his recollection."

"But the thing is not impossible: it may occur in our case, and if it should, can it be borne without sensibly affecting your fortune?"

"Of course! Dear me, my love, what a ridiculous question!"

"Oh, I know nothing about your affairs: you have always most studiously kept them from me."

"Fear nothing on that score; by all means oppose this horrible petition."

"Very well: but understand, that if opposed at all it must be opposed with spirit; no expense must be spared; there must be no stopping short; the thing once begun must be carried on boldly to the end!"

"That is precisely my feeling. Never mind the expense; do not dream about that. Have every thing that may be deemed essential to success. We shall beat them! I am sure that we shall beat them. It would be such a truly dreadful thing, you know, my love, to give up all without an effort to retain it. It would look so cowardly and would be so disgraceful, as Sir William says! I should go mad! I am sure of it! I never could be happy again. Therefore, oppose them, my love, by all means; oppose them with all your power. Engage the highest talent available. Stanley, my dearest love! let me prevail upon you—will you oppose them?"

Stanley consented. He had of course no desire to relinquish his seat; he never had; but knowing well that his election must have cost something very considerable, although the amount had been concealed from him, he felt, being ignorant of the Widow's resources, that the expense of opposing the petition—if the opposition should be reported "frivolous and vexatious," might involve them all in ruin. When, however, he heard that the worst could be borne without any material or permanent injury, he resolved to go on with the opposition boldly; he would not yield an inch; he defied them to prove their allegations, although he knew them to be true, declaring that his seat should be defended till the last.

The battle then commenced. The opening speeches were made. Coach-loads of witnesses were brought up to town, and among them Stanley recognized many, whom, during the election, he had treated with the utmost kindness and liberality. On ascertaining the quarters of these people, he sent an agent to remonstrate with them; but they viewed the affair as a mere matter of business, declaring that they had no private feeling either way; that the franchise was a property of which they had a clear and indisputable right to make the most, that every contingency increased its value, and if Stanley wanted them, why, he might have them even then. The agent spoke of gratitude, of course, and enlarged on its brightness and beauty; and they agreed with him; they thought it an excellent thing, and they said so, and contended that its value should be commensurate with his excellence, and at the same time declared that they had plenty to sell, and should be glad to dispose of their whole stock at a price. As, however, it was deemed inexpedient under the circumstances to purchase this inestimable commodity of them—the investment not being quite safe—there was no business done; the agent left them in possession of their gratitude, which, if all had been taken at their own valuation, would have made a man wealthy indeed.

There was, however, another class of witnesses of a far more formidable character, inasmuch as they were actuated by feelings of revenge, and had a certain amount of social respectability about them which imparted a nominal purity to their testimony, and thereby gave it an additional weight. These were the tradesmen whom the chairman of Stanley's committee had insulted by his shabby and unconstitutional refusal to meet their prescriptive demands. The rest of the witnesses against him cared nothing about the result; they had no vindictive feelings to gratify; their object was to make all the money they could, and it mattered not a straw to them which party triumphed; but these men had set their noble souls upon his defeat; they had firmly resolved to do all in their power to ensure his political destruction; he had robbed them—for it is a real robbery, when the thing is properly looked at, to refuse to pay respectable men what is regular—and, therefore, they had one and all determined to stick at nothing which could tend to promote the accomplishment of the just and legitimate object in view.

The committee sat daily; but their progress was but slow. The counsel on both sides displayed all the eloquence, zeal and ingenuity they had in them, and bullied each other with admirable ferocity. On one point, however, they seemed to be agreed, and that was to make the thing last as long as possible. It seldom, indeed, happens in ordinary cases, that opposing counsels agree at all; but it is an extraordinary fact, that in this case they were on that great point perfectly unanimous. During the examination of witnesses an objection was started at every third question with the utmost regularity and tact, and the speeches which succeeded those objections respersions were remarkable as well for their length as for the sound deliberation with which they were delivered.

After a week or two the honorable members of the committee became naturally tired of the business; but the witnesses in the aggregate were by no means impatient; they cared not how long the thing lasted; it met their views precisely; nothing on earth could have suited them better; they were not only living like Aldermen in town, but really beginning to get into flesh.

At length, when all concerned save counsel and these philosophic witnesses, were weary, the labors of the committee were brought to an end, and the result was, that they reported the opposition to the petition 'frivolous and vexatious,' and thus fixed Stanley with the whole of the costs, which were enormous!

This to him and his immediate friends was indeed a heavy blow; but poor Amelia felt it most deeply. Her anguish was poignant in the extreme, and while she tried to soothe her Stanley, whose high hopes had thus been blasted, she would hang upon his neck and sob as if her heart were breaking.

To Sir William and his associates Stanley wished it to appear that he was comparatively indifferent about the matter, but when in the presence of the Widow alone, his rage could not be calmed.

"You see," he exclaimed, when the result became known, "you see the position to which you have reduced me!"

"I, my love?"

"Yes, mother, you!"

"Gracious heavens! what can you mean?"

"Did you not prompt me to pursue this mad course? Should I have opposed this infernal petition had it not been for you?"

"My love! you know that I advised you for the best!"

"You advised me for the worst! You imagined, I suppose, that it would tame me. I was a fool to follow your advice; a wretched, a consummate fool!"

"Stanley! Stanley!" exclaimed the Widow, bursting into tears, as he fiercely paced the room. "Oh! this is cruel—very cruel! You ought not to be unkind; indeed, indeed, you ought not to afflict me thus! You should consider that I have feelings, Stanley."

"Mother, you do not consider that I have feelings!"

"I do: I do, indeed! I know that my poor boy must feel it most deeply; but do not, pray do not, add gall to this calamity; do not increase our affliction by attributing motives which you must know could never have actuated me. But, my dearest love, can we not appeal?"

"Appeal! No, there is no appeal."

"But the decision was corrupt, my love; grossly corrupt. The committee were guided by factious views solely, and while the counsel against us were demons, our own counsel ought to be ashamed of themselves for having suffered the fiends to go on so. Now, under these circumstances, you know, my love, it strikes me—"

"Again I tell you, there is no appeal! And if there were, if even I could appeal, I would not. I know that these monstrous expenses must materially affect our fortunes. I am sure of it, quite sure, although you conceal the fact from me."

"They are indeed; very heavy indeed."

"You admit, then," demanded Stanley fiercely, "you admit that they have involved us?"

"No, my love; no, no; they have not involved us. I said that they were heavy!—I merely said that. But come, my love, all will be well. Come, be calm and kind; you are my only joy: I cannot be happy if you are not kind."

The widow again burst into tears and buried her face in his bosom. She knew that that which Stanley suspected was true; she was conscious that these enormous costs, immediately following the expenses of the election, had involved her, and although she had yet but an imperfect knowledge of the extent, she knew well that her position would be sensibly affected.

And Sir William knew it too, and was glad. The destruction of Amelia's virtue was his object, and he now felt more than ever sure that that object would at no remote period be attained.

THE KING OF FRANCE.—The following items appear in the civil list of this monarch:—For subscription to publications F.10,000; music, boxes at theatres, benefits, &c. F.12,000; manufactures F.23,500; museums and fine arts F.18,000; works of art F.20,000; medals and mint F.16,000. Thus it appears that the French Sovereign has placed at his disposal a sum of nearly F.100,000 for the special encouragement of native arts, sciences and manufactures.

The Massachusetts House of Representatives have indefinitely postponed the proposition to indemnify the proprietors of the Nunnery burnt at Charlestown a few years since. The vote on the question of an indefinite postponement was, yeas 207, nays 49.

FLUENCY OF SPEECH.—Dean Swift says the common fluency of speech, in most men and most women is owing to a scarcity of matter and a scarcity of words; for whoever is a master of language, and hath a mind full of ideas, will be apt, in speaking, to hesitate upon the choice of both; whereas, common speakers have only one set of ideas, and one set of words to cloth them in, and these are always ready at the mouth; so people come faster out of church when it is almost empty than when a crowd is at the door.

PQUANT REPROOF.—The Chevalier Duplessis, a very inferior poet, and author of a bad opera, called Pizarro, used to indulge himself in the bitterest satire against other poets. Once he asserted with great vehemence, that he did not know a worse lyric poet than Guillard. Cheron, the actor, archly replied, "Ah! Chevalier, you forget yourself."

At the commencement of the present volume of the Quarto edition of the New World, on the 2d day of January last, some thousands of extra copies were printed, with which to supply orders for back numbers from those subscribers who might wish to begin with the volume. We find, however, on examining our files, that they are running very low, and that the probability is that we shall not be able to supply back numbers more than two or three weeks longer. We therefore advise all those, who are intending to subscribe or who may wish to do so, to make up their minds immediately, and send on their orders so that they may obtain the present volume complete.

The popular story of TEN THOUSAND A-YEAR can be furnished from its commencement. The story of the Tower of London can also be furnished from its commencement in the Evergreen Magazine. It is brought to a conclusion in the present number of the New World.

Our Exchange papers will confer a favor on the publisher of the New World, by copying the advertisement of the LEVIATHAN sheet one time, or give a notice of the same, as soon as convenient, that those who wish to order may do so. It will be a splendid number.

TO OUR FRIENDS IN THE COUNTRY.

The second failure of the United States Bank has caused a great sensation and alarm here, and will no doubt produce a much greater sensation in Europe. Indeed, in Europe it is this Bank in particular that will attract attention, because it has long been a prominent institution in European regard, and its stock is extensively owned on European account. But we do not well see the propriety of making it so prominent here. The United States Bank is a State institution, as truly and essentially as the Girard Bank, or the Schuylkill Bank, or any other Bank whatever; yet we hear nothing of the fact—i. e. it is not made a matter of general conversation—that all the other Banks in Philadelphia, the Baltimore Banks, &c., &c., have also failed; and, by the way, we may remark in passing, that failed is hardly the proper term to apply to any of these institutions, if the word is to be taken in its ordinary acceptation, as applied to individuals. The Banks have simply suspended specie payments; but it does not follow from this fact that the Banks are insolvent; it may be true, certainly, but that suspension by no means proves it to be true. Indeed, mere suspension—insolvency not being imputed—is a fact in which neither the stockholders nor the bill-holders have much concern, when, as in this case, the suspension is general. Nor does partial insolvency, in the case of a particular institution, (although it affects the few, the stockholders,) necessarily injure the many, the bill-holders. It is only when a Bank which has a large circulation is forced to stop payment, and which, on examination, proves to be altogether insolvent, that the public being to suffer or have reason for alarm. If a Bank fails, and has not a sufficiency of assets to redeem its notes, then things begin to look serious. We take it for granted that our readers understand the order in which the liabilities of a Bank are to be paid: its notes are always placed first; next its deposits; and afterward its stockholders. It may, therefore, happen that its notes are good; and yet its depositors' and stockholders' claims, (either or both,) good for nothing.

Now, in the case before us, it has not been urged that the Banks generally are insolvent. The notes of the Bank of the United States are just now at a discount in Wall street, and a discount, too, far greater than the notes of other Banks of Philadelphia: one being about three per cent. and the other about twelve per cent. below par. But if Wall street prices prove anything with regard to United States Bank notes, they prove them worth par, with the difference of exchange; for every day we see large amounts of the stock of the United States Bank sold for cash at about twenty-five dollars a share; and, assuredly, if the stock is worth anything, the notes are worth one hundred cents on the dollar. We claim, therefore, that the notes of the United States Bank are good; and that the public, collectively, have no ground for apprehension on account of the recent suspension of specie payments.

Our country is certainly not coming to an end. Our soil remains where it did, and our yeomanry live to cultivate it. We are at peace with all the world; and, despite the pompous and discursive report of Mr. Pickens, (endorsed by those pliant politicians and patriots, the editors of the Journal of Commerce,) will undoubtedly remain at peace for some years to come. We therefore say to our friends in the country—do not be alarmed! There is no fear. Neither the world, nor the New World, is in any danger of destruction. And all those who have bank notes on hand need not fear sending them to us to pay up new subscriptions or to renew old ones. We will take United States Bank notes, or any other notes of Banks in equal standing, and transmit our paper in exchange on the terms set forth in our prospectus. In short, we are tired of, and disgusted at the twattle of professional alarmists, and are willing to do our part in refuting their untenable positions.

THE NEW CABINET.—Advices from Washington concur in stating that the Cabinet of General HARRISON, has been nearly if not entirely settled—as follows:

DANIEL WEBSTER of Mass., Secretary of State;
THOMAS EWING of Ohio, Secretary of the Treasury;
JOHN BELL of Tenn., Secretary of War;
GEORGE E. BADGER of N. C., Secretary of the Navy;
FRANCIS GRANGER of N. Y., Postmaster General;
JOHN J. CRITTENDEN of Ky., Attorney General.

This is a strong cast. Messrs. WEBSTER and CRITTENDEN are leading Members of the present U. S. Senate; Messrs. BELL and GRANGER have long been eminent in Congress and distinguished in their respective States; Mr. BELL was Speaker of the XXVth Congress, after the departure of Mr. Stevenson for England; Mr. GRANGER is the son of Gideon Granger, Mr. Madison's Postmaster General, and was himself the Anti-Jackson candidate for Lieutenant Governor in 1828, and for Governor in 1830 and 1832, receiving at each canvass for Governor more than the full vote of his party. Mr. EWING was a distinguished U. S. Senator from Ohio, from 1831 to 1837, and was then thrown out by an unjustifiable Gerrymandering of his State for the election of Members of the Legislature, whereby the Van Buren party secured a majority in that body in defiance of a popular majority of 8,000 against them. He is considered one of the ablest lawyers and statesmen, and most energetic business men of the mighty West. At twenty-two years of age he was a wood-chopper at the Kenawha Salt Works; indeed, we believe none of the Members of the new Administration except General HARRISON and Mr. GRANGER enjoyed any advantages of birth; and the General's was unaccompanied by fortune.

The Navy Department has been urgently claimed by the Southern States, and it is believed that Mr. BADGER of N. C.—a new man, 'fresh from the people,' has been selected.

ATTORNEY GENERAL HALL.—The opinion of this gentleman on the seizure of papers by the ex-Recorder has been published at length in some of our city journals; and by this time has no doubt been generally read. It is far too voluminous for our columns, and we therefore content ourselves by a reference to its merits. It strikes us as being one of the most logical, clear, and unanswerable legal arguments that we ever met with, evincing on the part of its author an extent of research and a profundity of legal acquirement for which we, from the first, have given him credit, and which his opponents of both parties have been in the habit of denying that he possessed. We are pleased to see this among other proofs that we have not ourselves over estimated the man: and we confess to a small share of malicious gratification when we observe that sundry of the Whig editors who were loudest and most offensive in their censure of Mr. HALL's appointment now—on the appearance of this able document—sneak into the course from which their little prejudices drove them at first, and into which the commanding talents of Mr. HALL have drawn them at last.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.—The election of President and Vice President of the United States, to serve for four years from the 4th day of March next, was on Wednesday consummated by the opening and counting, by the Vice President of the United States, in the presence of both Houses of Congress, of the votes given by the electors in the respective States. When the votes had all been counted, the Vice President proclaimed, in audible and distinct tones, that

WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, of Ohio, having received a majority of the votes of the electors, is duly elected President of the United States; and that

JOHN TYLER, of Virginia, having received a majority of the votes of the electors, is duly elected Vice President of the United States.

We have read the report of Mr. Pickens, of South Carolina, in relation to the burning of the steamboat Carolina, and the demand made for the liberation of Alexander McLeod by the British Minister. It strikes us that a more bombastical, ridiculous, and ill-advised flourish was never made even in our House of Representatives. Undignified, boyish and blustering, it is calculated to arouse all the burning resentments of the Canadians, and to be productive of no good whatsoever. It was adopted, we are glad to note, by a bare majority of one in the Committee of Foreign Affairs. A protest was made to it by John Quincy Adams and other wise members, and it is to be hoped that some document will be put forth by them to render its effect less pernicious.

We have accounts of one of the largest Brokers Houses in New-York, having failed! Are such events the change which Mr. Webster promised? Is this the flood of prosperity which General Harrison's mere Election was to pour upon the country?—What humbugs did these men preach to the People!—[Richmond Enquirer.]

We infer from this that Mr. Ritchie is prepared to hold the general government responsible for all failures of Brokers that occur under the present administration; and we would therefore recommend the appointment forthwith of a Board of Wall street Commissioners, whose duty it shall be to make a daily examination and report of the capital, circulation, discounts, contracts, deposits, and—above all—specie, of which the several firms in that notable mart are possessed, or for which they are accountable. And it would be well to instruct the said commissioners to discriminate in their report between the political creed of the subjects of their inquiry. It certainly is not to be tolerated that one political party of a country like this should denounce another—combine against it—promise prosperity to its opponents—and finally defeat it: and, after all, even before the new party comes into power, or can begin to operate upon the interests of the country either for good or ill—it is not, we say, to be tolerated that while matters are in this posture, a certain house in Wall street should make imprudent speculations and fail!

We have been invoked to reveal the names of those high officers of the Navy, whose crimes and misdemeanors have been lately held up to public execration. This we do not think it either proper or necessary to do. The announcement would but gratify feelings of personal ill-will, and might retard rather than advance the cause of justice. The individuals to whom allusion and reference have been made in our columns, are as well known to the officers of the Navy as if their names were printed out in capital letters. If they are callous to the ignominy with which such crimes must be visited in their own profession, they will hardly be amended by exposure to the public in general.

Mr. HORACE GREELEY has issued the sixth edition—enlarged—of the Politician's Register for 1841: This Register is a complete compilation of returns of votes, cast in the several States of the Union, mainly during the years 1836, 1838 and 1840 for President, Members of Congress, and State Officers, arranged by counties alphabetically—including full returns of the late Presidential election. The well established reputation of the Editor of this Register for exactness and ability in the preparation of his tables of elections needs not any commendation from us.

EX-RECORDER MORRIS.—The injunction of secrecy in the case of the New-York Recorder, having been removed, says the Albany Evening Journal, we have obtained a copy of the following Resolutions submitted by Mr. Verplanck and adopted by the Senate. They present the principles involved and vindicated, by the action of the Senate, in concise, forcible and clear language:

MR. VERPLANCK'S RESOLUTIONS.

1. Resolved, That the right of every citizen to the protection of his private papers from unreasonable search and seizure rests on the same great principle with the right to be protected against indictment or conviction upon extorted confession, and is wholly independent of any question of the guilt or innocence of the individual; that both of these rights have always been held equally sacred by the friends of civil liberty; have been for many years maintained by them against the assaults of tyranny; were among the great objects of our Revolution of 1776, and have been embodied and declared in the Constitution of the United States, and the declaration "of the rights of the citizens and inhabitants of this State," which solemnly declares that "No person can be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself," and that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures ought not to be violated, and that no warrants can issue but upon probable cause supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons and things to be seized."

2. Resolved, That no search or seizure can be deemed reasonable when not specially authorized by law, and made in the manner and for the purposes so prescribed and directed.

3. Resolved, That when the conduct of any judicial officer is an aggression upon the rights of private citizens and the primary principles of civil liberty recognised and embodied in our constitutions or bill of rights, such conduct cannot be excused as an error of legal judgment on a matter within the jurisdiction of such judge, but affords evidence either of his incapacity for the trust he holds or else of a culpable violation of duty, and in either case demands his removal from office.

4. Resolved, That in the case of Robert H. Morris, there being no denial of the fact of his seizure of the private papers of an accused person, but the same being admitted by the said Morris, there is no question of fact for inquiry, examination or trial, and the only question for the decision of the Senate on the facts presented and admitted, relates to their own constitutional duty in respect to such conduct in a judicial officer subject to be removed by them upon the recommendation of the Governor.

5. Resolved, That a seizure of private papers like that acknowledged to have been made by Robert H. Morris is not merely in itself a violation of the spirit and of the very letter of great constitutional provisions guarding the common rights of every citizen, but moreover being openly avowed and defended by him in an official charge to a Grand Jury, it affords an alarming judicial precedent, by which (as the experience of other times has shown) under the color of law and the excuse of necessity, the character, interests, liberties and even lives of innocent men may be placed at the mercy of public officers; that it therefore becomes the imperative duty of the Governor and Senate to mark their high disapprobation of such an abuse of power, and to prevent it from becoming an authoritative precedent for the future, by the deliberate exercise of the power confided to them by the Constitution to remove the offending magistrate for such assigned cause.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

We observed that Governor Pennington, in his message to the Legislature of New-Jersey, directed their attention to the subject of Imprisonment for Debt. It has been matter of surprise to us that in a State so liberal and intelligent as New-Jersey, this relic of barbarous legislation has been suffered so long to disgrace their statute book. We are aware that there is a class in every community, interested in perpetuating this abuse; and that there are classes which do not see or feel its evils, and therefore entertain but little solicitude on the subject. All these classes are represented in the Legislature of New-Jersey, as in all other Legislatures; but they should not be permitted to interpose an insurmountable barrier to a reform so loudly demanded by all the interests of justice and humanity.

If there is any one subject on which there has been a striking revolution in public sentiment, under the influence of modern civilization, it is that of imprisonment for debt. The general voice of the community condemns the punishment of calamity as a crime; and revolts at the idea of visiting with the felon's infamy the consequences of misfortunes to which the best man in the community is as liable as the worst. On the general subject, we have too recently expressed our views at length, to make a repetition of them necessary; but we cannot omit again to record the opinion that public sentiment never will be fully satisfied, until all laws authorising infamous punishment for any manner of honest indebtedness are repealed—until a clause shall be incorporated in the Constitution of the Union declaring that no American citizen shall ever be restrained of his liberty except on the conviction or accusation of crime.

In the mean time, it becomes our local Legislatures to adopt such measures as are necessary to remove from the limits of their jurisdiction the evil of which we complain. New-York has erased the last vestige of this barbarism from her statutes; and in his recent message Governor SEWARD called the attention of our Legislature to the propriety of excluding the Federal Government from the use of our State prisons for the incarceration of individuals arrested for debt by the officers of the United States. Even the Legislature of so benighted a State as New Hampshire has abolished imprisonment for debt. It is not possible that New Jersey should tolerate it, when it is made to operate not on her own citizens, but on strangers from other States, who are entrapped in her borders, and thrown into her jails. We hope that the Legislature now in session at Trenton will not adjourn, without following the liberal example of the State of New-York, and conforming her laws on this subject to the progressive civilization of the age.

To the above excellent article from the Courier and Enquirer we say, Amen.

We would, in this connection, inquire of the Boston editors if anything has been done, or is likely to be done, during the present session of the Massachusetts Legislature, for the abolition of Imprisonment for debt in that State in the case of non-residents? Are the merchants of Boston so indifferent with regard to their own interests as to allow a law to exist, which prevents customers from coming to their city to purchase goods? Many a trader from Maine, Vermont, New-Hampshire, Connecticut, and this state even, who come to this city to make their purchases, would go to Boston, if not liable, on arrival there, to be thrown into prison or held to bail on some old demand. Are the citizens of Boston so dead to the claims of hospitality as to suffer the arrest of a stranger, who happens to visit their city, when no one of the citizens is by law subject to such bondage?

It is surprising to us that the New-England States, which claim the credit of so great enlightenment, should cling with pertinacity to this well-nigh exploded barbarity of imprisonment for debt—this depriving men of their liberty for their misfortunes—this authorized slavery—this making of calamity a crime.

Congressional.

THURSDAY, Feb. 11.

Mr. Preston, from the joint committee appointed to inform General Harrison of his election to the Presidency of the United States, reported that the President elect had been duly informed of the result of the vote.

In the House, Mr. Everett, of Vermont, presented resolutions from the Legislature of that State, that the exclusion of the duly commissioned members from New-Jersey was unjust, unconstitutional, and a gross violation of the rights of the people.

FRIDAY, Feb. 12.

The Treasury Note bill passed the Senate on Friday by a vote of 28 to 8. Among the negatives were Messrs. Benton and Allen.

The Speaker laid before the House the report of the commissioner appointed last summer for the purpose of surveying and Exploring the North Eastern boundary.

TUESDAY, Feb. 13.

In the House, the most important movement was a resolution introduced by Mr. Fillmore, authorising the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the defence of the Northern Frontier. The resolution was agreed to without opposition.

FRATERNAL AFFECTION.—Edwards, the man who was convicted of murder in Alabama, and sentenced to be hung, was respite by the Governor. The respite was brought by the brother of Edwards, who travelled the whole distance between Tuscaloosa and Mobile on foot, arriving on the day of the execution in advance of the mail.

EFFECTS OF THE WEATHER.—They have had the heaviest kind of rain in Alabama, and one of the editors is complaining bitterly. He says that the powder horn is choked by the adhesion of its contents; the sand in the hour glass is still; the beautiful ringlets of the girls are all wet, and hang as straight as if life to them had no twist; whilst the ripe beauties were pouting and wasting their sweetness in a vain effort to produce a curl with heated tongs and gum water. Even the "little pigs" who erst "Slept with their tails curled up" now enjoy the delights of repose, with that graceful ornament

"Stuck out a foot."

WAR MOVEMENT IN MAINE.—On the 3d instant, resolutions on the subject of repelling British aggression, were offered in the House of Representatives, and referred to the Committee on the North Eastern Boundary. We learn from the Portland Argus of the 15th inst. that these resolutions were taken up by the Senate on the 10th, and after being amended by inserting $1,000,000, instead of $400,000, for the defence of the State, were referred to the same committee.

Mr. Davies then offered the following resolve, which was also referred to the Committee on the North Eastern Boundary:

"Resolve for repelling Foreign Invasion, and providing for the protection of the State.

"Be it Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested and urged to cause the immediate removal of the foreign armed force, by which our State is invaded, stationed upon the upper valley of the St. Johns, and that the Government of the United States be earnestly invoked to relieve this State from the present heavy, needless burden of its own defence."

Correspondence of the Courier & Enquirer.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15, 1841.

Mr. Webster has resigned his seat in the Senate of the United States, to take effect from and after the 27th inst.

To-morrow evening there is to be a splendid ball in Newton & Gadsby's new building; the dining or dancing room, as the case may be, is 40 feet front and rear, by 130 feet deep. The President Elect will be present, and the next morning (Wednesday) he sets off for Virginia.

Gen. Harrison this morning visited both branches of Congress and the Supreme Court of the United States.

In a former letter I remarked that Gen. Harrison was well pleased with his reception at the President's. I since learn that the General made a most favorable impression upon those whom he met at dinner, and among others, the Secretary of the Navy, who in conversation, has spoken of Gen. Harrison in the most respectful terms. It is these interchanges of courtesy, this unrestrained commingling in the social circle, that tends to soften the asperities of party

NEWSPAPERS IN CINCINNATI.—There are now published in Cincinnati, Ohio, no less than thirty-six newspapers and literary periodicals of all descriptions and characters. The circulation of some of the dailies exceeds one thousand, which fact we judge will tend to shorten the existence of a goodly number of them. In 1826 there were but nine newspapers and one periodical published there.

UNION OF THE CANADAS.—The Montreal papers of the 9th instant, contain the proclamation of Lord Sydenham, Governor General of British North America, declaring the union of the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, to take effect from the following day.

The following was the state of the Government Lands in Michigan up to January 1, 1841:

Acres sold ..... 9,159,898 Acres surveyed .. 19,665,957
" unsold ..... 31,318,391 " unsurveyed 11,462,400

The Senate of Pennsylvania on the 11th inst., passed with some amendments the bill authorizing the New-York and Erie Railroad Company to construct a portion of their road in Susquehanna County.

THE RICHMOND BANKS.—The Whig of the 11th, states that the Richmond Banks continued to pay cash. There was more call for specie on the preceding day, than on any day since resumption; yet the demand was inconsiderable.

A LADY once borrowed a Dictionary of an acquaintance, on returning the book she was asked how she liked it. "Oh!" replied the fair one, "the words are beautiful, but I do n't think much of the story."—[St. Joseph Times.]

MACKEREL FISHERY.—The number of barrels inspected last year, in Massachusetts, was 50,992. There has been a rapid falling off for many years. In 1831, 383,569 barrels were inspected.

EXTENSION OF LEAP YEAR.—The ladies of Nashville, Tenn., are busily employed in getting up a petition for the extension of leap year, to endow 1841 with all the rights and privileges of the bismextile. The cause of this movement is to be found in the stern stuff of which the hearts of the men in that quarter are composed, two years being necessary to subdue their obstinacy and contumaciousness.

We do not see that our Legislature is doing anything of importance to the people. Why don't it adjourn and the members come home?—[Onondaga Standard.]

We asked the same question last week.

TO AGENTS.

We can yet furnish new subscribers with back Nos. from the commencement of the 2d volume, quarto, 1st January, including the commencement of "Ten Thousand a Year," up to that time, in pamphlet form. Those who prefer to date their subscription from No. 16, are informed that we have a few sets from that number, with which commences the above story, and which can be bound with the second volume.

CASE OF L'AMISTAD.

In the Senate on Friday last, says the Washington Globe of Monday evening, a message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting copies of correspondence between the State Department and the representatives of foreign Governments, relative to the negroes taken on board L'Amistad, which has occurred since his message of the 21st March, 1840.

From the correspondence we extract a letter of Mr. Fox, the Minister of Great Britain, and the reply thereto of Mr. Forsyth.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20, 1841.

SIR: I am instructed to represent to you that the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been seriously directed to the case of certain African negroes, found on board the Spanish ship "Amistad," the same persons whose cause has been brought before the courts of law of the U. States, and for whom a powerful and humane interest appears to be felt in this country as well as in England.

It is known to Her Majesty's Government that these negroes were imported into Cuba direct from the coast of Africa, in a Portuguese slave vessel called the Tecora, in the summer of 1839, and that, shortly after their arrival, they were purchased as slaves at the Havana by two Spaniards of the names of José Ruiz and Pedro Montez. Ruiz and Montez then placed the negroes on board the schooner Amistad, intending to convey them to another port in Cuba. It appears that during the voyage, the negroes, with a view of recovering their liberty, seized possession of the vessel, put the master to death, and ordered the remaining whites to navigate the vessel to the coast of Africa. The whites, however, directed their course towards North America, until they were fallen in with by the United States brig of war Washington, when the Amistad was finally brought into the port of New London, in Connecticut. The proceedings which have taken place subsequently to the arrival of the negroes in the United States are sufficiently well known to you.

Now, Her Majesty's Government have to observe, that, since the year 1830, it has become unlawful, according to the law of Spain, to import negroes from Africa as slaves into the Spanish dominions, and that, as the negroes here referred to had been newly imported from Africa into Cuba, and could not by law be imported as slaves, they must in the eye of the law be considered as free persons.

And Great Britain is also bound to remember that the law of Spain which finally prohibited the slave trade throughout the Spanish dominions, from the date of the 30th of May, 1830, (the provisions of which law are contained in the King of Spain's Royal Cedula of the 19th of December, 1817,) was passed in compliance with a treaty obligation to that effect, by which the crown of Spain had bound itself to the crown of Great Britain, and for which a valuable compensation, in return, was given by Great Britain to Spain, as may be seen by reference to the 2d, 3d and 4th articles of a public treaty concluded between Great Britain and Spain on the 23d of September, 1817.

Her Majesty's Government, therefore, are moved by special and peculiar reasons to take an interest in the fate of these unfortunate Africans, who are known to have been illegally and feloniously reduced to slavery by subjects of Spain.

It is next to be observed that Great Britain and the United States have mutually engaged themselves to each other, by the 10th article of the treaty of Ghent, to use their best endeavors for the entire abolition of the African slave trade. And there can be no doubt of the firm intention of both parties religiously to fulfil the terms of that engagement.

Now the unfortunate Africans whose case is the subject of the present representation, have been thrown by accidental circumstances into the hands of the authorities of the United States; and it may probably depend upon the action of the United States Government, whether these persons shall recover the freedom to which they are entitled, or whether they shall be reduced to slavery, in violation of known laws and contracts publicly passed, prohibiting the continuance of the African slave trade by Spanish subjects.

It is under these circumstances that Her Majesty's Government anxiously hopes that the President of the United States will find himself empowered to take such measures in behalf of the aforesaid Africans as shall secure to them the possession of their liberty, to which, without doubt, they are by law entitled.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurances of my distinguished consideration. H. S. Fox.

The Hon. John Forsyth, &c. &c. &c.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, Feb. 1, 1841.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th ultimo, in which you state that you are instructed to represent to me that the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been seriously directed to the cause of the negroes of the Spanish ship "Amistad," with the anxious hope that the President of the United States will feel himself empowered to take such measures in their behalf as will secure to them the possession of their liberty.

Viewing this communication as an evidence of the benevolence of Her Majesty's Government—under which aspect alone it could be entertained by the Government of the United States—I proceed by the direction of the President, to make, in reply, a few observations suggested by the topics of your letter. The narrative presented therein, of the circumstances which brought these negroes to our shores, is satisfactory evidence that Her Majesty's Government is aware that their introduction did not proceed from the wishes or directions of the Government of the United States. A formal demand having been made by the Spanish Minister for the delivery of the vessel and property, including the negroes on board, the grounds upon which it is based have become the subject of investigation before the judicial tribunals of the country, which have not yet pronounced their final decision thereupon. You must be aware, sir, that the Executive has neither the power nor the disposition to control the proceedings of the legal tribunals when acting within their appropriate jurisdiction. With regard to the other considerations presented by you in behalf of the negroes of the "Amistad," I have to remark that it is not understood that the facts upon which they are founded are admitted by the Minister of Her Catholic Majesty; and this Government would, with great reluctance, erect itself into a tribunal to investigate such questions between two friendly sovereigns.

If, however, these facts are established, they cannot be without their force and effect in the proper time and place. You have doubtless observed, from the correspondence published in a Congressional document, that it is the intention of the Spanish Minister to restore these negroes, should their delivery to his Government be ordered, to the Island of Cuba, whence the vessel, in which they were found, sailed; where they will be placed under the protection of the Government of Spain. It is there that questions arising under the Spanish laws and the treaties of Spain with Great Britain, may be appropriately discussed and decided; and where a full opportunity will be presented to the Government of Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain to appeal to the treaty stipulations applicable to the subject of your letter.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurances of my distinguished consideration. JOHN FORSYTH.

Henry Stephen Fox, Esq., &c. &c. &c.

ESTABLISHMENT FOR THE CONSTRUCTION OF STEAM-SHIPS OF WAR IN MASSACHUSETTS.—It is proposed to establish a National Foundry, and a Yard for the construction of Steam Engines and Steam Ships of War, in Boston Harbor. The extensive and valuable lands, now and long since owned by the United States Government, in Chelsea, have been pointed out as the most suitable site for the purpose, in the county of Suffolk. These lands consist of from seventy to ninety acres, exclusive of flats; and for a long distance, border on the water—their shores being constantly washed by the waves of the Upper Harbor and those of the Mystic River. They are nearly opposite the Navy Yard in Charlestown, and for the present contain only two or three buildings—one of which is occupied as a Naval Hospital—the Marine Hospital in Chelsea being situated in another part of the town.

UNITED STATES BANK.—The United States Gazette states that the Directors of the Bank of the United States have prepared a memorial to the Legislature, and sent it forward, setting forth the causes which have operated to defeat their unopposed exertions to maintain specie payments, according to the requisition of the act of February, 1840. They have referred to the unholy combination in New York to break down the banking interests in Philadelphia, and have pointed to the direct advantages which the commonwealth has derived from the funds of the United States Bank. The memorial is said to be written with remarkable vigor, and contains facts which cannot fail to give full force to the arguments of its author. The Bank asks for itself what is asked for the other banks, and no more.

MISSISSIPPI LEGISLATURE.—On the 27th ult., the Mississippi House of Representatives passed, by a large majority, a series of resolutions, declaring that the State of Mississippi is bound to redeem her bonds; that she will redeem them and preserve her faith inviolate; and that all insinuations to the contrary are a calumny upon her justice, honor and dignity.

On the 30th the resolutions instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives of the State in Congress to vote for a General Bankrupt Law was passed by a vote of 47 to 36.

LIBERALITY.—A donation of $12,000 has been made to the Centre College, Ky., by one individual, for the endowment of a professorship in that institution. The donor acquired his property by a life of industry and economy as a farmer, and though destitute himself of any peculiar advantages of education, he desired to facilitate the attainment of those advantages by others.

SHIP BUILDING IN MAINE.—The tonnage of new vessels built in Maine last year was 27,705 60 tons, being more than any other in the Union—consisting of 26 ships, 48 brigs, 68 schooners, and 3 steamboats.

NEW YORK AND VIRGINIA.—A select Committee of the Virginia House of Delegates have reported in favor of an inspection law, to prevent the citizens of New York from carrying off Virginia slaves in their vessels.

LOUISIANA.—An act has passed the Legislature of the State of Louisiana to authorize the taking of the sense of the people of that State as to the propriety of calling a convention of the people to alter its Constitution.

NEW YORK MERCANTILE LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.—This Institution has now 3,586 members. Its Library consists of 32,296 volumes, besides 115 periodicals and journals; both foreign and domestic.

NEW-YORK BANK FOR SAVINGS.—From the 22d annual report of this useful Institution, situated in Chambers st., it appears that the deposits during the year 1840 amounted to $1,095,388. Number of deposits, 16,469; of which 4007 were by new depositors. Of the whole number, 1003 were domestic, 500 were laborers, 179 tailors, 172 sempstresses, 165 carpenters, 160 shoe-makers, &c., &c. There was drawn out during the year, in 13,687 sums, $925,190.

THE McLEOD AFFAIR.—The British Colonist of Feb. 3 says that "Governor Arthur has forwarded despatches to the Governor General, and also to Mr. Fox, British Minister at Washington, in reference to the recent proceedings at Lockport in relation to this individual."

RAILROADS.—There are 3319 miles of railroad in use in the United States, constructed at a cost of $86,000,000, and yielding an average of about 5 1/2 per cent.; 1802 miles more are in progress of completion; and the whole number of miles projected, including finished and unfinished, and routes examined, is nearly 10,000.

A FOREIGN CALL.—The Churchman states that the Rt. Rev. Bishop Doane has been invited to preach the Consecration sermon at the opening of the Rev. Dr. Hook's church, in Leeds, Eng., and that he will sail hence for that purpose in July.

THE Senate of Virginia is still engaged in discussing the propriety of electing another U. S. Senator this session.

MR. WEBSTER.—The Boston papers of Wednesday contain Mr. Webster's letter to the Governor of Massachusetts, in which he resigns the office of U. S. Senator; in consequence (of course) of having been appointed Secretary of State, by General Harrison. The resignation takes effect on the 22d inst. Mr. Webster has held the office which he now resigns for fourteen years. The letter is couched in plain, manly terms; and is just what would have been expected from such a man on such an occasion. It was presented to the Legislature by Gov. Davis on the 16th inst.

THE Small Note Bill passed the Virginia Senate on Tuesday by a large majority. An amendment was moved to relieve the mother banks from the requisition to redeem the issues of branches and vice versa, but the motion was defeated by 13 to 14. An amendment was adopted requiring the North Western Bank to accept the provisions of the bill, (which prohibits the issue of Post notes,) providing that if it refuses, its notes shall not be received in payment of dues to the Commonwealth.

LEVIATHAN NEW WORLD SECOND NUMBER.

THE LARGEST AND HANDSOMEST NEWSPAPER EVER ISSUED—TO CONTAIN FORTY-FOUR COLUMNS OF PRINTED MATTER, EACH COLUMN ABOUT FOUR FEET IN LENGTH, SPLENDIDLY ILLUSTRATED WITH ORIGINAL ENGRAVINGS, PREPARED EXPRESSLY FOR THIS PAPER.

On the third day of March next we shall publish the second Number of the Leviathan New World; of which an edition of

will be struck off—orders for TWENTY THOUSAND copies having already been received. From this fact, it will be apparent that even this immense edition will be insufficient to supply further orders from the country, unless they are speedily sent in; since, after the day of publication, it will be impracticable to meet a demand other than that which exists in the cities. Agents and individuals are therefore solicited to write immediately and specify the number of copies they wish forwarded.

The number will contain, among other splendid pictorial illustrations, a graphic representation of the Emperor Napoleon, as he appeared in his coffin, when it was first opened. Around stand the Prince de Joinville, Bertrand and the other officers. The scene is very impressive. It shows a tent, before the lifted folds of which stands a sentinel, stopping upon his march of duty to gaze in upon the dead Emperor. The likeness is admirable. Accompanying this will be the best description ever given—wholly new in this country; with a magnificent poem by Victor Hugo, either translated or in the original French.

Also, a new and original story, written expressly for this sheet, by the popular author of MAY MARTIN, or the MERRY DOGGERS and the GREEN MOUNTAIN BOYS, entitled THE SHAKER LOVERS.

Also, a new story, by Miss Metford, author of Our Village, now first published.

Also, the best contents of the English Magazines for February, and new works, which will be received by the Boston steamer.

Our great effort shall be directed to the making of this immense sheet, perfectly fresh in all respects, so that it may not contain a single article which can have been previously seen in this country.

Terms.—Single copies 12 1/2 cents each; ten copies, $1 one hundred copies, $8. All orders from the country must be free of postage or other charges. Address

J. WINCHESTER, New World Office,
39 Ann street, New-York

THE PAWNBROKER.

Heads of the People.

THE PAWNBROKER.

BY DOUGLAS JERROLD.

There would seem a kind of ignominy in the calling of a Pawnbroker. He is the rejected of all men. Albeit he may be a thriving tradesman, a man of scrupulous dealing, and high moral purpose, he nevertheless enjoys no part of that general respect, unaffectedly and freely avowed by the customer towards other upright dealers. There appears to be a tacit compact in society, to affect an ignorance of the very existence of a Pawnbroker. His merits are never canvassed—no man has, or ever had, a personal knowledge of him. The reader shall confess to the truth of this. Men are prone to vaunt the rectitude, the talents of their tradesmen. "My wine-merchant," "My bootmaker," ever "My attorney;" but who ever yet startled the delicacy of a company, with "My Pawnbroker?" No; it is the fate of our subject to do what good he does unknown: in gloomy precincts, and often with low, muttering voice, to eke out his benevolence to the whispering, trembling, broken-hearted, bronze-faced, desperate suppliants, that, by turns, from the bolted privacy of his boxes—miserable pulpits, whence poverty and crime put up their prayers to Mammon—beg and demand the good man's courtesies. And save amongst the very poor—and of what worth are the praises of penury!—who trumpets forth the conscience, the fair-dealing of the Pawnbroker? "What a capital coat! Who's your tailor?" This is the frequent admiration—a common query. But who, missing the diamond from the finger of an acquaintance; who, seeing not the yard of glittering gold chain in its wonted place; who, though at the time he may need the services of a conscientious money-dealer—who thinks of venturing to the late possessor of the ring, "who is your Pawnbroker?"

The Pawnbroker of our day, vulgar and common-place as he is, has picturesque forefathers. The ancestry of Mammon is

"Mysteriously remote and high."

There were Pawnbrokers in Thebes—money-lenders, where now the jackal prowls, in Tadmor; but they were the Pawnbrokers for the rich—not the bankers for the poor: they in their houses heaped "—pearls like pebble stones;

Received them free, and sold them by the weight;
Bags of sory opals, sapphires, amethysts,
Jacinths, hard topas, grave-green emeralds,
Beauteous rubies, sparkling diamonds,
And sold 'em soon costly stones."

The ancient Pawnbroker was a human harpy, living on human bowels: modern legislation hath pared his claws and cast about his calling the cloak of respectability. Indeed, the money-lending family have suffered great mutations, now trafficking openly with princes, and now sneaking, like spiders in dark corners, feeding on their victims.

Who that sees the snug, self-complacent modern—the Peter Jones Pawnbroker of Seven Dials—thinks of his great commercial ancestors, the Lombard merchants? More than five hundred years ago, they flourished in our city, and their name—musical as ringing gold—the synonym of wealth, still glides a city quarter.

The Pawnbroker hath suffered from the civilisation of mankind. Some century or two ago, and there was, indeed, a mystery in his dealings; now they are made open, exposed to the world, by the world's lanterns—the two houses of Parliament. The time was, when, at the mercy of the Levite, the poor man was eaten up at leisure; his poverty made him an outlaw, a vagabond to be destroyed piecemeal by usury. Now he knows at least the extent of his sacrifice, the loss defined and made manifest by the statutes. There was a secrecy in the dealings of the bygone money-lender; the tribe dwelt in holes and corners, carrying on their "dreadful trade" in nooks and cellars. They wrote up no "Money Lent," save what avarice had written in their faces; they exposed no symbols of their calling, save their breathing carcass. They sacrificed to Mammon as it were a forbidden shrine, and, amidst the world's distrust and bitterest contempt, filled their money-bags to bursting. Then the trade of the Pawnbroker, albeit the name was not, was unrecognised by the law, and the rate of interest varied with the mercy of the lender, who may have securely levied fifty, seventy per cent., though every leaf of his ledger was (the pious custom of the day) emblazoned with a Lous Deo! At length, the law stepped in; and in process of days the Pawnbroker became what he now is, a respectable, though, as we have before hinted, an unacknowledged tradesman. He lives not in the allowance of the men who compose what they call decent society; whilst the excellent people who wear diamonds, and dine off three courses, have never heard of the Pawnbrokers—save, indeed, in a novel or at a playhouse. No, though he may render the dearest service at the dearest time; though he may be the sole surviving, the only friend in need—none but the poor acknowledge the acquaintance of the Pawnbroker. Honest penury and careless vice feel no qualms, but give a "good den" to the tradesman; but a respectable man was never yet discovered to have known him. Believe it, worldly respectability may by accident have had acquaintanceship with convicted felony; nay, may blush not to own a past connection with some distinguished assassin, before the ferocity of the unfortunate man was found out: there is no peril to a man's name in such personal knowledge; on the contrary, it may for a time invest him with a very curious interest; but to know a Pawnbroker is fatal ignominy indeed. On this fact all men are so strongly united, that, we repeat it, no prudent, respectable person can know a Pawnbroker; for if he should confess to the knowledge, who, in the name of all the divinities respectable, who would continue to know him?

The Pawnbroker being made a common-place by the law; being divested of all his ancient, picturesque mysteriousness, and compelled by the unimaginative legislature, to carry on his calling in the eye of the world—we are to consider him rather as one of a number, than as the sole object of our attention. He is only to be viewed as affected by the variety of his customers, as a part and portion of their necessities.

To the Pawnbroker, the civility almost essential to the thrift of other tradesmen, is wholly superfluous. He places no quickened shopman at the door, no tenacious solicitor of the lingering customer to enter and trade. Not he: he stands in his shop, the deputy of Mammon; his customers are not to be wheedled, coaxed, grinned at, protested to; he need not bow his back, or crush his face up into smiling wrinkles, at the hesitating purchaser. No; his customers—the people who contribute to him thirty per cent.—for the most part address him with a respectful meekness; many with a shame-faced hesitation, as though they begged his aid, the free-offering of his money, no pledge, no profitable hostage left. Other tradesmen make it part of their craft to presume the possession of wealth in their customers: to the Pawnbroker, they come, the best of them for the time, branded with the mark of necessity. How different that face—how different that sweet, meek countenance, from the face of five years since! It is a lady, a young creature, with sorrow at her heart; a fair thing, with that suffering, yet resigned look of grief, more profoundly touching than the wildest anguish. With the gentle, yet hesitating grace of the lady, and a faint smile at her lip, she presents a small trinket to the Pawnbroker: how different the money-lender's manner from the oppressive obsequiousness of the jeweller who, five years since, sold the locket to her! The tradesman, with a cold eye, turns over the trinket; whilst the woman—it is almost the last of her few ornaments, and there is poverty, and hungry babes at home—finds herself waiting, with stunted breath, the sentence of the Pawnbroker. At length he condescended to ask, "What do you want on this?" and—God help her!—her heart is eased at the condescension.

The Pawnbroker may, from the independence of his calling, by his exemption from the idle courtesies amissously cultivated by other tradesmen, be as jocular as his native wit will allow him with many of his well-known customers. Again and again he may crack his joke upon the coat withdrawn on the Saturday for the Sabbath wear, and duly returned to his safe guardianship on the Monday. Coats will wear out, the new will lose its gloss, and the Pawnbroker will have his joke upon the frailty of broad-cloth, and, joking, offer less and less upon the fading raiment. As for the wife, who for the twentieth time hath left the coat in pledge, she must good-humoredly fence with the wit of the Pawnbroker, who carries the pleasantry just as far as suits his humor, ending the parley with an emphatic avowal, not to lend a farthing more, gruffly bidding the woman "take the rag away." He knows she cannot take it away; and, therefore, she resignedly receives both the impertinence of the shopkeeper and the money he vouchsafes her. Strange, that tradesmen should so differ in manners! How very civil was Lubin Gosling, the tailor who made that coat!

The Pawnbroker is a sort of King Midas in a squalid neighborhood; he is a potentate sought by the poor, who bear with his jests, his insolence, his brutality: who, in tatters, bow down to him; and with want in all their limbs, with empty bellies and despairing hearts, make court to him, that he will be pleased to let them eat. What offerings are made to him! How is he prayed, implored, to see some value in that which he inexorably deems worthless; to coin, for a time, a shilling out of some miserable vestment—its owner stands shivering in the box for the want of it;—to advance sixpence on some household necessary. How can the Pawnbroker deal in the courtesies of trade? His daily petitioner is want, with tiger appetite, reckless, abandoned, self-doomed vice, and moody despair. Life to him is so often "turned the seamy side without," that he must needs be made callous by the hard nature of his calling. How is it possible to deal, to chaffer with hungry misery, beseeching for bread as though it were immortal manna, yet keep alive the natural sensibilities of the human heart? How can we drive a bargain with despair, turning the penny with the complacency of a stockbroker? How bate down wretchedness, how huckster with famine?—yet this is the daily business of the Pawnbroker! To him,

"The human heart is just one pound of flesh."

The shop is thronged: every box save one is full! What faces stare upon the man of money: how entreatingly the shopmen are besought—yet how noiselessly do they perform their duties! An hour may pass, and but a few low words spoken, with now and then the sound of money on the counter. Hush! How quickly that bolt was shot! The last box is filled. A lady entered it; and it is plain to be seen, that for the first time she is in the shop of a Pawnbroker. Poor thing! Affluence rocked her cradle: for time, as she grew up, waited on her lightest wish; the whole world was to her a fairy-ground. She never knew the touch of sorrow, and want was to her but a sound. She is now a wife; and comes, for the first time, with a piece of plate, that—for there is death hovering about her hearth—she may pay doctors' fees! She feels, as she presents the plate to the shopman, like a thief. The man glances at her. "Good God!" she thinks, "can he suspect such a thing?" The Pawnbroker gives the sum required, and the lady, with scorching face, hurries from the shop. But, oh! the feelings of shame and degradation that possessed her in those brief minutes! Terrible things have been written on dungeon walls; terrible, sickening evidences of human misery and human vice; but if on the partitions of these boxes could be writ the emotions of those who have waited near them, the writing would be no less fearful than that traced in the Bastille—graven in the Piombi.

That the Pawnbroker should fail to take rank with other tradesmen employed by the nobility, gentry, and public in general, arises from the wholesome disgust implanted in us of a show of poverty. A man may more safely confess to any moral want, than a want of money. Therefore, the Pawnbroker, though so often a benefactor of his race, lives unthanked, unacknowledged, but, happily for him, not unrewarded. Could the History of Pawning be faithfully written, and, after the fashion of the times, duly decked with portraits illustrative of the subject; we doubt not that the world would stare at the likenesses. How acquaintance might marvel at acquaintance! and how folks—such respectable people, too—would stand convicted of the heinous crime of having sometimes wanted a guinea.

"I'll tell you what we'll do, love," said Mrs. Argent to her husband—in the world's opinion they were folks of the very first respectability; they were accustomed to give such charming dinners, such pleasant, tasteful suppers—"I'll tell you what we'll do, when we get this lump of money."

"What shall we do, my love?" asked the quiet Mr. Argent.

"Why, my dear," replied his politic wife, "it's some time since we had any body, and so I propose, directly you get this money, that we take the plate out of pawn, and give a party!"

Could Harlequin, with a flourish of his wand, change the wooden partitions of the Pawnbroker's boxes into glass, how their tenants might stare at one another! How the thief, but newly escaped with the stolen watch, might leer at the lady about to deposit her repeater—how the fine gentleman start at costermonger.

At the first blush, there seems some fear that a writer who treats on this subject must suffer, in the world's opinion, from a conviction of his personal experience in the matter; but when it is remembered, that pamphlets on "the Corn Laws," "the Currency," &c., are every day published by men with no practical knowledge whatever of the theme on which they treat, it is modestly hoped by the writer of this paper that he shall be numbered amongst those ingenuous individuals.

MASTER HUMPHREY'S CLOCK.

PARTS LXI, LXII, LXIII, LXIV.

CHAPTER LXVI.

On awaking in the morning, Richard Swiveller became conscious by slow degrees of whispering voices in his room. Looking out between the curtains, he espied Mr. Garland, Mr. Abel, the notary and the single gentleman gathered round the Marchioness, and talking to her with great earnestness but in very subdued tones—fearing, no doubt, to disturb him. He lost no time in letting them know that this precaution was unnecessary, and all four gentlemen directly approached his bedside. Old Mr. Garland was the first to stretch out his hand, and inquire how he felt.

Dick was about to answer that he felt much better, though still as weak as need be, when his little nurse, pushing the visitors aside and pressing up to his pillow as if in jealousy of their interference, set his breakfast before him, and insisted on his taking it before he underwent the fatigue of speaking, or of being spoken to. Mr. Swiveller, who was perfectly ravenous, and had had, all night, amazingly distinct and consistent dreams of mutton chops, double stout, and similar delicacies, felt even the weak tea and dry toast such irresistible temptations, that he consented to eat and drink upon one condition.

"And that is," said Dick, returning the pressure of Mr. Garland's hand, "that you answer me this question truly before I take a bit or drop. Is it too late?"

"For completing the work you began so well last night?" returned the old gentleman, "No. Set your mind at rest upon that point. It is not, I assure you."

Comforted by this intelligence, the patient applied himself to his food with a keen appetite, though evidently not with a greater zest in the eating than his nurse appeared to have in seeing him eat. The manner of his meal was this:—Mr. Swiveller, holding the slice of toast or cup of tea in the left hand, and taking a bite or drink as the case might be, constantly kept, in his right, one palm of the Marchioness tight locked; and to shake, or even to kiss this imprisoned hand, he would stop every now and then, even in the act of swallowing, with perfect seriousness of intention, and the utmost gravity. As often as he put any thing into his mouth, whether for eating or drinking the face of the Marchioness lighted up beyond all description! but whenever he gave her one or the other of these tokens of recognition, her countenance became overshadowed, and she began to sob. Now, whether she was in her laughing joy or in her crying one, the Marchioness could not help turning to her visitors with an appealing look, which seemed to say, "You see this fellow—can I help this?"—and they being thus made, as it were, parties to the scene, as regularly answered by another look, "No. Certainly not." This dumb-show taking place during the whole of the invalid's breakfast, and the invalid himself, pale and emaciated, performing no small part in the same, it may be fairly questioned whether at any meal, where no word, good or bad was spoken from beginning to end, so much was expressed by gestures in themselves so slight and unimportant.

At length—and to say the truth before very long—Mr. Swiveller had despatched as much toast and tea as in that stage of his recovery it was discreet to let him have. But the cares of the Marchioness did not stop here; for, disappearing for an instant and presently returning with a basin of fair water, she laved his face and hands, brushed his hair, and in short made him as spruce and smart as any body under such circumstances could be made; and all this in as brisk and business-like a manner, as if he were a very little boy, and she his grown up nurse. To these various attentions, Mr. Swiveller submitted in a kind of grateful amazement beyond the reach of language. When they were at last brought to an end, and the Marchioness had withdrawn into a distant corner to take her own poor breakfast (cold enough by that time) he turned his face away for some few moments and shook hands heartily with the air.

"Gentlemen," said Dick, rousing himself from this pause, and turning round again, "you'll excuse me. Men who have been brought so low as I have been, are easily fatigued. I am fresh again now, and fit for talking. We're short of chairs here, among other trifles, but if you'll do me the favor to sit upon the bed—"

"What can we do for you?" said Mr. Garland kindly. "If you could make the Marchioness yonder, a Marchioness, in real, sober earnest," returned Dick, "I'd thank you to get it done off-hand. But as you can't, and as the question is not what you will do for me, but what you will do for somebody else who has a better claim upon you, pray, sir, let me know what you intend doing."

"It's chiefly on that account that we have come just now," said the single gentleman, "for you will have another visitor presently. We feared you would be anxious unless you knew from ourselves what steps we intended to take, and therefore came to you before we stirred in the matter."

"Gentlemen," returned Dick, "I thank you. Any body in the helpless state that you see me in, is naturally anxious. Do n't let me interrupt you, sir."

"Then you see, my good fellow," said the single gentleman, "that while we have no doubt whatever of the truth of this disclosure, which has so providentially come to light—"

"Meaning here?" said Dick, pointing toward the Marchioness.

"—Meaning hers, of course. While we have no doubt of that, or that a proper use of it would procure the poor lad's immediate pardon and liberation, we have a great doubt whether it would, by itself, enable us to reach Quilp, the chief agent in this villany. I should tell you that this doubt has been confirmed into something very nearly approaching certainty by the best opinions we have been enabled, in this short space of time, to take upon the subject. You'll agree with us, that to give him even the most distant chance of escape, if we could help it, would be monstrous. You say with us, no doubt, if somebody must escape, let it be any one but he."

"Yes," returned Dick, "certainly. That is, if somebody must—but upon my word, I'm unwilling that any body should. Since laws were made for every degree, to curb vice in others as well as in me—and so forth you know—does n't it strike you in that light?"

The single gentleman smiled as if the light in which Mr. Swiveller put the question were not the clearest in the world, and proceeded to explain that they contemplated proceeding by stratagem in the first instance; and that their design was to endeavor to extort a confession from the gentle Sarah.

"When she finds how much we know, and how we know it," he said, "and that she is clearly compromised already, we are not without strong hopes that we may be enabled through her means to punish the other two effectually. If we could do that, she might go scot-free for aught I cared."

Dick received this project in any thing but a gracious manner, representing with as much warmth as he was then capable of showing, that they would find the old buck (meaning Sarah) more difficult to manage than Quilp himself—that for any tampering, terrifying, or cajolery, she was a very unpromising and unyielding subject—that she was a kind of brass not easily melted or moulded into shape—in short, that they were no match for her, and would be signally defeated. But it was in vain to urge them to adopt some other course. The single gentleman has been described as explaining their joint intentions, but it should have been written that they all spoke together; that if any one of them by chance held his peace for a moment, he stood gasping and panting for an opportunity to strike in again; in a word that they had reached that pitch of impatience and anxiety where men can neither be persuaded nor reasoned with; and that it would have been easier to turn the most impetuous wind that ever blew, than to prevail on them to reconsider their determination. So, after telling Mr. Swiveller how they had not lost sight of Kit's mother and the children; how they had never once even lost sight of Kit himself, but had been unremitting in their endeavors to procure a mitigation of his sentence; how they had been perfectly distracted between the strong proofs of his guilt, and their own fading hopes of his innocence; and how he, Richard Swiveller, might keep his mind at rest, for every thing should be happily adjusted between that time and night—after telling him all this, and adding a great many kind and cordial expressions, personal to himself, which it is unnecessary to recite, Mr. Garland, the notary, and the single gentleman, took their leave at a very critical time, or Richard Swiveller must assuredly have been driven into another fever, whereof the results might have been fatal.

Mr. Abel remained behind, very often looking at his watch and at the room door, until Mr. Swiveller was roused from a short nap, by the setting down on the landing-place outside, as from the shoulders of a porter, of some giant load, which seemed to shake the house, and make the little physic bottles on the mantle-shelf ring again. Directly this sound reached his ears, Mr. Abel started up, and hobbled to the door, and opened it; and behold! there stood a strong man, with a mighty hamper, which being hauled into the room and presently unpacked, disgorged such treasures of tea, and coffee, and wine, and rusks, and oranges, and grapes, and fowls ready trussed for boiling, and calves'-foot jelly, and arrow-root, and sago, and other delicate restoratives, that the small servant, who had never thought it possible that such things could be, except in shops, stood rooted to the spot in her one shoe, with her mouth and eyes watering in unison, and her power of speech quite gone. But not so Mr. Abel; or the strong man who opted the hamper, big as it was, in a twinkling; and not so the nice old lady, who appeared so suddenly that she might have come out of the hamper too, (it was quite large enough,) and who, bustling about on tip-toe, and without noise—now here, now there, now everywhere at once—began to fill out the jelly in tea-cups, and to make chicken-broth in small sauce-pans, and to peel oranges for the sick man, and to cut them up in little pieces, and to ply the small servant with glasses of wine and choice bits of every thing until more substantial meat could be prepared for her refreshment. The whole of which appearances were so unexpected and bewildering, that Mr. Swiveller, when he had taken two oranges, and a little jelly, and had seen the strong man walk off with the empty basket, plainly leaving all that abundance for his use and benefit, was fain to lie down and fall asleep again, from sheer inability to entertain such wonders in his mind.

Meanwhile, the single gentleman, the Notary and Mr. Garland, repaired to a certain coffee-house, and from that place indicted and sent a letter to Miss Sally Brass, requesting her in terms mysterious and brief, to favor an unknown friend who wished to consult her, with her company there as speedily as possible. The communication did its errand so well, that in ten minutes of the messenger's return and report of its delivery, Miss Brass herself was announced.

"Pray, ma'am," said the single gentleman, whom she found alone in the room, "take a chair."

Miss Brass sat herself down in a very stiff and frigid state and seemed—as indeed she was—not a little astonished to find that the lodger and her mysterious correspondent, were one and the same person.

"You did not expect to see me?" said the single gentleman.

"I did n't think much about it," returned the beauty.

"I supposed it was a business of some kind or other. If it's about the apartments, of course you'll give my brother regular notice, you know—or money. That's very easily settled. You're a responsible party, and in such a case lawful money and lawful notice are pretty much the same."

"I am obliged to you for your good opinion," retorted the single gentleman, "and quite concur in those sentiments. But that is not the subject on which I wish to speak to you."

"Oh!" said Sally. "Then just state the particulars, will you? I suppose it's a professional business?"

"Why, it is connected with the law, certainly."

"Very well," returned Miss Brass. "My brother and I are just the same. I can take any instructions, or give you any advice."

"As there are other parties interested besides myself," said the single gentleman, rising and opening the door of an inner room, "we had better confer together. Miss Brass is here, gentlemen!"

Mr. Garland and the Notary walked in, looking very gravely, and drawing up two chairs, one on each side of the single gentleman, formed a kind of fence round the gentle Sarah, and penned her into a corner. Her brother Sampson, under such circumstances, would certainly have evinced some confusion or anxiety, but she—all composure—pulled out the tin box and calmly took a pinch of snuff.

"Miss Brass," said the Notary, taking the word at this crisis, "we professional people understand each other, and, when we choose, can say what we have to say, in very few words. You advertised a runaway servant, the other day?"

"Well," returned Miss Sally, with a sudden flush overspreading her features, "what of that?"

"She is found, ma'am," said the Notary, pulling out his pocket handkerchief with a flourish, "She is found."

"Who found her?" demanded Sarah, hastily.

"We did, ma'am, we three. Only last night, or you would have heard from us before."

"And now I have heard from you," said Miss Brass, folding her arms resolutely, as though she were about to deny something to the death, "what have you got to say? Something you have got into your heads about her, of course. Prove it, will you—that's all. Prove it. You have found her, the most artful, lying, pilfering, and devilish little minx that was ever born. Have you got her here?" she added, looking sharply round.

"No, she is not here at present," returned the Notary.

"But she is quite safe."

"Ha!" cried Sally, twitching a pinch of snuff out of her box, as spitefully as if she were in the very act of wrenching off the small servant's nose; "she shall be safe enough from this time, I warrant you."

"I hope so," replied the Notary; "Did it not occur to you for the first time when you found she had run away, that there were two keys to your kitchen door?"

Miss Sally took another pinch, and putting her head on one side looked at her questioner with a curious kind of spasmodic about her mouth, but with a cunning aspect of immense expression.

"Two keys," repeated the Notary; "one of which gave her the opportunities of roaming through the house at nights when you supposed her fast locked up, and of overhearing confidential consultations—among others, that particular conference to be described to-day before a justice, which you will have an opportunity of hearing her relate; that conference which you and Mr. Brass held together on the night before that most unfortunate and innocent young man was accused of robbery, by a horrible device of which I will only say that it may be characterised by the epithets you have applied to this wretched little witness, and by a few stronger ones besides."

Sally took another pinch. Although her face was wonderfully composed, it was apparent that she had been taken by surprise, at that what she had expected to be taxed with, in connexion with her small servant, was something very different from this.

"Come, come, Miss Brass," said the Notary, "you have great command of feature, but you feel, I see, that by a chance which never entered your imagination, this base design is revealed, and two of its plotters must be brought to justice. Now, you know the pains and penalties you are liable to, and so I need not dilate upon them, but I have a proposal to make to you. You have the honor of being sister to one of the greatest scoundrels unhung; and, if I may venture to say so to a lady, you are in every respect quite worthy of him. But connected with you two is a third party, a villain of the name of Quilp, the prime mover of the whole diabolical device, who I believe to be worse than either. For his sake, Miss Brass, do us the favor to reveal the whole history of this affair. Let me remind you that your doing so at our instance will place you in a safe and comfortable position—your present one is not desirable—and cannot injure your brother, for against him and you we have quite sufficient evidence (as you hear) already. I will not say to you that we suggest this course in mercy, (for, to tell you the truth, we do not entertain any regard for you) but it is a necessity to which we are reduced, and I recommend it to you as a matter of the very best policy. Time," said Mr. Witherden, pulling out his watch, "in a business like this, is exceedingly precious. Favor us with your decision as speedily as possible, ma'am."

With a smile upon her face, and looking at each of the three by turns, Miss Brass took two or three more pinches of snuff, and having by this time very little left, traveled round and round the box with her fore-finger and thumb, scraping up another. Having disposed of this likewise and put the box carefully in her pocket, she said—

"I am to accept or reject at once, am I?"

"Yes," said Witherden.

The charming creature was opening her lips to speak in reply, when the door was hastily opened, too, and the head of Sampson Brass was thrust into the room.

"Excuse me," said that gentleman hastily. "Wait a bit."

So saying, and quite indifferent to the astonishment his presence occasioned, he crept in, shut the door, kissed his greasy glove as servilely as if it were the dust, and made a most abject bow.

"Sarah," said Brass, "hold your tongue if you please, and let me speak. Gentlemen, if I could express the pleasure it gives me to see three such men in a happy unity of feeling and concert of sentiment, I think you would hardly believe me. But though I am unfortunate—nay, gentlemen, criminal, if we are to use harsh expressions in a company like this—still I have my feelings like other men. I have heard of a poet, who remarked that feelings were the common lot of all. If he could have been a pig, gentlemen, and have uttered that sentiment, he would still have been immortal."

"If you're not an idiot," said Miss Brass, harshly, "hold your peace."

"Sarah, my dear," returned her brother, "thank you. But I know what I am about, my love, and will take the liberty of expressing myself accordingly. Mr. Witherden, sir, your handkerchief is hanging out of your pocket—would you allow me to—"

As Mr. Brass advanced to remedy this accident, the Notary shrunk from him with an air of great disgust. Brass, who, over and above his usual prepossessing qualities, had a scratched face, a green shade over one eye, and a hat grievously crushed, stopped short, and looked round with a pitiful smile.

"He shuns me," said Sampson, "even when I would, as I may say, heap coals of fire upon his head. Well! Ah! But I am a falling house, and the rats (if I may be allowed the expression in reference to a gentleman that I respect and love beyond every thing) fly from me. Gentlemen—regarding your conversation just now. I happened to see my sister on her way here, and wondering where she could be going to, and being—may I venture to say?—naturally of a suspicious turn, followed her. Since then I have been listening."

"If you are not mad," interposed Miss Sally, "stop there, and say no more."

"Sarah, my dear," rejoined Brass, with undiminished politeness, "I thank you kindly, but will still proceed. Mr. Witherden, sir, as we have the honor to be members of the same profession—to say nothing of that other gentleman having been my lodger, and having partaken, as one may say, of the hospitality of my roof—I think you might have given me the refusal of this offer in the first instance. I do, indeed. Now, my dear sir," cried Brass, seeing that the notary was about to interrupt him, "suffer me to speak, I beg."

Mr. Witherden was silent, and Brass went on.

"If you will do me the favor," he said, holding up the green shade, and revealing an eye most horribly discolored, "to look at this, you will naturally inquire in your own minds how did I get it. If you look from that to my face, you will wonder what could have been the cause of all these scratches. And if from them to my hat, how it came into the state in which you see it? Gentlemen," said Brass, striking the hat fiercely with his clenched hand, "to all these questions I answer—Quilp."

The three gentlemen looked at each other, but said nothing.

"I say," pursued Brass, glancing aside at his sister, as though he were talking for her information, and speaking with a snarling malignity, in violent contrast to his usual smoothness, "that I answer to all these questions—Quilp—Quilp, who deludes me into his infernal den, and takes a delight in looking on and chuckling while I scorch and burn, and bruise, and maim myself—Quilp, who never once, no, never once, in all our communications together, has treated me otherwise than as a dog—Quilp, whom I have always hated with my whole heart, but never so much as lately. He gives me the cold shoulder on this very matter as if he had had nothing to do with it, instead of being the first to propose it. I can't trust him. In one of his howling, raving, blazing humors, I believe he'd let it out if it was murder, and never think of himself so long as he could terrify me. Now," said Brass, picking up his hat again, replacing the shade over his eye, and actually crouching down, in the excess of his servility, "what does all this lead me to?—what should you say it led me to, gentlemen?—could you guess at all near the mark?"

Nobody spoke. Brass stood smirking for a little while, as if he had propounded some choice conundrum; and then said:

"To be short with you, then, it leads me to this. If the truth has come out, as it plainly has, in a manner that there's no standing up against—and a very sublime and grand thing is Truth, gentlemen, in its way, though like other sublime and grand things, such as thunder storms and all that, we're not always over and above glad to see it—I had better turn upon this man than let this man turn upon me. It's clear to me that I am done for. Therefore, if anybody is to split, I shall better be the person and have the advantage of it. Sarah, my dear, comparatively speaking, you're safe. I relate these circumstances for my own profit."

With that, Mr. Brass, in a great hurry, revealed the whole story; bearing as heavily as possible on his amiable employer, and making himself out to be rather a saint like and holy character, though subject—he acknowledged—to human weaknesses. He concluded thus:

"Now, gentlemen, I am not a man who does things by halves. Being in for a penny, I am ready, as the saying is, to be in for a pound. You must do with me what you please, and take me where you please. If you wish to have this in writing, we'll reduce it into manuscript immediately. You will be tender with me, I am sure. I am quite confident you will be tender with me. You are men of honor, and have feeling hearts. I yielded from necessity to Quilp, for though necessity has no law, she has her lawyers. I yield to you from necessity too; from policy besides: and because of feelings that have been a pretty long time working within me. Punish Quilp, gentlemen. Weigh heavily upon him. Grind him down. Tread him under foot. He has done as much by me for many and many a day."

Having now arrived at the conclusion of his discourse, Sampson checked the current of his wrath, kissed his glove again, and smiled as only parasites and cowards can.

"And this," said Miss Brass, raising her head, with which she had hitherto sat resting on her hands, and surveying him from head to foot with a bitter sneer, "this is my brother, is it? This is my brother that I have worked and toiled for, and believed to have had something of the man in him!"

"Sarah, my dear," returned Sampson, rubbing his hands feebly; "You disturb our friends. Besides you—you're disappointed, Sarah, and not knowing what you say, expose yourself."

"Yes, you pitiful dastard," retorted the lovely damsel, "I understand you. You feared that I should be beforehand with you. But do you think that I would have been enticed to say a word? I'd have scorned it, if they had tried and tempted me for twenty years."

"He, he!" simpered Brass, who in his deep debasement really seemed to have changed sexes with his sister, and to have made over to her any spark of manliness he might have possessed. "You think so, Sarah, you think so perhaps; but you would have acted quite different, my good fellow. You will not have forgotten that it was a maxim with Foxey—our reverend father, gentlemen—'Always suspect every body.' That's the maxim to go through life with! If you were not actually about to purchase your own safety when I showed myself, I suspect you'd have done it by this time. And therefore, I've done it myself, and spared you the trouble as well as the shame. The shame, gentlemen," added Brass, allowing himself to be slightly overcome, "if there is any, is mine. It's better that a female should be spared it."

With deference to the better opinion of Mr. Brass, and more particularly to the authority of his Great Ancestor, it may be doubted with humility whether the elevating principles laid down by the latter gentleman, and acted upon by his descendants, is always a prudent one, or attended in practice with the desired results. This is beyond question a bold and presumptuous doubt, inasmuch as many distinguished characters, called men of the world, long-headed customers, knowing dogs, shrewd fellows, capital hands at business, and the like, have made, and do daily make, this axiom their polar star and compass. Still the doubt may be gently insinuated. And in illustration it may be observed, that if Mr. Brass, not being over-suspicious, had, without prying and listening, left his sister to manage the conference on their joint behalf, or, prying and listening, had not been in such a mighty hurry to anticipate her (which he would not have done, but for his distrust and jealousy,) he would probably have found himself much better off in the end. Thus it will always happen that these men of the world, who go through it in armor, defend themselves from quite as much good as evil; to say nothing of the inconvenience and absurdity of mounting guard with a microscope at all times, and of wearing a coat of mail on the most innocent occasions.

The three gentlemen spoke together apart for a few moments. At the end of their consultation, which was very brief, the notary pointed to the writing materials on the table, and informed Mr. Brass that if he wished to make any statement in writing, he had an opportunity of doing so. At the same time he felt bound to tell him that they would require his attendance presently before a justice of the peace, and that in what he did or said, he was guided entirely by his own discretion.

"Gentlemen," said Brass, drawing off his gloves, and crawling in spirit upon the ground before them, "I will justify the tenderness with which I know I shall be treated; and as, without tenderness, I should, now that this discovery has been made, stand in the worse position of the three, you may depend upon it I shall make a clean breast. Mr. Witherden, sir, a kind of faintness is upon my spirits—if you would do me the favor to ring the bell and order up a glass of something warm and spicy, I shall, notwithstanding what has passed, have a melancholy pleasure in drinking your good health. I had hoped," said Brass, looking round with a mournful smile, "to have seen you three gentlemen one day or another with our legs under the mahogany in my humble parlor in the Marks. But hopes are fleeting. Dear me!"

Mr. Brass found himself so exceedingly affected at this point that he could say or do nothing more until some refreshment arrived. Having partaken of it pretty freely for one in his agitated state, he sat down to write.

The lovely Sarah, now with her arms folded, and now with her hands clasped behind her, paced the room with manly strides while her brother was thus employed, and sometimes stopped to pull out the snuff-box and bite the lid. She continued to pace up and down until she was quite tired, and then fell asleep on a chair near the door.

It has been since supposed, with some reason, that this slumber was a sham or feint, as she contrived to slip away unobserved in the dusk of the afternoon. Whether this was an intentional and waking departure, or a somnambulant leave-taking and walking in her sleep, may remain a subject of contention; but on one point (and indeed the main one) all parties are agreed. In whatever state she walked away, she certainly did not walk back again.

Mention having been made of the dusk of the afternoon, it will be inferred that Mr. Brass's task occupied some time in the completion. It was not finished until evening; but being done at last, that worthy and the three friends adjourned in a hackney-coach to a private office of a Justice, who, giving Mr. Brass a warm reception and detaining him in a secure place that he might ensure to himself the pleasure of seeing him on the morrow, dismissed the others with the cheering assurance that a warrant could not fail to be granted next day for the apprehension of Mr. Quilp, and that a proper application and statement of all the circumstances to the secretary of state (who was fortunately in town) would no doubt procure Kit's free pardon and liberation without delay.

And now, indeed, it seemed that Quilp's malignant career was drawing to a close, and that retribution, which often travels slowly—especially when heaviest—had tracked his footsteps with a sure and certain scent, and was gaining on him fast. Unmindful of her stealthy tread, her victim holds his course in fancied triumph. Still at his heels she comes, and once afoot is never turned aside.

Their business ended, the three gentlemen hastened back to the lodgings of Mr. Swiveller, whom they found progressing so favorably on his recovery as to have been able to sit up for half an hour, and to have conversed with cheerfulness. Mrs. Garland had gone home some time since, but Mr. Abel was still sitting with him. After telling him all they had done, the two Mr. Garlands and the single gentleman, as if by some previous understanding, took their leave for the night, leaving the invalid alone with the notary and the small servant.

"As you are so much better," said Mr. Witherden, sitting down at the bedside, "I may venture to communicate to you a piece of news which has come to me professionally."

The idea of any professional intelligence from a gentleman connected with legal matters appeared to afford Richard anything but a pleasing anticipation. Perhaps he connected it in his own mind with one or two outstanding accounts, in reference to which he had already received divers threatening letters. His countenance fell as he replied.

"Certainly, sir. I hope it's not anything of a very disagreeable nature, though."

"If I thought it so, I should choose some better time for communicating it," replied the notary. "Let me tell you, first, that my friends who have been here to-day know nothing of it, and that their kindness to you has been quite spontaneous and with no hope of return. It may do a thoughtless, careless man good to know that."

Dick thanked him, and he hoped it would.

"I have been making some inquiries about you," said Mr. Witherden, "little thinking that I should find you under such circumstance as those which have brought us together. You are the nephew of Rebecca Swiveller, spinster, deceased, of Cheshelbourne, in Dorsetshire."

"Deceased!" cried Dick.

"Deceased. If you had been another sort of nephew, you would have come into possession (so says the will, and I see no reason to doubt it,) of five-and-twenty thousand pounds. As it is, you have fallen into an annuity of one hundred and fifty pounds a year; but I think I may congratulate you even upon that."

"Sir," said Dick, sobbing and laughing together, "you may. For, please God, we'll make a scholar of the poor Marchioness yet! And she shall walk in silk attire, and siller have to spare, or may I never rise from this bed again!"

CHAPTER LXVII.

Unconscious of the proceedings faithfully narrated in the last chapter, and little dreaming of the mine which had sprung beneath him (for to the end that he should have no warning of the business afloat, the profoundest secrecy was observed in the whole transaction,) Mr. Quilp remained shut up in his hermitage; undisturbed by any suspicion, and extremely well satisfied with the result of his machinations. Being engaged in the adjustment of some accounts—an occupation to which the silence and solitude of his retreat were very favorable—he had not strayed from his den for two whole days. The third day of his devotion to this pursuit found him still hard at work, and little disposed to start abroad.

It was the next day after Mr. Brass's confession, and consequently that which threatened the restriction of Mr. Quilp's liberty, and the abrupt communication to him of some very unpleasant and unwelcome facts. Having no intuitive perception of the cloud which lowered upon his house, the dwarf was in his ordinary state of cheerfulness; and, when he found he was becoming too much engrossed by business, with a due regard to his health and spirits, he varied its monotonous routine with a little screeching, or howling, or some other innocent relaxation of that nature.

He was attended, as usual, by Tom Scott, who sat crouching over the fire after the manner of a toad, and from time to time, when his master's back was turned, imitated his grimaces with a fearful exactness. The figure-head had not yet disappeared, but remained in its old place. The face, horribly seared by the frequent application of the red hot poker, and further ornamented by the insertion in the tip of the nose of a tenpenny nail, yet smiled blandly in its less lacerated parts, but seemed, like a sturdy martyr, to provoke its tormentor to the commission of new outrages and insults.

The day, in the highest and brightest quarters of the town, was damp, dark, cold, and gloomy. In that low and marshy spot, the fog filled every nook and corner with a thick, dense cloud. Every object was obscured at one or two years' distance. The warning lights and fires upon the river were powerless beneath this pall, and but for a raw and piercing chilliness in the air, and now and then the cry of some bewildered boatman as he rested on his oars and tried to make out where he was, the river itself might have been miles away.

The mist, though sluggish and slow to move, was of a keenly searching kind. No muffling up in furs and broad-cloth kept it out. It seemed to penetrate into the very bones of the shrinking wayfarers, and to rack them with cold and pains. Every thing was wet and clammy to the touch. The warm blaze alone defied it, and leaped and sparkled merrily. It was a day to be at home, crowding about the fire, telling stories of revellers who had lost their way in such weather on heaths and moors; and to love a warm hearth more than ever.

The dwarf's humor, as we know, was to have a fireside to himself; and when he was disposed to be convivial, to enjoy himself alone. By no means inescapable to the comfort of being within doors, he ordered Tom Scott to pile the little stove with coals, and dismissing his work for that day, determined to be jovial.

To this end, he lighted up fresh candles and heaped more fuel on the fire; and having dined off a beef steak, which he cooked himself in somewhat of a savage and cannibal-like manner, brewed a great bowl of hot punch, lighted his pipe, and sat down to spend the evening.

At this moment a low knocking at the cabin-door arrested his attention. When it had been twice or thrice repeated, he softly opened the little window, and thrusting his head out, demanded who was there.

"Only me, Quilp," replied a woman's voice.

"Only you!" cried the dwarf, stretching his neck to obtain a better view of his visitor. "And what brings you here you jade? How dare you approach the ogre's castle, eh?"

"I have come with some news," rejoined his spouse. "Do n't be angry with me."

"Is it good news, pleasant news; news to make a man skip and snap his fingers?" said the dwarf. "Is the dear old lady dead?"

"I do n't know what news it is, or whether it's good or bad," rejoined his wife.

"Then she's alive," said Quilp, "and there's nothing the matter with her. Go home again, you bird of evil note, go home."

"I have brought a letter," cried the meek little woman.

"Toss it in at the window here, and go your ways," said Quilp, interrupting her, "or I'll go and scratch you."

"No, but please, Quilp—do hear me speak," urged his submissive wife, in tears. "Please do."

"Speak, then," growled the dwarf, with a malicious grin. "Be quick and short about it. Speak, will you?"

"It was left at our house this afternoon," said Mrs. Quilp, trembling, "by a boy who said he did n't know from whom it came, but that it was given him to leave, and that he was told to say it must be brought on to you directly, for it was of the very greatest consequence. But please," she added, as her husband stretched out his hand for it, "please let me in. You do n't know how wet and cold I am, or how many times I have lost my way in coming here through this thick fog. Let me dry myself at the fire for five minutes. I'll go away directly you tell me to, Quilp. Upon my word I will."

Her amiable husband hesitated for a few moments; but bethinking himself that the letter might require some answer, of which she could be the bearer, closed the window, opened the door, and bade her enter. Mrs. Quilp obeyed right willingly, and kneeling down before the fire to warm her hands, delivered into his a little packet.

"I'm glad your wet," said Quilp, snatching it, and squinting at her. "I'm glad you're cold. I'm glad you've lost your way. I'm glad your eyes are red with crying. It does my heart good to see your little nose so pinched and frosty."

"Oh Quilp!" sobbed his wife. "How cruel it is of you!"

"Did she think I was dead?" said Quilp, wrinkling his face into a most extraordinary series of grimaces. "Did she think she was going to have all the money, and to marry somebody she liked? Ha, ha, ha! Did she?"

These taunts elicited no reply from the poor woman, who remained on her knees, warming her hands and sobbing, to Mr. Quilp's great delight. But as he was contemplating her, and chuckling excessively, he happened to observe that Tom Scott was delighted too; whereof, that he might have no presumptuous partner in his glee, the dwarf instantly collared him, dragged him to the door, and after a short scuffle, kicked him into the yard. In return for this mark of attention, Tom immediately walked upon his hands to the window, and—if the expression be allowable—looked in with his shoes; besides rattling his feet upon the glass like a Banashie upside down. As a matter of course, Mr. Quilp lost no time in resorting to the infallible poker, with which, after some dodging and lying in ambush, he paid his young friend one or two such unequivocal complements that he vanished precipitately, and left him in quiet possession of the field.

"So! That little job being disposed of," said the dwarf coolly, "I'll read my letter. Humph!" he muttered, looking at the direction. "I ought to know this writing. Beautiful Sally!"

Opening it, he read in a fair, round, legal hand, as follows:

"Sammy has been practised upon, and has broken confidence. It has all come out. You had better not be in the way, for strangers are going to call upon you. They have been very quiet as yet, because they mean to surprise you. Don't lose time. I didn't. I am not to be found anywhere. If I was you, I wouldn't be, either. S. B. late of B. M."

To describe the changes that passed over Quilp's face as he read this letter over half a dozen times, would require some new language; such, for power of expression, as was never written or spoken. For a long time he did not utter one word; but after a considerable interval, during which Mrs. Quilp was almost paralysed with the alarm his looks engendered, he contrived to gasp out,

"—If I had him here. If I only had him here—"

"Oh Quilp!" said his wife, "what's the matter? Who are you angry with?"

"I should drown him," said the dwarf, not heeding her.

"Too easy a death, too short, too quick—but the river runs close at hand. Oh! If I had him here! Just to take him to the brink, coaxingly and pleasantly,—holding him by the button-hole—joking with him,—and with a sudden push, to send him splashing down! Drowning men come to the surface three times they say. Ah! To see him those three times, and to mock him in his face come bobbing up,—oh! what a rich treat that would be!"

"Quilp!" stammered his wife, venturing at the same time to touch him on the shoulder, "what has gone wrong?"

She was so terrified by the relish with which he pictured this pleasure to himself, that she could scarcely make herself intelligible.

"Such a bloodless ear!" said Quilp, rubbing his hands very slowly, and pressing them tight together. "I thought his cowardice and servility were the best guaranty for his keeping silence. Oh Brass, Brass—my dear, good, affectionate, faithful, complimentary, charming friend—if I only had you here?"

His wife, who had retreated lest she should seem to listen to these mutterings, ventured to approach him again, and was about to speak, when he hurried to the door and called Tom Scott, who, remembering his late gentle admonition, deemed it prudent to appear immediately.

"There!" said the dwarf, pulling him in. "Take her home. Do n't come here to-morrow, for this place will be shut up. Come back no more till you hear from me or see me. Do you mind?"

Tom nodded sulkily, and beckoned Mrs. Quilp to lead the way.

"As for you," said the dwarf, addressing himself to her, "ask no questions about me, make no search for me, say nothing concerning me. I shall not be dead, mistress, and that'll comfort you. He'll take care of you."

"But, Quilp, what is the matter? Where are you going? Do say something more!"

"I'll say that," said the dwarf, seizing her by the arm, "and do that too, which, undone and unsaid would be best for you, unless you go directly."

"Has anything happened?" cried his wife. "Oh! Do tell me that."

"Yes," snarled the dwarf. "No. What matter which? I have told you what to do. Woe betide you if you fail to do it, or disobey me a hair breadth. Will you go?"

"I am going, I'll go directly; but," faltered his wife, "answer me one question first. Has this letter any connection with dear little Nell? I must ask you that—I must, indeed, Quilp. You cannot think what days and nights of sorrow I have had through having once deceived that child. I do n't know what harm I may have brought about, but, great or little, I did it for you, Quilp. My conscience misgave me when I did it. Do answer me this question, if you please."

The exasperated dwarf returned no answer, but turned round and caught up his usual weapon with such vehemence, that Tom Scott dragged his charge away by main force, and as swiftly as he could. It was well he did so, for Quilp, who was nearly mad with rage, pursued them to the neighboring lane, and might have prolonged the chase, but for the dense mist which obscured them from his view, and appeared to thicken every moment.

"It will be a good night for travelling anonymously," he said, as he returned slowly, being pretty well breathed with his run. "Stay. We may look better here. This is too hospitable and free."

By a great exertion of strength, he closed the two old gates, which were deeply sunken in the mud, and barred them with a heavy beam. That done, he shook his matted hair from about his eyes, and tried them. Strong and fast.

"The fence between this wharf and the next is easily climbed," said the dwarf, when he had taken these precautions. "There's a back lane too from there. That shall be my way out. A man need know his road well, to find it in this lovely place to-night. I need fear no unwelcome visitors while this lasts, I think."

Almost reduced to the necessity of groping his way with his hands, (it had grown so dark, and the fog had so much increased,) he returned to his lair; and after musing for some time over the fire, busied himself in preparations for a speedy departure.

While he was collecting a few necessities, and cramming them into his pockets, he never once ceased communing with himself in a low voice, or unclenched his teeth, which he had ground together on finishing Miss Brass's note.

"Oh, Sampson!" he muttered, "good, worthy creature—if I could but hug you! If I could only fold you in my arms, and squeeze your ribs, as I could squeeze them if I once had you right, what a meeting there would be between us! If we ever do cross each other again, Sampson, we'll have a greeting not easily to be forgotten, trust me. This time, Sampson, this moment when all had gone on so well, was so nicely chosen! It was so thoughtful of you, so penitent, so good. Oh, if we were face to face in this room again, my white-livered man of law, how well contented one of us would be!"

There he stopped; and raising the bowl of punch to his lips, drank a long, deep draught, as if it were fair water and cooling to his parched mouth. Setting it down abruptly, and resuming his preparations, he went on with his soliloquy.

"There's Sally," he said, with flashing eyes; "the woman has spirit, determination, purpose—was she asleep, or petrified? She could have stabbed him—poisoned him safely. She might have seen this coming on. Why does she give me notice when it's too late? When he sat there—yonder there, over there—with his white face, and red hair, and sickly smile, why did n't I know what was passing in his heart? It should have stopped beating that night, if I had been in his secret; or there are no drugs to lull a man to sleep, and no fire to burn him!"

Another draught from the bowl; and covering over the fire with a ferocious aspect, he muttered to himself again;

"And this, like every other trouble and anxiety I have had of late times, springs from that old dotard and his darling child, two wretched, feeble wanderers. I'll be their evil genius yet. And you, sweet Kit, honest Kit, virtuous, innocent Kit, look to yourself. Where I hate, I bite. I hate you, my darling fellow, with good cause, and proud as you are, to-night I'll have my turn. What's that?"

A knocking at the gate he had closed. A loud and violent knocking—then a pause—as if those who knocked, had stopped to listen. Then the noise again, more clamorous and importunate than before.

"So soon!" said the dwarf. "And so eager! I am afraid I shall disappoint you. 'It's well I'm quite prepared. Sally, I thank you!'"

As he spoke, he extinguished the candle. In his impetuous attempts to subdue the brightness of the fire, he overset the stove, which came tumbling forward, and fell with a crash upon the burning embers it had shot forth in its descent, leaving the room in pitchy darkness. The noise at the gate still continuing, he felt his way to the door, and stepped into the open air.

At that moment the knocking ceased. It was about eight o'clock; but the dead of the darkest night would have been as noon-day, in comparison with the thick cloud which then rested upon the earth, and shrouded every thing from view. He darted forward a few paces, as if into the mouth of some dim, yawning cavern; then, thinking he had gone wrong, changed the direction of his steps; then stood still, not knowing how to turn.

"If they would knock again," said Quilp, trying to peer into the gloom by which he was surrounded, "the sound might guide me. Come. Batter the gate once more!"

He stood listening intently, but the noise was not renewed. Nothing was to be heard in that deserted place, but at intervals the distant barking of dogs. The sound was far away—now in one quarter, now answered in another—nor was it any guide, for it often came from shipboard, as he knew.

"If I could find a wall or fence," said the dwarf, stretching out his arms, and walking slowly on, "I should know which way to turn. A good, black devil's night this, to have my dear friend here. If I had but that wish, it might, for any thing I cared, never be day again."

As the word passed his lips, he staggered and fell; and the next moment was fighting with the cold dark water.

For all its bubbling up and rushing in his ears, he could hear the knocking at the gate again—could hear a shout that followed it—could recognize the voice. For all his struggling and plashing, he could understand that they had lost their way, and had wandered back to the point from which they started; that they were all but looking on while he was drowning; that they were close at hand, but could not make an effort to save him; that he himself had shut and barred them out. He answered the shout—with a yell that seemed to make the hundred fires that danced before his eyes tremble and flicker as if a gust of wind had stirred them. It was of no avail. The strong tide filled his throat, and bore him on, upon its rapid current.

Another mortal struggle, and he was up again, beating the water with his hands, and looking out with wild and glaring eyes that showed him some black object he was drifting close upon. The hull of a ship! He could touch its smooth and slippery surface with his hand. One loud cry now—but the resistless water bore him down before he could give it utterance, and, driving him under it, carried away a corpse.

It toyed and sported with its ghostly freight, now bruizing it against the slimy piles, now hiding it in mud or long rank grass, now dragging it heavily over rough stones and gravel, now feigning to yield it to its own element, and in the same action luring it away, until, tired of the ugly plaything, it flung it on a swamp—a dismal place where pirates had swung in chains, through many a wintry night—and left it there to bleach.

And there it lay, alone. The sky was red with flame, and the water that bore it there had been tinged with the sullen light as it flowed along. The place the deserted carcass had left so recently, a living man, was now a blazing ruin. There was something of the glare upon its face. The hair, stirred by the damp breeze, playing in a kind of mockery of death—such a mockery as the dead man himself would have revealed in when alive—about its head, and its dress fluttered idly in the night wind.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

Lighted rooms, bright fires, cheerful faces, the music of glad voices, words of love and welcome, warm hearts, and tears of happiness—what a change is this! But it is to such delights that Kit is hastening. They are awaiting him, he knows. He fears he will die of joy before he gets among them.

They have prepared him for this, all day. He is not to be carried off to-morrow with the rest, they tell him first. By degrees they let him know that doubts have arisen, that inquiries are to be made, and perhaps he may be pardoned after all. At last, the evening being come, they bring him to a room where some gentlemen are assembled. Foremost among them is his good old master, who comes and takes him by the hand. He hears that his innocence is established, and that he is pardoned. He cannot see the speaker, but he turns toward the voice, and, in trying to answer, falls down insensible.

They recover him again, and tell him he must be combed, and bear this like a man. Somebody says he must think of his poor mother. It is because he does think of her so much, that the happy news had overpowered him. They crowd about him, and tell him that the truth has gone abroad, and that all the town and country ring with sympathy for his misfortunes. He has no ears to this. His thoughts as yet have no wider range than home. Does she know it?—what did she say who told her? He can speak of nothing else.

They make him drink a little wine, and talk kindly to him for a while, until he is more collected, and can listen, and thank them. He is free to go. Mr. Garland thinks, if he feels better, it is time they went away. The gentlemen cluster round him, and shake hands with him. He feels very grateful to them for the interest they have in him, and for the kind promises they make; but the power of speech is gone again, and he has much ado to keep his feet, even though leaning on his master's arm.

As they pass through the dismal passes, some officers of the jail who are in waiting there, congratulate him in their rough way on his release. The newsmonger is of the number, but his manner is not quite hearty—there is something of surliness in his compliments. He looks upon Kit as an intruder, as one who has obtained admission to that place on false pretences; who has enjoyed a privilege without being duly qualified. He may be a very good sort of a young man, he thinks, but he has no business there, and the sooner he is gone, the better.

The last door shuts behind him. They have passed the outer wall, and stand in the open air—in the street he has so often pictured to himself when hemmed in by those gloomy stones, and which has been in all his dreams. It seems wider and more busy than it used to be. The night is bad, and yet how cheerful and gay in his eyes! One of the gentlemen, in taking leave of him, pressed some money into his hand. He has not counted it; but when they have gone a few paces beyond the box for poor prisoners, he hastily returns and drops it in.

Mr. Garland has a coach waiting in a neighboring street, and taking Kit inside with him, bids the man drive home. At first they can only travel at a foot pace, and then with torches going on before, because of the heavy fog. But as they get further from the river, and leave the closer portions of the town behind, they are able to dispense with this precaution and to proceed at a brisker rate. On the road, hard galloping would be too slow for Kit, but when they are drawing near their journey's end, he begs they may go more slowly, and when the house appears in sight, that they may stop—only for a minute or two, to give him time to breathe.

But there is no stopping then, for the old gentleman speaks stoutly to him, the horses mend their pace, and they are already at the garden-gate. Next minute they are at the door. There is a noise of tongues, and tread of feet, inside. It opens. Kit rushes in, and finds his mother clinging round his neck.

And there, too, is the ever faithful Barbara's mother, still holding the baby as if she had never put it down since that sad day when they little hoped to have such joy as this—there she is, heaven bless her, crying her eyes out and sobbing as never woman sobbed before; and there is little Barbara—poor little Barbara, so much thinner, and so much paler, and yet so very pretty—trembling like a leaf and supporting herself against the wall: and there is Mrs. Garland, neater and nicer than ever, fainting away stone dead with nobody to help her; and there is Mr. Abel, violently blowing his nose, and wanting to embrace everybody; and there is the single gentleman hovering round them all, and constant to nothing for an instant; and there is that good, dear, thoughtful little Jacob, sitting all alone by himself on the bottom stair, with his hands on his knees like an old man, roaring fearfully without giving any trouble to any body; and each and all of them are for the time clean out of their wits, and do jointly and severally commit all manner of follies.

And even when the rest have in some measure come to themselves again, and can find words and smiles, Barbara—that soft-hearted, gentle, foolish little Barbara—is suddenly missed, and found to be in a swoon by herself in the back parlor, from which swoon she falls into hysterics, and from which hysterics into a swoon again, and is, indeed, so bad, that, despite a mortal quantity of vinegar and cold water, she is hardly a bit better at last than she was at first. Then Kit's mother comes in and says, will he come and speak to her; and Kit says "Yea," and goes; and he says in a kind voice "Barbara!" and Barbara's mother tells her that "it's only Kit;" and Barbara says (with her eyes closed all the time) "Oh! but is it him indeed?" and Barbara's mother says "To be sure it is, my dear; there's nothing the matter now." And in further assurance that he's safe and sound, Kit speaks to her again; and then Barbara goes off into another fit of laughter, and then into another fit of crying;—and then Barbara's mother and Kit's mother nod to each other, and then pretend to scold her—but only to bring her to herself the faster, bless you—and being experienced matrons, and acute at perceiving the first dawning symptoms of recovery, they comfort Kit with the assurance that "she'll do now," and so dismiss him to the place whence he came.

Well! In that place (which is the next room) there are decanters of wine, and all that sort of thing, set out as grand as if Kit and his friends were first-rate company; and there is little Jacob, walking, as the popular phrase is, into a homemade plumb cake at a most surprising pace, and keeping his eye on the figs and oranges which are to follow, and making the best use of his time you may well believe. Kit no sooner comes in, than that single gentleman (never was such a busy gentleman) charges all the glasses—bumpers—and drinks his health, and tells him he shall never want a friend while he lives; and as does Mr. Garland, so does Mrs. Garland, and so does Mr. Abel. But even this honor and distinction is not all, for the single gentleman forthwith pulls out of his pocket a massive silver watch, going hard, and right to half a second—and upon the back of this is engraved Kit's name, with flourishes all over; and in short it is Kit's watch, bought expressly for him, and presented to him on the spot. You may rest assured that Mr. and Mrs. Garland can't help hinting about their present in store, and that Mr. Abel tells outright that he has his; and that Kit is the happiest of the happy.

There is one friend he has not seen yet, and as he cannot be conveniently introduced into the family circle, by reason of his being an iron-shod quadruped, Kit takes the first opportunity of slipping away and hurrying to the stable. The moment he lays his hand upon the latch, the pony neighs the loudest pony's greeting; before he has crossed the threshold, the pony is capering about his loose box (for he brooks not the indignity of a halter), mad to give him welcome; and when Kit goes up to caress and pat him, the pony rubs his nose against his coat, and fondles him more lovingly than ever pony fondled man. It is the crowning circumstance of his earnest, heartfelt reception, and Kit fairly puts his arm round Whisker's neck and hugs him.

But how comes Barbara to trip in there? and how smart she is again! she has been at her glass since she recovered. How comes Barbara in the stable, of all places in the world? Why, since Kit has been away, the pony would take his food from no body but her, and Barbara, you see, not dreaming Christopher was there, and just looking in to see that every thing was right, has come upon him unawares. Blushing little Barbara!

It may be that Kit has caressed the pony enough; it may be that there are even better things to caress than ponies. He leaves him for Barbara, at any rate, and hopes she is better. Yes, Barbara is a great deal better. She is afraid—and here Barbara looks down and blushes more—that he must have thought her very foolish. "Not at all," says Kit. Barbara is glad of that, and coughs—Hem!—just the slightest cough possible—not more than that.

What a discreet pony, when he chooses! He is as quiet now as if he were of marble. He has a very knowing look, but that he always has. "We have hardly had time to shake hands, Barbara," says Kit. Barbara gives him hers. Why, she is trembling now! Foolish, fluttering Barbara! Arm's length! The length of an arm is not much. Barbara's was not a long arm by any means; and, besides, she did not hold it out straight, but bent a little. Kit was so near her when they shook hands that he could see a small, tiny tear yet trembling on an eyelash. It was natural that he should look at it, unknown to Barbara. It was natural that Barbara should raise her eyes unconsciously and find him out. Was it natural that at that instant without any previous impulse or design, Kit should kiss Barbara? He did it, whether or no. Barbara said "For shame," but let him do it too—twice. He might have done it thrice, but the pony kicked up his heels and shook his head, as if he were suddenly taken with convulsions of delight, and Barbara, being frightened, ran away—not straight to where her mother and Kit's mother were though, lest they should see how red her cheeks were, and should ask her why. Sly little Barbara!

When the first transports of the whole party had subsided, and Kit and his mother, and Barbara and her mother, with little Jacob and the baby to boot, had had their suppers together—which there was no hurrying over, for they were going to stop there all night—Mr. Garland called Kit to him, and, taking him into a room where they could be alone, told him that he had something yet to say, which would surprise him greatly. Kit looked so anxious and turned so pale on hearing this that the old man hastened to add he would be agreeably surprised, and asking him if he would be ready next morning for a journey.

"For a journey, sir?" cried Kit.

"In company with me and my friend in the next room. Can you guess its purpose?"

Kit turned paler yet, and shook his head.

"Oh yes! I think you do already," said his master.

"Try."

Kit murmured something rather rambling and unintelligible, but he plainly pronounced the words "Miss Nell" three or four times—shaking his head while he did so, as if he would add there was no hope of that.

But Mr. Garland, instead of saying "Try again," as Kit had made sure he would, told him very seriously that he had guessed right.

"The place of their retreat is indeed discovered," he said, "at last; and that is our journey's end."

Kit faltered out such questions as where it was, and how had it been found, and how long since, and was she well, and happy.

"Happy she is, beyond all doubt," said Mr. Garland; "and well, I—I trust she will be soon. She has been weak and ailing, as I learn, but she was better when I heard this morning, and they were full of hope. Sit you down, and you shall hear the rest."

Scarcely venturing to draw a breath, Kit did as he was told. Mr. Garland then related to him how he had a brother, (of whom he would remember to have heard him speak, and whose picture, taken when he was a young man, hung in the best room,) and how this brother lived a long way off in a country seat, with an old clergyman who had been his early friend. How, although they loved each other as brothers should, they had not met for many years, but had communicated by letter from time to time, always looking forward to some period when they would take each other by the hand once more, and still letting the Present time steal on, as it was the habit of men to do, and suffering the Future to melt into the Past. How this brother, whose temper was very mild and quiet and retiring—such as Mr. Abel's—was greatly beloved by the simple people among whom he dwelt, who quite revered the bachelor, (for they so called him,) and every one had experienced his charity and benevolence. How even these slight circumstances had come to his knowledge very slowly, and in course of years, for the bachelor was one of those whose goodness shuns the light, and who have more pleasure in discovering and extolling the good deeds of others, than in trumpeting their own, be they ever so commendable. How, for that reason, he seldom told them to his village friends; but how, for all that, his mind had become so full of two among them—a child and an old man, to whom he had been very kind—that in a letter, received a few days before, he had dwelt upon them from first to last, and had told there such a tale of their wanderings and mutual love that few could read it without being moved to tears. How he, the recipient of that letter, was directly led to the belief that these must be the very wanderers for whom so much search had been made, and whom Heaven had directed to his brother's care. How he had written for such further information as would put the fact beyond all doubt; how it had that morning arrived; had confirmed his first impression into a certainty; and was the immediate cause of that journey being planned which they were to take to-morrow.

"In the mean time," said the old gentleman, rising and laying his hand on Kit's shoulder, "you have great need of rest, for such a day as this would wear out the strongest man. Good night, and Heaven send our journey may have a prosperous ending!"

CHAPTER LXIX.

Kit was no sluggard next morning, but springing from his bed some time before day, began to prepare for his welcome expedition. The hurry of spirits consequent upon the events of yesterday, and the unexpected intelligence he had heard at night, had troubled his sleep through the long dark hours, and summoned such uneasy dreams about his pillow that it was rest to rise.

But had it been the beginning of some great labor with the same end in view—had it been the commencement of a long journey, to be performed on foot in that inclement season of the year; to be pursued under every privation and difficulty; and to be achieved only with great distress, fatigue, and suffering—had it been the dawn of some painful enterprise, certain to task his utmost powers of resolution and endurance, and to need his utmost fortitude, but only likely to end, if happily achieved, in good fortune and delight to Nell—Kit's cheerful zeal would have been as highly roused, Kit's ardor and impatience would have been at least the same.

Nor was he alone excited and eager. Before he had been up a quarter of an hour the whole house, where astir and busy. Every body hurried to do something toward facilitating the preparations. The single gentleman, it is true, could do nothing himself, but he overlooked everybody else, and was more locomotive than anybody. The work of packing and making ready went briskly on, and by day-break every preparation for the journey was completed. Then Kit began to wish they had not been quite so nimble; for the travelling-carriage, which had been hired for the occasion, was not to arrive until nine o'clock, and there was nothing but breakfast to fill up the intervening blank of one hour and a half.

Yes there was, though. There was Barbara. Barbara was busy, to be sure, but so much the better—Kit could help her, and that would pass away the time better than any means that could be devised. Barbara had no objection to this arrangement, and Kit, tracing out the idea which had come upon him so suddenly overnight, began to think that surely Barbara was fond of him, and surely he was fond of Barbara.

Now, Barbara, if the truth must be told—as it must and ought to be—Barbara seemed, of all the little household, to take least pleasure in the bustle of the occasion; and when Kit, in the openness of his heart, told her how glad and overjoyed it made him, Barbara became more downcast still, and seemed to have even less pleasure in it than before!

"You have not been home so long, Christopher," said Barbara—and it is impossible to tell how carelessly she said it—"You have not been home so long, that you need be glad to go away again, I should think."

"But for such a purpose," returned Kit. "To bring back Miss Nell! To see her again! Only think of that! I am so pleased too to think that you will see her, Barbara, at last."

Barbara did not absolutely say that she felt no great gratification on this point, but she expressed the sentiment so plainly by one little toss of her head, that Kit was quite disconcerted, and wondered in his simplicity why she was so cool about it.

"You'll say she has the sweetest and beautiful face you ever saw, I know," said Kit, rubbing his hands. "I'm sure you'll say that!"

Barbara tossed her head again.

"What's the matter, Barbara?" said Kit.

"Nothing," cried Barbara. And Barbara pouted—not sulkily, or in an ugly manner, but just enough to make her look more cherry-lipped than ever.

There is no school in which a pupil gets on so fast, as that in which Kit became a scholar when he gave Barbara the kiss. He saw what Barbara meant now—he had his lesson by heart all at once—she was the book—there it was before him as plain as print.

"Barbara," said Kit, "you're not cross with me?"

Oh dear no! Why should Barbara be cross? And what right had she to be cross? And what did it matter whether she was cross or no? Who minded her?

"Why, I do," said Kit. "Of course I do."

Barbara did not see why it was of course, at all.

Kit was sure she must. Would she think again?

Certainly, Barbara would think. No, she did not see why it was of course. She did not understand what Christopher meant. And, besides, she was sure they wanted her up stairs by this time, and she must go, indeed—

"No, but Barbara," said Kit, detaining her gently, "let us part friends. I was always thinking of you, in my troubles. I should have been a great deal more miserable than I was, if it had not been for you."

Goodness gracious! how pretty Barbara was when she colored—and when she trembled, like a little shrinking bird!

"I am telling you the truth, Barbara, upon my word, but not half so strong as I could wish," said Kit, earnestly. "When I want you to be pleased to see Miss Nell, it's only because I should like you to be pleased with what pleases me—that's all. As to her, Barbara, I think I could almost die to do her service, but you would think so too if you knew her as I do. I am sure you would."

Barbara was touched, and sorry to have appeared indifferent.

"I have been used, you see," said Kit, "to talk and think of her, almost as if she was an angel. When I look forward to meeting her again, I think of her smiling as she used to do, and being glad to see me, and putting out her hand, and saying, 'It's my own old Kit,' or some such words as those—like what she used to say. I think of seeing her happy, and with friends about her, and brought up as she deserves, and as she ought to be. When I think of myself, it's as her old servant; and one that loved her dearly, as his kind, good, gentle mistress; and who would have gone—yes, and still would go—through any harm to serve her. Once I could not help being afraid that if she came back with friends about her she might forget, or be ashamed of having known, a humble lad like me, and so speak coldly, which would have cut me, Barbara, deeper than I can tell. But when I came to think again, I felt sure that I was doing her wrong in this; and so I went on as I did at first, hoping to see her once more, just as she used to be. Hoping this, and remembering what she was, has made me feel as if I would always try to please her, and always be what I should like to seem to her if I was still her servant. If I'm the better for that—and I do not think I'm the worse—I am grateful to her for it; and love and honor her the more. That's the plain, honest truth, dear Barbara, upon my word it is!"

Little Barbara was not of a wayward or capricious nature, but being full of remorse, melted into tears. To what further observations this might have led, we need not stop to inquire; for the wheels of the carriage were heard at that moment, and, being followed by a smart ring at the garden gate, caused the bustle in the house, which had laid dormant for a short time, to burst again into tenfold life and vigor.

Simultaneously with the travelling equipage, arrived Mr. Chuckster in a hackney cab, with certain papers and supplies of money for the single gentleman, into whose hands he delivered them. This duty discharged, he subsided into the bosom of the family and, entertaining himself with a strolling or peripatetic breakfast, watched with a gentle indifference the process of loading the carriage.

"Snobby's in this I see, sir?" he said to Mr. Abel Garland. "I thought he was not in the last trip because it was expected that his presence would not be very acceptable to the ancient huffalo."

"To whom sir?" demanded Mr. Abel.

"To the old gentleman," returned Mr. Chuckster, slightly abashed.

"Our client prefers to take him now," said Mr. Abel, drily. "There is no longer any need for that precaution, as my father's relationship to a gentleman in whom the objects of his search have full confidence, will be a sufficient guarantee for the friendly nature of their errand."

"Ah!" thought Mr. Chuckster, looking out of the window, "anybody but me! Snobby before me, of course. He didn't happen to take that particular five-pound note, but I have not the smallest doubt he's always up to something of that sort. I always said it, long before this came out. Devilish pretty girl that! 'Pon my soul, an amazing little creature!"

Barbara was the subject of Mr. Chuckster's commendations; and as she was lingering near the carriage (all being now ready for its departure), that gentleman was suddenly seized with a strong interest in the proceedings, which impelled him to swagger down the garden, and take up his position at a convenient ogling distance. Having had great experience of the sex, and being perfectly acquainted with all those little artifices which find the readiest road to their hearts, Mr. Chuckster, on taking his ground, planted one hand on his hip, and with the other adjusted his flowing hair. This is a favorite attitude in the polite circles, and accompanied with a graceful whistling has been known to do immense execution.

Such, however, is the difference between town and country, that nobody took the smallest notice of this insinuating figure; the wretches being wholly engaged in bidding the travellers farewell, in kissing hands to each other, waving handkerchiefs, and the like tame and vulgar practices. For now the single gentleman and Mr. Garland were in the carriage, and the postboy was in the saddle, and Kit, well wrapped and muffled up, was in the rumble behind; and Mrs. Garland was there, and Mr. Abel was there, and Kit's mother was there, and little Jacob was there, and Barbara's mother was visible in remote perspective, nursing the ever wakeful baby; and all were nodding, beckoning, curtsying, or crying out "Good bye!" with all the energy they could express.

In another minute, the carriage was out of sight; and Mr. Chuckster remained alone upon the spot where it had lately been, with a vision of Kit standing up in the rumble waving his hand to Barbara, and of Barbara in the full light and lustre of his eyes—his eyes—Chuckster's—Chuckster the successful—on whom ladies of quality had looked with favor from phaetons in the parks on Sundays—waving hers to Kit!

How Mr. Chuckster, entranced by this monstrous fact, stood for some time rooted to the earth, protesting within himself that Kit was the Prince of felonious characters, and very Emperor or Great Mogul of Snobs, and how he clearly traced this revolting circumstance back to that old villainy of the shilling, are matters foreign to our purpose; which is, to track the rolling wheels, and bear the travellers company on their cold, bleak journey.

It was a bitter day. A keen wind was blowing, and rushed against them fiercely; bleaching the hard ground, shaking the white frost from the trees and hedges, and whirling it away like dust. But little cared Kit for weather. There was a freedom and freshness in the wind, as it came howling by, which, let it cut never so sharp, was welcome. As it swept on with its cloud of frost, bearing down the dry twigs and boughs and withered leaves, and carrying them away pell-mell, it seemed as though some general sympathy had got abroad, and every thing was in a hurry like themselves. The harder the gusts, the better progress they appeared to make. It was a good thing to go struggling and fighting forward, vanquishing them one by one; to watch them driving up, gathering strength and fury as they came along; to bend for a moment, as they whistled past; and then to look back and see them speed away; their hoarse noise dying in the distance, and the stout trees cowering down before them.

All day long it blew without cessation. The night was clear and starlight, but the wind had not fallen, and the cold was piercing. Sometimes—toward the end of a long stage—Kit could not help wishing it were a little warmer; but when they stopped to change horses, and he had had a good run; and what with that, and the bustle of paying the old postillion, and rousing the new one, and running to and fro again until the horses were put to, he was so warm that the blood tingled and smarted in his fingers' ends; then he felt as if to have it one degree less cold would be to lose half the delight and glory of the journey: and up he jumped again right cheerily, singing to the merry music of the wheels as they rolled away, and, leaving the town's people in their warm beds, pursued their course along the lonely road.

Meantime the two gentlemen inside, who were little disposed to sleep, beguiled the time with conversation. As both were anxious and expectant, it naturally turned upon the subject of their expedition, on the manner in which it had been brought about, and on the hopes and fears they entertained respecting it. Of the former they had many; of the latter few—none perhaps beyond that indefinable uneasiness which is inseparable from suddenly awakened hope, and protracted expectation.

In one of the pauses of their discourse, and when half the night had worn away, the single gentleman, who had gradually become more and more silent and thoughtful, turned to his companion and said abruptly:

"Are you a good listener?"

"Like most other men, I suppose," returned Mr. Garland, smiling. "I can be if I am interested; and if not interested, I should still try to appear so. Why do you ask?"

"I have a short narrative on my lips," rejoined his friend, "and will try you with it. It is very brief."

Pausing for no reply, he laid his hand on the old gentleman's sleeve, and proceeded thus:

"There were once two brothers, who loved each other dearly. There was a disparity in their ages—some twelve years. I am not sure but they may insensibly have loved each other the better for that reason. Wide as the interval between them was, however, they became rivals too soon. The deepest and strongest affection of both their hearts settled upon one object.

"The youngest—there were reasons for his being sensitive and watchful—was the first to find this out. I will not tell you what misery he underwent, what agony of soul he knew, how great his mental struggle was. He had been a sickly child. His brother, patient and considerate in the midst of his own high health and strength, had many and many a day denied himself the sports he loved, to sit beside his coach, telling him old stories till his pale face lighted up with an unwonted glow; to carry him in his arms to some green spot, where he could tend the poor pensive boy as he looked upon the bright summer day, and saw all nature healthy but himself; to be in any way his fond but faithful nurse. I may not dwell on all he did, to make the poor, weak creature love him, or my tale would have no end. But when the time of trial came, the younger brother's heart was full of those old days. Heaven strengthened it to repay the sacrifices of inconsiderate youth by one of thoughtful manhood. He left his brother to be happy. The truth never passed his lips, and he quitted the country hoping to die abroad.

"The elder brother married her. She was in Heaven before long, and left him with an infant daughter."

"If you have seen the picture gallery of any one old family, you will remember how the face and figure—often the fairest and slightest of them all—come upon you in different generations; and how you trace the same sweet girl through a long line of portraits—never growing old or changing—the Good Angel of the race—abiding them in all reverses—redeeming all their sins.

"In this daughter the mother lived again. You may judge with what devotion he who lost that mother almost in the winning, clung to this girl, her breathing image. She grew to womanhood, and gave her heart to one who could not know its worth. Well! Her fond father could not see her pine and droop. He felt he more deserving than he thought him. He surely might become so with a wife like her. He joined their hands, and they were married.

"Through all the misery that followed this union; through all the cold neglect and undeserved reproach; through all the poverty he brought upon her; through all the struggles of their daily life, too mean and pitiful to tell, but dreadful to endure, she toiled on, in the deep devotion of her spirit, and in her better nature, as only woman can. Her means and substance wasted; her father nearly beggared by her husband's hand, and the hourly witness (for they lived now under one roof) of her ill-usage and unhappiness,—she never, but for him, bewailed her fate. Patient, and upheld by strong affection to the last, she died a widow of some three week's date, leaving to her father's care two orphans, one a son of ten or twelve years old, the other a girl—such another infant child—the same in helplessness, in age, in form, in feature—as she had been herself when her young mother died.

"The elder brother, grandfather to these two children, was now a broken man; crushed and borne down less by the weight of years than by the heavy hand of sorrow. With the wreck of his possessions, he began to trade—in pictures first, and then in curious ancient things. He had entertained a fondness for such matters from a boy, and the tastes he had cultivated were now to yield him an anxious and precarious subsistence.

"The boy grew like his father in mind and person; the girl so like her mother, that when the old man had her on his knee, and looked into her mild blue eyes, he felt as if awakening from a wretched dream, and his daughter were a little child again. The wayward boy soon spurned the shelter of his roof, and sought associates more congenial to his taste. The old man and the child dwelt alone together.

"It was then, when the love of two dead people who had been nearest and dearest to his heart, was all transferred to this slight creature; when her face, constantly before him, reminded him from hour to hour of the too early change he had seen in such another—of all the suffering he had watched and known, and all his child had undergone; when the young man's profligate and hardened course drained him of money as his father's had, and even sometimes occasioned them temporary privation and distress; it was then that there began to beset him, and to be ever in his mind, a gloomy dread of poverty and want. He had no thought for himself in this. His fear was for the child. It was a spectre in his house, and haunted him night and day.

"The younger brother had been a traveller in many countries, and had made his pilgrimage through life alone. His voluntary banishment had been misconstrued, and he had borne (not without pain) reproach and slight, for doing that which had wrung his heart, and cast a mournful shadow on his path. Apart from this, communication between him and the elder was difficult and uncertain, and often failed; still it was not so wholly broken off but that he learnt—with long blanks and gaps between each interval of information—all that I have told you now.

Then, dreams of their young, happy life—happy to him though laden with pain and early care—visited his pillow yet oftener than before; and every night, a boy again, he was at his brother's side. With the utmost speed he could exert, he settled his affairs; converted into money all the goods he had, and, with honorable wealth enough for both, with open heart and hand, with limbs that trembled as they bore him on, with emotion such as men can hardly bear and live, arrived one evening at his brother's door!"

The narrator, whose voice had faltered lately, stopped. "The rest," said Mr. Garland, pressing his hand, "I know."

"Yes," rejoined his friend, after a pause, "we may spare ourselves the sequel. You know the poor result of all my search. Even when, by dint of such inquiries as the utmost vigilance and sagacity could set on foot, we found they had been seen with two poor travelling showmen; and in time discovered the men themselves—and in time, the actual place of their retreat; even then, we were too late. Pray God we are not too late again!"

"We cannot be," said Mr. Garland. "This time we must succeed."

"I have believed and hoped so," returned the other. "I try to believe and hope so still. But a heavy weight has fallen on my spirits, my good friend, and the sadness that gathers over me, will yield neither to hope nor reason."

"That does not surprise," said Mr. Garland; "it is a natural consequence of the events you have recalled; of this dreary time and place; and above all, of his wild and dismal night. A dismal night, indeed! Hark! how the wind is howling!"

CHAPTER LXX.

Day broke, and found them still upon their way. Since leaving home, they had halted here and there for necessary refreshment, and had frequently been delayed, especially in the night time, by waiting for fresh horses. They had made no other stoppages; but the weather continued rough, and the roads were often steep and heavy. It would be night again before they reached their place of destination.

Kit, all bluff and hardened with the cold, went on manfully; and having enough to do to keep his blood circulating, to picture to himself the happy end of this adventurous journey, and to look about him and be amazed at everything, had little spare time for thinking of discomforts. Though his impatience, and that of his fellow-travellers, rapidly increased as the day waned, the hours did not stand still. The short daylight of winter soon faded away, and it was dark again when they had yet many miles to travel.

As it grew dusk, the wind fell: its distant moanings were more low and mournful; and as it came creeping up the road, and rattling covertly among the dry brambles on either hand, it seemed like some great phantom for whom the way was narrow, whose garments rustled as it stalked along. By degrees it lulled and died away; and then it came on to snow.

The flakes fell fast and thick, soon covering the ground some inches deep, and spreading abroad a solemn stillness. The rolling wheels were noiseless; and the sharp ring and clatter of the horses' hoofs, became a dull, muffled tramp. The life of their progress seemed to be slowly hushed, and something death-like to usurp its place.

Shading his eyes from the falling snow, which froze upon their lashes and obscured his sight, Kit often tried to catch the earliest glimpse of twinkling lights denoting their approach to some not distant town. He could descry objects enough at such times, but none correctly. Now a tall church spire appeared in view, which presently became a tree; a barn; a shadow on the ground, thrown on it by their own bright lamps. Now there were horsemen, foot-passengers, carriages, going on before; or meeting them in narrow ways; which, when they were close upon them, turned to shadows too. A wall, a ruin, a sturdy gable end, would rise up in the road; and when they were plunging headlong at it, would be the road itself. Strange turnings too, bridges, and sheets of water, appeared to start up here and there, making the way doubtful and uncertain; and yet they were on the same bare road, and these things, like the others, as they were passed, turned into dim illusions.

He descended slowly from his seat—for his limbs were numbed—when they arrived at a lone posting-house, and inquired how far they had to go to reach their journey's end. It was a late hour in such by-places, and the people were abed; but a voice answered from an upper window, Ten miles. The ten minutes that ensued appeared an hour; but at the end of that time, a shivering figure led out the horses they required, and after another brief delay they were again in motion.

It was a cross-country road, full, after the first three or four miles, of holes and cart-ruts, which, being covered by the snow, were so many pitfalls to the trembling horses, and obliged them to keep a footpace. As it was next to impossible for men so much agitated as they were by this time, to sit still and move so slowly, all three got out and plodded on behind the carriage. The distance seemed interminable, and the walk was most laborious. As each was thinking within himself that the driver must have lost his way, a church bell, close at hand, struck the hour of midnight, and the carriage stopped. It had moved softly enough, but when it ceased to crunch the snow, the silence was as startling as if some great noise had been replaced by perfect stillness.

"This is the place, gentlemen," said the driver, dismounting from his horse, and knocking at the door of a little inn. "Hallo! Past twelve o'clock is the dead hour of night here."

The knocking was loud and long, but it failed to rouse the drowsy inmates. All continued dark and silent as before. They fell back a little, and looked up at the windows, which were mere black patches in the whitened house front. No light appeared. The house might have been deserted, or the sleepers dead, for any air of life it had about it.

They spoke together, with a strange inconsistency, in whispers; unwilling to disturb again the dreary echoes they had just now raised.

"Let us go on," said the younger brother, "and leave this good fellow to wake them, if he can. I cannot rest until I know that we are not too late. Let us go on in the name of Heaven!"

They did so, leaving the postillion to order such accommodation as the house afforded, and to renew his knocking. Kit accompanied them with a little bundle, which he had hung in the carriage when they left home, and had not forgotten since—the bird in his old cage—just as she had left him. She would be glad to see her bird, he knew.

The road wound gently downward. As they proceeded, they lost sight of the church whose clock they had heard, and of the small village clustering round it. The knocking, which was now renewed, and which in that stillness they could plainly hear, troubled them. They wished the man would forbear, or that they had told him not to break the silence until they returned.

The old church tower, clad in a ghostly garb of pure cold white again rose up before them, and a few moments brought them close beside it—a venerable building—grey, even in the midst of the hoary landscape. An ancient sundial on the belfry was nearly hidden by the snowdrift, and scarcely to be known for what it was. Time itself seemed to have grown dull and old, as if no day were ever to displace the melancholy night!

A wicket gate was close at hand, but there was more than one path across the churchyard to which it led, and, uncertain which to take, they came to a stand again.

The village street—if street that could be called which was an irregular cluster of poor cottages of many heights and ages, some with their fronts, some with their backs, and some with gable ends toward the road, with here and there a signpost, or a shed encroaching on the path—was close at hand. There was a faint light in a chamber window not far off, and Kit ran towards that house to ask their way.

His first shout was answered by an old man within, who presently appeared at the casement, wrapping some garment round his throat as a protection from the cold, and demanded who was abroad at that unseasonable hour, wanting him.

"Tis hard weather this," he grumbled, "and not a night to call me up in. My trade is not of that kind that I need be roused from bed. The business on which folks want me will keep cold, especially at this season. What do you want?"

"I would not have roused you, if I had known you were old and ill," said Kit.

"Old!" repeated the other peevishly. "How do you know I am old? Not so old you think, friend, perhaps. As to being ill, you will find many young people in worse case than I am. More 's the pity that it should be so—n that I should be strong and hearty for my years, I mean but that they should be weak and tender. I ask your pa-don't though," said the old man, "if I spoke rather rough at first. My eyes are not good at night—that's neither age nor illness; they never were—and I did n't see you were a stranger."

"I am sorry to call you from your bed," said Kit, "but those gentlemen you may see by the churchyard gate, are strangers too, who have just arrived from a long journey, and seek the parsonage-house. You can direct us?"

"I should be able to," answered the old man, in a trembling voice, "for come next summer I have been sexton here good fifty years. The right-hand path, friend, is the road. There is no ill news for our good gentleman, I hope?"

Kit thanked him, and made him a hasty answer in the negative; he was turning back, when his attention was caught by the voice of a child. Looking up, he saw a very little creature at a neighboring window.

"What is that?" cried the child, earnestly. "Has my dream come true? Pray speak to me, whoever that is, awake and up?"

"Poor boy!" said the sexton, before Kit could answer, "how goes it, darling?"

"Has my dream come true?" exclaimed the child again, in a voice so fervent that it might have thrilled to the heart of any listener. "But no, that can never be. How could it be—Oh! how could it?"

"I guess his meaning," said the sexton. "To thy bed again, dear boy!"

"Ay!" cried the child, in a burst of despair, "I knew it could never be, I felt too sure of that, before I asked. But all to-night, and last night too, it was the same. I never fall asleep, but that cruel dream comes back."

"Try to sleep again," said the old man, soothingly. "It will go, in time."

"No no, I would rather that it staid—cruel as it is, I would rather that it staid," rejoined the child. "I am not afraid to have it in my sleep, but I am so sad—so very, very, sad."

The old man blessed him, the child in tears replied good night, and Kit was alone.

He hurried back, moved by what he heard, though more by the child's manner than by anything he had said, as his meaning was hidden from him. They took the path indicated by the sexton, and soon arrived before the parsonage wall. Turning round to look about them when they had got thus far they saw, among some ruined buildings at a distance, one solitary light.

It shone from what appeared to be an old oriel window, and being surrounded by the deep shadows of overhanging walls, sparkled like a star. Bright and glimmering as the stars above their heads, lonely and motionless as they, it seemed to claim some kindred with the eternal lamps of Heaven, and to burn in fellowship with them.

"What light is that?" exclaimed the younger brother.

"It is surely," said Mr. Garland, "in the ruin where they live. I see no other ruin hereabouts."

"They cannot," returned the brother hastily, "be waking at this late hour—"

Kit interposed directly, and begged that, while they rang and waited at the gate, they would let him make his way to where this light was shining and try to ascertain if any people were about. Obtaining the permission he desired, he darted off with breathless eagerness, and, still carrying the birdcage in his hand, made straight toward the spot.

It was not easy to hold that pace among the graves, and at another time he might have gone more slowly, or round by the path. Unmindful of all obstacles, however, he pressed forward without slackening his speed, and soon arrived within a few yards of the window.

He approached as softly as he could, and, advancing so near the wall as to brush the whitened ivy with his dress, listened. There was no sound inside. The church itself was not more quiet. Touching the glass with his cheek, he listened again. No. And yet there was such a silence all around, that he felt sure he could have heard even the breathing of a sleeper, if there had been one there.

A strange circumstance, a light in such a place at that time of night, with no one near it.

A curtain was drawn across the lower portion of the window, and he could not see into the room. But there was no shadow thrown upon it from within. To have gained a footing on the wall and tried to look in from above, would have been attended with some danger—certainly with some noise, and the chance of terrifying the child, if that really were her habitation. Again and again he listened; and again the same wearisome blank.

Leaving the spot with slow and cautious steps, and skirting the ruin for a few paces, he came at length to a door. He knocked. No answer. But there was a curious noise inside. It was difficult to determine what it was. It bore a resemblance to the low moaning of one in pain, but it was not that, being far too regular and constant. Now it seemed a kind of song, now a wail—seemed, that is, to his changing fancy, for the sound itself was never changed or checked. It was unlike anything he had ever heard, and in its tone there was something fearful, chilling, and unearthly.

The listener's blood ran colder now than ever it had done in frost and snow, but he knocked again. There was no answer, and the sound went on without any interruption. He laid his hand softly upon the latch, and put his knee against the door. It was not secured on the inside, but yielded to the pressure, and turned upon its hinges. He saw the glimmering of a fire upon the old walls, and entered.

CHAPTER LXXI.

The dull, red glow of a wood fire—for no lamp or candle burned within the room—showed him a figure, seated on the hearth with its back toward him, bending over the fitful light. The attitude was that of one who sought the heat. It was, and yet was not. The stooping posture and the cowering form were there, but no hands were stretched out to meet the grateful warmth, no shrug or shiver compared its luxury with the piercing cold outside. With limbs huddled together, head bowed down, arms crossed upon the breast, and fingers tightly clenched, it rocked to and fro upon its seat without a moment's pause, accompanying the action with the mournful sound he had heard.

The heavy door had closed behind him on his entrance, with a crash that made him start. The figure neither spoke nor turned to look, nor gave in any other way the faintest sign of having heard the noise. The form was that of an old man, his white head akin in color to the mouldering embers upon which he gazed. He, and the failing light and dying fire, the time-worn room, the solitude, the wasted life, and gloom, were all in fellowship. Ashes, and dust, and ruin!

Kit tried to speak, and did pronounce some words, though what they were he scarcely knew. Still the same terrible low cry went on—still the same rocking in the chair—the same stricken figure was there, unchanged and heedless of his presence.

He had his hand upon the latch, when something in the form—distinctly seen as one log broke and fell, and, as it fell, blazed up—arrested it. He returned to where he had stood before—advanced a pace—another—another still. Another, and he saw the face. Yes! Changed as it was, he knew it well.

"Master!" he cried, stopping on one knee and catching at his hand. "Dear master. Speak to me!"

The old man turned slowly toward him; and muttered, in a hollow voice, "This is another!—How many of these there have been to-night!"

"No spirit, master. No one but your old servant. You know me now, I am sure! Miss Nell—where is she—where is she?"

"They all say that!" cried the old man. "They all ask the same question. A spirit!"

"Where is she?" demanded Kit. "Oh tell me but that—but that, dear master."

"She is asleep—yonder—in there."

"Thank God!"

"Ay! Thank God!" returned the old man. "I have prayed to Him, many, and many, and many a livelong night, when she has been asleep. He knows. Hark! Did she call?"

"I heard no voice."

"You did. You hear her now. Do you tell me that you do n't hear that?"

He started up, and listened again.

"Nor that?" he cried, with a triumphant smile. "Can any body know that voice so well as I! Hush! hush!"

Motioning to him to be silent, he stole away into another chamber. After a short absence (during which he could be heard to speak in a softened, soothing tone) he returned, bearing in his hand a lamp.

"She is still asleep," he whispered. "You were right. She did not call—unless she did so in her slumber. She has called to me in her sleep before now, sir; as I sat by, watching, I have seen her lips move, and have known, though no sound came from them, that she spoke of me. I feared the light might dazzle her eyes and wake her, so I brought it here."

He spoke rather to himself than to the visitor, but when he had put the lamp upon the table, he took it up, as if impelled by some momentary recollection or curiosity, and held it near his face. Then, as if forgetting his motive in the very action, he turned away and put it down again.

"She is sleeping soundly," he said; but no wonder. Angel hands have strewn the ground deep with snow, that the lightest footstep may be lighter yet; and the very birds are dead, that they may not wake her. She used to feed them, sir. Though never so cold and hungry, the timid things would fly from us. They never flew from her!"

Again he stopped to listen, and scarcely drawing breath, listened for a long time. That fancy past, he opened an old chest, took out some clothes as fondly as if they had been living things, and began to smooth and crush them with his hand.

"Why dost thou lie so idle there, dear Nell," he murmured, "when there are bright red berries out of doors waiting for thee to pluck them! Why dost thou lie so idle there, when thy little friends come creeping to the door, crying 'where is Nell—sweet Nell?'—and sob, and weep, because they do not see thee. She was always gentle with children. The wildest would do her bidding—she had a tender way with them, indeed she had!"

Kit had no power to speak. His eyes were filled with tears.

"Her little homely dress—her favorite!" cried the old man, pressing it to his breast, and patting it with his shriveled hand. "She will miss it when she wakes. They had hid it here in sport, but she shall have it—she shall have it. I would not vex my darling, for the wide world's riches. See here—these shoes—how worn they are—she kept them to remind her of our last, long journey. You see where the little feet were upon the ground. They told me, afterwards, that the stones had cut and bruised them. She never told me that. No, no, God bless her! and, I have remembered since, she walked behind me, sir, that I might not see how lame she was—but yet she had my hand in hers, and seemed to lead me still."

He pressed them gently to his lips, and having carefully put them back again, went on communing with himself—looking wistfully from time to time toward the chamber he had lately visited.

"She was not wont to be a lie-abed; but she was well then. We must have patience. When she is well again, she will rise early, as she used to do, and ramble abroad in the healthy morning time. I often tried to track the way she had gone, but her small fairy footstep left no print upon the dewy ground, to guide me. Who is that? Shut the door. Quick! Have me not enough to do to drive away that marble cold, and keep her warm!"

The door was indeed opened, for the entrance of Mr. Garland and his friend, accompanied by two other persons. These were the schoolmaster and the bachelor. The former held a light in his hand. He had, it seemed, but gone to his own cottage to replenish the exhausted lamp, at the moment when Kit came up and found the old man alone.

He softened again at sight of these two friends, and laying aside the angry manner—if to any thing so feeble and so sad the term can be applied—in which he had spoken when the door opened, resumed his former seat, and subsided, by little and little, into the old action, and the old, dull, wandering sound.

Of the strangers he took no heed whatever. He had seen them, but appeared quite incapable of interest or curiosity. The younger brother stood apart. The bachelor drew a chair toward the old man, and sat down close beside him. After a long silence, he ventured to speak.

"Another night, and not in bed!" he said, softly; "I hoped you would be more mindful of your promise to me. Why do you not take some rest?"

"Sleep has left me," returned the old man. "It is all with her!"

"It would pain her very much to know that you were watching thus," said the bachelor. "You would not give her pain?"

"I am not so sure of that, if it would only rouse her. She has slept so very long. And yet I am rash to say so. It is a good and happy sleep—eh?"

"Indeed it is," returned the bachelor. "Indeed, indeed, it is!"

"That's well! and the waking," faltered the old man.

"Happy too. Happier than tongue can tell, or heart of man conceive."

They watched him as he rose and stole on tiptoe to the other chamber where the lamp had been replaced. They listened as he spoke again within its silent walls. They looked into the faces of each other, and no man's cheek was free from tears. He came back, whispering that she was still asleep, but that he thought she had moved. It was her hand, he said—a little—a very, very, little—but he was pretty sure she had moved it—perhaps in seeking him. He had known her to do that before now, though in the deepest sleep the while. And when he had said this, he dropped into his chair again, and clasping his hands above his head, uttered a cry never to be forgotten.

The poor schoolmaster motioned to the bachelor that he would come upon the other side, and speak to him. They gently unlocked his fingers, which he had twisted in his grey hair, and pressed them in their own.

"He will hear me," said the schoolmaster, "I am sure. He will hear either me or you if we beseech him. She would at all times."

"I will hear any voice she liked to hear," cried the old man. "I love all she loved!"

"I know you do," returned the schoolmaster. "I am certain of it. Think of her; think of all the trials and afflictions you have shared together; of all the sorrows and all the pleasant pleasures, you have jointly known."

"I do. I do. I think of nothing else."

"I would have you think of nothing else to-night—of nothing but those things which will soften your heart, dear friend, and open it to old affections and old times. It is so that she should speak to you herself, and in her name it is that I speak now."

"You do well to speak softly," said the old man. "We will not wake her. I should be glad to see her eyes again, and to see her smile. There is a smile upon her young face now, but it is fixed and changeless. I would have it come and go. That shall be in Heaven's good time. We will not wake her."

"Let us not talk of her in her sleep, but as she used to be when you were journeying together, far away—as she was at home, in the old house from which you fled together—as she was in the old cheerful time," said the schoolmaster.

"She was always cheerful—very cheerful," cried the old man, looking steadfastly at him. "There was ever something mild and quiet about her, I remember, from the first; but she was of a happy nature."

"We have heard you say," pursued the schoolmaster, "that in this, and in all goodness, she was like her mother. You can think of, and remember her?"

He maintained his steadfast look, but gave no answer.

"Or even one before her," said the bachelor. "It is many years ago, and affliction makes the time longer, but you have not forgotten her whose death contributed to make this child so dear to you, even before you knew her worth or could read her heart. Say, that you could carry back your thoughts to very distant days—to the time of your early life—when, unlike this fair flower, you did not pass your path alone. Say, that you could remember, long ago, another child who loved you dearly, you being but a child yourself. Say, that you had a brother, long forgotten, long unseen, long separated from you, who now, at last, in your utmost need came back to comfort and console you?"

"To be to you what you were once to him," cried the younger, falling on his knee before him; "to repay your old affection, brother dear, by constant care, solicitude, and love; to be, at your right hand, what he never ceased to be when oceans rolled between us; to call, to witness his unchanging truth and mindfulness of bygone days, whole years of desolation. Give me but one word of recognition, brother—and never—no never, in the brightest moment of our youngest days, when, poor silly boys, we thought to pass our lives together—have we been half as dear and precious to each other as we shall be from this time hence?"

The old man looked from face to face, and his lips moved; but no sound came from them in reply.

"If we were knit together then," pursued the younger brother, "what will be the bond between us now! Our love and fellowship began in childhood, when life was all before us, and will be resumed when we have proved it, and are but children at the last. As many restless spirits, who have hunted fortune, fame, or pleasure through the world, retire in their decline to where they first drew breath, vainly seeking to be children before they die, so we, less fortunate than they in early life, but happier in its closing scenes, will set up our rest again among our boyish haunts; and going home with no hope realised, that had its growth in manhood—carrying back nothing that we brought away, but our old yearnings to each other—saving no fragment from the wreck of life, but that which first endeared it, may be indeed but children as at first. And even," he added, in an altered voice, "even if what I read to name has come to pass—even if it be so, or is to be (which Heaven forbid and spare us!)—still, dear brother, we are not apart, and have that comfort in our great affliction."

By little and little, the old man had drawn back towards the inner chamber, while these words were spoken. He pointed thereto, as he replied, with trembling lips.

"You plot among you to wean my heart from her. You never will do that—never while I have life. I have no relative or friend but her—I never had—I never will have. She is all in all to me. It is too late to part us now."

Waving them off with his hand, and calling softly to her as he went, he stole into the room. They who were left behind drew close together, and after a few whispered words—not unbroken by emotion, or easily uttered—followed him. They moved so gently, that their footsteps made no noise; but there were sobs from among the group, and sounds of grief and mourning.

For she was dead. There, upon her little bed, she lay at rest. The solemn stillness was no marvel now.

She was dead. No sleep so beautiful and calm, so free from trace of pain, so fair to look upon. She seemed a creature fresh from the hand of God, and waiting for the breath of life; not one who had lived and suffered death.

Her couch was dressed with here and there some winter berries and green leaves, gathered in a spot she had been used to favor. "When I die, put near me something that has loved the light, and had the sky above it always." Those were her words.

She was dead. Dear, gentle, patient, noble Nell, was dead. Her little bird—a poor slight thing the pressure of a finger would have crushed—was stirring nimbly in its cage; and the strong heart of its child-mistress was mute and motionless for ever.

Where were the traces of her early cares, her sufferings, and fatigues? All gone. Sorrow was dead indeed in her, but peace and perfect happiness were born; imaged in her tranquil beauty and profound repose.

And still her former self lay there, unaltered in this change. Yes. The old fireside had smiled upon that same sweet face; it had passed like a dream through haunts of misery and care; at the door of the poor schoolmaster on the summer evening, before the furnace fire upon the cold wet night, at the still bedside of the dying boy, there had been the same mild, lovely look. So shall we know the angels in their majesty after death.

The old man held one languid arm in his, and had the small hand tight folded to his breast, for warmth. It was the hand she had stretched out to him with her last smile—the hand that had led him on through all their wanderings. Ever and anon he pressed it to his lips; then hugged it to his breast again, murmuring that it was warmer now; and as he said it he looked, in agony, to those who stood around, as if imploring them to help her.

She was dead, and past all help, or need of it. The ancient rooms she had seemed to fill with life, even while her own was waning fast—the garden she had tended—the eyes she had gladdened—the noiseless haunts of many a thoughtful hour—the paths she had trodden as it were but yesterday—could know her no more.

"It is not," said the schoolmaster, as he bent down to kiss her on the cheek, and gave his tears free vent, "it is not on earth that Heaven's justice ends. Think what it is compared with the World to which her young spirit has winged its early flight, and say, if one deliberate wish expressed in solemn terms above this bed could call her back to live, which of us would utter it!"

THE TURCOMAN'S CHARGER.

On! on! my bold steed, with the footsteps of wrath,
The foes of my fathers lie thick in my path!
On! on! my bold Arab, thy fellows are round:
Now, praise to the Prophet! how bravely we bound!

Hark to that sound! "Allah hu! Allah hu!"

'Tis the Osmanli shouting his wild halloo;
Rising and falling as onward they come,
To the clash of the cymbal and boom of the drum.

Ring round me, my comrades, your sabres are bright,
And dear to my eyes is their glorious light;
Oh! grasp them yet closer, and heed that each blow,
Fall truly and deep in the heart of the foe!

How proudly ye gallop, brave troops that ye are!
My brothers in peace, my companions in war!
The Seldan might envy the hearts that I own,
Though his armies, like locusts, environed his throne.

Though the jewels gleam bright in his coffers of gold;
Though his kingdoms be broad, and his soldiers be bold—
The desert's my empire—my sceptre the sword,
And I am the chief of my Turcoman horde!

Ha! charge! we are on them—spare them not now!
The Angel of Death sets his seal on their brow!
Strike boldly! each man is an army alone,—
THE PROPHET IS WITH US! the day is our own!

A NEW VIEW OF THE FALL.—Every Biblical student is aware that the verb "to know," and its derivative, "knowledge," are used in Hebrew to signify physical perception, at least as frequently as mental reflection. There are fruits which do, in a very remarkable degree, influence our sensations; opium, hemp seed, and the juice of the grape, for instance, produce soporific and exhilarating effects. It is, therefore, very possible that the fruit of the tree of knowledge might have had a stimulating efficacy, and might, therefore, for obvious reasons, have been prohibited. The love of excitement is universal in the human race; people will run into extreme peril for the mere sake of determining how they would feel under such circumstances; and the description of an untried sensation, even though it should be a painful one, excites an earnest desire for its perception. In the prohibition of this fruit, physical results are denounced, not as chastisements, but as natural and necessary consequences. "In the day that thou eatest thereof, dying thou shalt die;" intimating that the fruit would produce constitutional effects which would render mortality inevitable. Thus viewed, the prohibition ceases to be a capricious test; it became a salutary warning; designed, like every other divine law, for the preservation of God's creatures. The obedience required of Adam and Eve was not submission to an arbitrary mandate, but the observance of a condition necessary to their continuance in the Paradisiacal state; it was the reasonable adherence to a necessary requisition, not the blind homage to the will of a despot.—[Dr. Taylor's Natural History of Society.

DR. JOHNSON AND MRS. SIDDONS.—In spite of the ill-founded and vulgar contempt which Johnson professed to entertain for actors, he persuaded himself to treat Mrs. Siddons with all the politeness he could muster. When this lady called on him in Bell-court, and Frank, his servant, could not immediately provide her with a chair, Johnson said, "You see, Madam, wherever you go there are no seats to be got."

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

[Several legal topics have been touched upon in these papers, which seem to have attracted some little attention amongst legal readers, as, at least, would appear from various communications—some at considerable length, some anonymous, others not—addressed, through the publishers, to "The Author of Ten Thousand a Year, in Blackwood's Magazine." The principal matters thus discussed are the power of an heir, in the life-time of his ancestor, (to speak popularly, though not with legal accuracy, since nemo est heres viventis), to convey away his expectancy in fee, so as to bind himself, and those claiming under him, by estoppel on the subsequent descent of the estate. On this point have been received several communications—one of them from, perhaps, the greatest lawyer in England. 'Tis doubtless an important point; and where doctors differ I am not presumptuous enough to volunteer an opinion, though I entertain a pretty decisive one. Those who think that I am wrong, had better, perhaps, again refer to their books. Mine I had consulted pretty anxiously before sending off my MS. to the press. The next point is, the effect given by Lord Widdrington, C. J., at the trial, (in which he is represented as being subsequently confirmed by the decision of the Court of King's Bench,) to the ERASURE in the deed of confirmation. From two letters I learn that three or four clients of the writers of them have conceived great alarm on this subject, and have directed all their deeds to be overhauled, and, in case of an erasure being discovered, submitted to eminent counsel! Such erasures have been discovered, it would seem, in two instances. In one, the counsel differed from Lord Widdrington; in the other he agreed.

The question, then, here is, Whether, when an ancient deed (i. e. upwards of thirty years old, after which period a deed is said to prove itself) is produced from the proper custody in support of the rights of the party producing it, and there proves to be an erasure in it in an essential part of the deed—such deed ought to be rejected, unless the erasure can be accounted for; or admitted upon the presumption that such erasure occurred before the execution of the deed? Now, upon this point also I have formed a pretty strong opinion, and referred again to the authorities; and venture to give in my adhesion to the opinion of Lord Widdrington and his court. It is rather singular that, about a fortnight ago, Lord Brougham, in delivering the judgement of the House of Lords in three appeal cases from Scotland, each of which was a case depending upon the effect of an erasure, expressly declared the Scotch law to be to the effect laid down in these papers, and decided accordingly, admitting the cases to be full of grievous hardship—in one instance, a widow losing the whole of the provision which had been made for her by her deceased husband. Whether or not my notions of the English law on this subject are antiquated, and contrary to those entertained by the judges and the bar since I ceased practising, I leave for them who are competent to form an opinion to decide. As for several other communications of a different nature—some similarly, others differently addressed—surely, on consideration, the authors of them cannot expect any answer, nor yet construe silence into discourtesy.—Z.

—, near London, 14th August, 1840.

Rank is very apt to attract and dazzle vulgar and feeble optics; and the knowledge that such is its effect, is unspeakably gratifying to a vain and ignorant possessor of that rank. Of the truth of one part of this observation, take as an illustration the case of Tittlebat Titmouse; of the other, that of the Earl of Dreddlington. The former's dinner engagement with the latter, his august and awful kinsman, was an event of such magnitude as to absorb almost all his faculties in the contemplation of it, and also occasion him great anxiety in preparing for an effective appearance upon so signal an occasion. Mr. Gammon had repeatedly, during the interval, instructed his anxious pupil, if so he might be called, as to the manner in which he ought to behave. He was—heaven save the mark, poor Titmouse!—to assume an air of mingled deference, self-possession, and firmness; not to be overawed by the greatness with which he would be brought into contact, nor unduly elated by a sense of his own suddenly acquired importance. He was, on the other hand, to steer evenly between the extremes of timorousness and temerity—that happy mean, so grateful to those able to appreciate the effort and object of those attaining to it. Titmouse was to remember that, great as was the Earl of Dreddlington, he was yet but a man—related, moreover, by consanguinity to him, the aforesaid Titmouse—who might, moreover, before many years should have elapsed, be himself Earl of Dreddlington, or at least Lord Drellincourt, and, by consequence, equally entitled, with the present possessor of that resplendent position, to the homage of mankind. At the same time, that the Earl's advanced years gave him a natural claim to the respect and deference of his young kinsman, whom, moreover, he was about to introduce into the sublime regions of aristocracy, and also of political society. Titmouse might derive a few ingredients of consolation, from the reflection, that his income probably exceeded by a third that of the Earl of Dreddlington. This is the sum of Mr. Gammon's general instructions to his eager and anxious pupil; but he also gave Titmouse many minor hints and suggestions. He was to drink very little wine—(whereat Titmouse demurred somewhat vehemently, and asked "How the d—! was he to get his steam up?")—and on no account to call for beer or porter, to which plebeian beverages, indeed, he might consider himself as having bid a long and last adieu;—to say "my lord" and "your lordship," in addressing the Earl—"my lady" and "your ladyship," in addressing Lady Cecilia;—and, above all, never to appear in a hurry, but to do and say whatever he had to do and to say calmly; for that the nerves of aristocracy were very delicate, and could not bear a bustle, or the slightest display of energy or feeling. Then, as to his dress—Gammon, feeling himself treading on very doubtful ground, intimated merely that the essence of true fashion was simplicity—but here Titmouse grew fidgety, and his Mentor ceased.

During the night which ushered in the eventful day of Titmouse's dining with the Earl of Dreddlington, our friend got but very little sleep. Early in the morning he engaged a handsome glass coach to convey him westward in something like style, and before noon his anxieties were set at rest by the punctual arrival of various articles of dress, and decoration, and scent—for Titmouse had a great idea of scents. His new watch and its brilliant gold guard-chain—his eyes glistened upon them. What, he thought, would he have been without them. About half-past three o'clock he retired to his bed-room, and resigned himself into the hands of the tip-top hairdresser from the strand, whose agreeable manipulations, and still more agreeable small-talk, occupied upwards of an hour, Titmouse giving the anxious operator abundant notice of the high quarter in which his handiwork was likely soon to be scrutinized.

"Pray-a, can you tell me," quoth Titmouse, drawlingly, shortly after Twirl had commenced his operations, "how long it will take me to get from this infernal part of the town to Grosvenor Square? Dem long way, is n't it, Mr. What's-your-name?"

"Grosvenor Square, sir?" said Twirl, glibly, but with a perceptible dash of deference in his tone; "why it is, as one might say, a tolerable way off, certainly; but you can't well miss your way there, sir, of all places in town!"

"My coachman," interrupted Titmouse, with a fine air, "of course, had I thought of it, he must know."

"Oh! to be sure, sir. There's none but people of the most highest rank lives in that quarter, sir. Excuse me, sir, but I have a brother-in-law that's valet to the Duke of Ding-Dong, there!"

"Indeed! How far off is that from Lord Dreddlington's?" inquired Titmouse, carelessly.

"Lord Dreddlington's, sir?—Well, I never! Is n't it particular strange, if that's where you're going, sir; it's next door to the Duke's—the very next door, sir!"

"Pon my life, is it, indeed? How devilish odd!"

"Know the Earl of Dreddlington then, I presume, sir?"

"Ya-a-s, I should think so; he's my—my—relation, that's all; and devilish near too!"

Mr. Twirl instantly conceived a kind of reverence for the gentleman upon whom he was operating.

"Well, sir," he presently added, in a still more respectful tone than before, "p'raps you'll think it a liberty sir; but, do you know, I've several times had the honor of seeing his lordship in the street at a little distance—and there's a—family likeness between you, sir—pon my word, sir. It struck me, directly I saw you, that you was like some nob I had seen at the other end of the town." [Here Titmouse experienced pleasurable emotions, similar to those of a cat when you pass your hand down its glossy coat in the right direction.] "Will you allow me, sir, to give your hair a good brushing, sir, before I dress it? I always like to take the greatest pains with the hair of my quality customers. Do you know, sir, that I had the honor of dressing his Grace's hair for a whole fortnight together, once when my brother-in-law was ill; and though, p'raps I ought n't to say it, but his Grace expressed the highest satisfaction at my exertions, sir."

"Pon my life, and I should say you were an uncommon good hand—I've known lots worse, I assure you; men that would have spoiled the best head of hair going, by Jove!"

"Sir, you're very kind. I assure you, sir, that to do justice to a gent's hair requires an uncommon deal of practice, and a sort of natural talent for it, besides. Lord, sir! how much depends on a gent's hair, do n't it? Of two coming into a room, it makes all the difference, sir! Believe me, sir, it's no use being well-dressed, nay, nor good-looking, if as how the hair a'n't done, what I call, correct."

"By Jove, I really think you're nigh about the mark," said Titmouse; and after a pause, during which Mr. Twirl had been brushing away at one particular part of the head with some vehemence. "Well," he exclaimed, with a sigh—"I'm blest if I can manage it, do what I will!"

"Eh? What's that? What is it?" inquired Titmouse, a little alarmedly.

"Nothing, sir; only it's what we gents, in our profession, calls a feather, which is the most obstinatest thing in nature."

"What's a feather?" quoth Titmouse, rather faintly.

"Why, sir, 't is when a small lot of hair on a gent's head will stick up, do all we can to try and get it down; and (excuse me, sir,) you've got a regular ratter!" Titmouse put up his hand to feel, Twirl guided it to the fatal spot: there it was, just as Twirl had described it.

"What's to be done?" murmured Titmouse.

"I'm afraid, sir, you don't use our ostrich grease and rhinoceros marrow, sir!"

"Your what?" cried Titmouse, apprehensively, with a dimly distinct recollection of the tragedy of the Cyan-o-chaitanthropoipoion, and the Damascus cream, and the Tetraragmenon Abracadabra; matters which he at once mentioned to Mr. Twirl.

"Ah, it's not my custom, sir," quoth Twirl, "to run down other gents' inventions; but my real opinion is, that they're all an imposition—a rank imposition, sir. I didn't like to say it, sir; but I soon saw there had been somebody practising on your hair."

"What, is it very plain?" cried Titmouse, starting up and stepping to the glass.

"No, sir—not so very plain; only you've got, as I might say, accustomed to the sight of it; but when it's properly curled, and puckered up, and frizzed about, it won't show—nor the feather neither, sir; so, by your leave, here goes, sir;" and, after about a quarter of an hour's more labor, he succeeded in parting it right down the middle of the head, bringing it out into a bold curl towards each eyebrow, and giving our friend quite a new and very fascinating appearance, even in his own eyes. And as for the color—it really was not so very marked, after all; a little purple-hued and mottled, to be sure, in parts, but not to a degree to attract the eye of a casual observer. Twirl having declared, at length, his labors completed—regarding Titmouse's head with a look of proud satisfaction—Titmouse paid him half-a-crown, and also ordered a pot of ostrich grease and of rhinoceros marrow, (the one being sweet, the other lard, differently scented,) and was soon left at liberty to proceed with the important duties of the toilet. It took him a good while; but in the end he was supremely successful. He wore black tights, (i. e. pantaloons fitting closely to his legs, and tied round his ankles with black ribbons,) silk stockings, and shoes with glittering silver buckles. His white neckerchief was tied with great elegance, not a wrinkle superfluous being visible in it. His shirt-front of lace, had two handsome diamond pins, connected together by a little delicate gold chain, glistening in the midst of it. Then he had a white waistcoat edge, next a crimson one, and lastly a glorious sky-blue satin waistcoat, spangled all over with gold flowers inwrought—and across it hung his new gold watchguard, and his silver guard for his eyeglass, producing an inconceivably fine effect. His coat was of a light brown, of exquisite cut, fitting him as closely as if he had been born in it, and with burnished brass buttons, of sugar-loaf shape. "T was padded also with great judgement, and really took off more of his round-shouldered awkwardness of figure than any coat he had ever before had. Then he had a fine white pocket-handkerchief, soaked in lavender water, and immaculate white kid gloves. Thus habited, he stood before his glass, bowing fifty different times, and adjusting his expression to various elegant forms of address—quite content. He was particularly struck with the combined effect of the two curls of his hair toward each eye, and the hair underneath his chin curved upwards on each side of his mouth in complete symmetry. I have ascertained from Mr. Titmouse himself that on this memorable occasion of his first introduction to nobility, every item of dress and decoration was entirely new; and when at length his labors had been completed, he felt great composure of mind, and a consciousness of the decisive effect he must produce upon those into whose presence he was so soon to be ushered. His "carriage" was presently announced; and after keeping it standing a few minutes, merely for form's sake, he gently placed his hat upon his head, drew on one glove, took his little ebony cane in his hand, and, with a hurried inward prayer that he might be equal to the occasion, stepped forth from his apartment, and passed on to the glass coach. Such a brilliant little figure, I will take upon myself to say, had never before issued, nor will perhaps ever again issue, from the Cabbage-stalk hotel. The waiters whom he passed, inclined toward him with instinctive reverence. He was very fine, to be sure; but who could, they justly thought, be dressed too finely that had ten thousand a-year, and was going to dine with a lord in Grosvenor Square? Titmouse was soon on his way towards that at once desired and dreaded region. He gazed with a look of occasional pity and contempt, as he passed along, at the plebeian pedestrians, and the lines of shops on each side of the narrow streets, till he began to perceive indications of superior modes of existence; and then he began to feel a little fidgety and nervous. The streets grew wider, the squares greater, hackney coaches (unsightly objects) became fewer and fewer, giving place to splendid vehicles, coaches, and chariots, with one, two, and even three footmen clustering behind, with long canes, with cockades, with shoulder-knots; crimson, yellow, blue, green hampercloths, with burnished crests upon them, and sleek coachmen with wigs and three-cornered hats, and horses that pawed the ground with very pride; ladies within, glistening in satin, lace, and jewels—their lords beside them, leaning back with countenances so stern and haughty; oh, by all that was magnificent! Titmouse felt himself getting now within the very vortex of greatness and fashion, and felt a frequent fluttering and catching of the breath. He was, however, now in for it—and there was no retreat. As he neared Grosvenor square, he heard, ever and anon, terrific thundering noises at the doors, opposite which these splendid vehicles drew up—as if the footmen were infuriated because the doors did not fly open of themselves, at the sound of the approaching carriage-wheels. At length he entered Grosvenor square, that "pure empyrean" of earthly greatness. Carriages rolled haughtily past him, others dashed desperately onward: at each side of Lord Dreddlington's house, were carriages setting down with tremendous uproar. Mr. Titmouse felt his color going, and his heart began to beat much faster than usual. "T was quite in vain that he "hemmed" two or three times, by way of trying to re-assure himself: he felt that his hour was come, and would have been glad at the moment for any decent excuse for driving off home again, and putting off the evil day a little longer. Opposite the dreaded door had now drawn up Mr. Titmouse's glass coach; and the decent coachman—whose well-worn hat, and long, clean, but threadbare blue coat, and ancient-looking top-boots, bespoke the wearer's thriftiness—slowly alighting, threw the reins on his quiet horse's backs, and gave a modest ra-tat-tat-tat at the door without ringing.

"What name shall I give, sir?" said he, returning to his coach, and letting down the loud clanking steps, with a noise for which Titmouse could have heartily kicked him.

"Titmouse—Mr. Titmouse;" replied he, hurriedly, as the lofty door was thrown open by the corpulent porter, disclosing several footmen, with powdered heads, standing in the hall waiting for him.

"Mr. Titmouse!" exclaimed the coachman to the servants—"When shall I come back for you, sir?"

"D—me, sir—don't bother me," faltered Titmouse; and the next moment was in the hands of the Philistines—the door was closed upon him. All his presence of mind had evaporated; the excellent lessons given him by Mr. Gammon, had disappeared like breath from the polished mirror. Though Lord Dreddlington's servants had never before seen in the house so strange an object as poor little Titmouse, they were of far too highly polished manners to appear to notice any thing unusual. They silently motioned him up stairs with a bland, courteous air, he carrying his little agate-headed cane in one hand, and his new hat in the other. A gentlemanly person in a full black dress suit, opened the drawing-room door for him, with an elegant inclination which Titmouse very gracefully returned. A faint mist seemed to be in the drawing-room for a second or two; but quickly clearing away, Titmouse beheld, at the upper end, but two figures, that of an old gentleman and a young lady—in fact, the Earl of Dreddlington and Lady Cecilia. Now, that great man had not been a whit behindhand with the little being now trembling before him in the matter of dress; being, in truth, full as anxious to make an effective first appearance in the eyes of Titmouse, as he in those of the Earl of Dreddlington. And each had succeeded in his way. There was really little or no difference between them. The Right Honorable the Earl of Dreddlington was an old experienced fool, and Tittlebat Titmouse a young inexperienced one. They were the same species of plant, but grown in different soils. The one had had to struggle through a neglected existence by the dusty, hard road-side of life; the other had had all the advantage of hot house cultivation—its roots striking deep into, and thriving upon, the rich manure of sycophancy and adulation. We have seen how anxious was our little friend to appear as became the occasion, before his great kinsman; who, in his turn, had several times during the day exulted secretly in the anticipation of the impression which must be produced upon the mind of Titmouse by the sudden display, in the Earl's person, of the sublimest distinction that society can bestow, short of royalty. It had once or twice occurred to the Earl, whether he could find any fair excuse for appearing in his full General's uniform; but on mature reflection, governed by that simplicity and severity of taste which ever distinguished him, he abandoned that idea, and appeared in a plain blue coat, white waistcoat, and black knee-breeches. But on his left breast glittered the star, round his left knee glistened the garter, and across his waistcoat was the broad blue and red ribands of the Garter and the Bath. His hair was white and fine; his cold blue eye and haughty lip gave him an expression of severe dignity; and he stood erect as an arrow. Lady Cecilia reclined on the sofa with an air of languor and ennui that had become habitual to her; and was dressed in glistening white satin, with a necklace of large and very beautiful pearls. The Earl was standing in an attitude of easy grace to receive his guest, as to whose figure and height he was quite in the dark—Mr. Titmouse might be a great or a little man, and forward or bashful. "Ah, my God!" involuntarily exclaimed the Earl to himself, the instant his eye caught sight of Titmouse, who approached slowly, making profound and formal obeisances. Lord Dreddlington was rooted to the spot he had occupied when Titmouse entered. If his servants had turned an ape into the drawing-room, the Earl could scarcely have felt or exhibited greater amazement than he now experienced for a moment. "Ah, my God!" thought he, "what a fool have we here? what creature is this?" Then it flashed across his mind—"Is this THE FUTURE LORD DREDLINGTON?" He was on the point of recoiling from his suddenly-discovered kinsman in dismay, (as for Lady Cecilia, she gazed at him in silent horror,) when his habitual self-command came to his assistance; and, advancing very slowly a step or two toward Titmouse, who, after a hurried glance around him, saw no place to deposit his hat and cane upon except the floor, on which he accordingly dropped them, the Earl extended his hand, and bowed courteously, but with infinite concern in his features.

"I am happy, Mr. Titmouse, to make your acquaintance," said the Earl, slowly. "Sir, I have the honor to present you to my daughter, the Lady Cecilia." Titmouse, who by this time had got into a sort of cold sweat—a condition from which the Earl was really not very far removed—made a very profound and formal bow, (he had been taking lessons from a posture-master to one of the theatres,) first to the Earl, and then to Lady Cecilia, who rose about two inches from the sofa, and then sank again upon it, without removing her eyes from the figure of Titmouse, who went on bowing first to the one and then to the other, till the Earl had engaged him in conversation.

"It gives me pleasure, sir, to see that you are punctual in your engagements. I am so too, sir; and owe no small portion of my success in life to it. Punctuality, sir, in small matters, leads to punctuality in great matters." This was said in a very deliberate and pompous manner.

"Oh yes, my lord! quite so, your lordship," stammered Titmouse, suddenly recollecting a part of Gammon's instructions; "to be sure—wouldn't have been behind time, your lordship, for a minute, my lord; bad manners, if it please your lordship!"

"Will you be seated, sir?" interrupted the Earl, deliberately motioning him to a chair, and then sitting down beside him; after which the Earl seemed, for a second or two, to forget himself, staring in silence at Titmouse, and then in consternation at Lady Cecilia. "I—I—" said he, suddenly recollecting himself, "beg your pardon, sir, I mean I congratulate you upon your recent success. Sir, it must have been rather a surprise to you?"

"Oh yes, sir—my lord, most uncommon, may it please your lordship—particular—but right is right—thank your lordship!"

"Oh Heavens! merciful Heavens! How horrid all this is! Am I awake, or only dreaming? 'T is an idiot—and, what's worse, a vulgar idiot. My God! And this thing may be Lord Dreddlington." This was what was passing through Lord Dreddlington's mind, while his troubled eye was fixed upon Titmouse.]

"It is indeed, Mr. Titmouse," replied his lordship, "very true; sir, what you say is correct. Quite so; exactly." His eye was fixed on Titmouse, but his words were uttered, as it were, mechanically, and in a musing manner. It flitted for a moment across his mind, whether he should ring the bell, and order the servant to show out of the house the fearful imp that had just been shown into it; but at that critical moment he detected poor Titmouse's eye fixed with a kind of reverent intensity upon his lordship's star. "T was a lucky look that for Titmouse, it began to melt away the ice that was getting round the little heart of his august relative. 'T was evident that the poor young man had not been accustomed to society, thought the Earl, with an approach towards the compassionate mood. He was frightfully dressed, to be sure; and as for his speech, he was manifestly overawed by the presence in which he found himself; [that thought melted a little more of the ice.] Yet, was it not evident that he had some latent power of appreciating real distinction? [the little heart that was under his lordship's star, here lost all the ice that had begun so suddenly to encrust it.] And again;—he has actually cut out the intolerable Aubrey, and is now lawful owner of Yatton—of ten thousand a-year.

"Did you see the review to-day, sir?" inquired the Earl, rather blandly. "His Majesty was there, sir, and seemed to enjoy the scene." Titmouse, with a timid air, said that he had not seen it, as he had been upon the river; and after a few more general observations—"Will you permit me, sir? It is from the House of Lords," said the Earl, as a note was brought him, which he immediately opened and read. Lady Cecilia also appearing engaged reading, Titmouse had a moment's breathing time and interval of relief. What would he have given, he thought, for some other person, or several persons, to come in and divide the attention—the intolerably oppressive attention of the two august individuals then before him! He seized the opportunity to cast a furtive glance around the room. It opened into a second, which opened into a third: how spacious each and lofty! And glittering glass chandeliers in each! What chimney and pier glasses! What rich crimson satin curtains—they must have cost twelve or fourteen shillings a-yard at least! The carpets of the finest Brussels—and they felt like velvet to the feet; then the brackets, of marble and gold, with snowy statues and vases glistening upon each; chairs so delicate, and gilded all over—he almost feared to sit down on them. What could the Quirks and Tag-rags think of this? Faugh!—only to think for a moment of Alibi House and Satin Lodge! Then there was the Lady Cecilia—a lady of high rank! How rich her dress—and how haughtily beautiful she looked as she reclined upon the sofa! (she was in fact busy conning over the new opera coming out the next evening.) And the Earl of Dreddlington—there he was, reading, doubtless, some letter from the king or one of the royal family—a man of great rank—with star, garter and ribands, red and blue—all just as he had seen in pictures, and heard and read of—what must that star have cost? (Ay, indeed, poor Lord Dreddlington, it had cost you the labor of half a life of steadfast sycophancy, of watchful manoeuvring, and desperate exertion!) And those ribands—he had never seen any of such a breadth—they must have been manufactured on purpose for the Earl!—How white were his hands! And he had an antique massive signet-ring on his forefinger, and two glittering rings at least on each of his little fingers—positively Titmouse at length began to regard him almost as a god; and yet the amazing thought occurred that this august being was allied to him by the ties of relationship. Such were the thoughts and reflections passing through the mind of Titmouse, during the time that Lord Dreddlington was engaged in reading his letter—and afterwards during the brief intervals which elapsed between the various observations addressed to him by his lordship.

The gentleman in black at length entered the room, and advancing slowly and noiselessly toward the Earl, said in a quiet manner, "Dinner, my Lord;" and retired. Into what new scenes of splendid embarrassment was this the signal for Mr. Titmouse's introduction? thought our friend, and trembled.

"Mr. Titmouse, will you give your arm to the Lady Cecilia?" said the Earl, motioning him to the sofa. Up jumped Titmouse, and approached hastily the recumbent beauty, who languidly arose, arranged her train with one hand, and with the other, having drawn on her glove, just barely touched the proffered arm of Titmouse, extended toward her at a very acute angle, and at right angles with his own body—stammering, "Honor to take your ladyship—uncommon proud—this way, my lady." Lady Cecilia took no more notice of him than if he had been a dumb waiter, walking beside him in silence—the Earl following. To think that a nobleman of high rank was walking behind him! Would to heaven, thought the embarrassed Titmouse, that he had two fronts, one for the Earl behind, and the other to be turned full toward Lady Cecilia! The tall servants, powdered and in light blue liveries, stood like a guard of honor around the dining-room door. That room was extensive and lofty: what a solitary sort of state were they about to dine in! Titmouse felt cold though it was summer, and trembled as he followed, rather than led, his haughty partner to her seat; and then was motioned into his own by the Earl, himself sitting down opposite a chased silver soup tureen! A servant stood behind Lady Cecilia and Titmouse; also on the left of the Earl; while on his right, between his lordship and the glistening sideboard, stood a portly gentleman in black, with a bald head and a somewhat haughty countenance. Though Titmouse had touched nothing since breakfast, he felt not the slightest inclination to eat, and would have given the world to have dared to say as much, and be at once relieved from a vast deal of anxiety. Is it, indeed, easy to conceive of a fellow-creature in a state of more complete thralldom, at that moment, than poor little Titmouse? A little frog under the suddenly exhausted receiver of an air-pump, or a fish just plucked out of its own element, and flung gasping and struggling upon the grass, may serve to assist your conceptions of the position and sufferings of Mr. Titmouse. The Earl, who was on the look-out for it, observed his condition with secret but complete satisfaction; here he beheld the legitimate effect of rank and state upon the human mind. Titmouse got through the soup—of which about half-a-dozen spoonfuls only were put into his plate—pretty fairly. Any where else than at Lord Dreddlington's, Titmouse would have thought it thin watery stuff, with a few green things chopped up and swimming in it; but now he perceived that it had a sort of superior flavor. How some red mullet, enclosed in paper, puzzled poor Titmouse, is best known to himself.

"The Lady Cecilia will take wine with you, Mr. Titmouse, I dare say"—observed the Earl: and in a moment's time, but with perfect deliberation, the servants poured wine into the two glasses. "Your ladyship's health, my lady," faltered Titmouse. She slightly bowed, and a faint smile glimmered at the corners of her mouth—but unobserved by Titmouse.

"I think you said, Mr. Titmouse," quoth the Earl some time afterwards, "that you had not yet taken possession of Yatton?"

"No, my lord: but I go down the day after to-morrow—quite—if I may say it, my lord—quite in style."

"Ha, ha!" exclaimed the Earl, gently.

"Had you any acquaintance with the Aubreys, Mr. Titmouse?" inquired the Lady Cecilia.

"No, my lady—yes, your ladyship, (I beg your ladyship's pardon)—but, now I think of it, I had a slight acquaintance with Miss Aubrey." [Titmouse, Titmouse, you little wretch, how dare you say so?]

"She is considered pretty in the country, I believe?" drawled Lady Cecilia, languidly.

"Oh, most uncommon lovely! middling, only middling, my lady, I should say"—added Titmouse, suddenly; having observed, as he fancied, rather a displeased look in Lady Cecilia. He had begun his sentence with more energy than he had yet shewn in the house; he finished it hastily, and colored as he spoke—feeling that he had somehow committed himself.

"Do you form a new establishment at Yatton, sir?" inquired the Earl, "or take to any part of that of your predecessor?"

"I have not, please your lordship, made up my mind yet exactly—should like to know your lordship's opinion."

"Why, sir, I should be governed by circumstances—by circumstances, sir; when you get there, sir, you will be better able to judge of the course you should pursue."

"Do you intend, Mr. Titmouse, to live in town, or in the country?" inquired Lady Cecilia.

"A little of both, my lady—but mostly in town; because, as your ladyship sees, the country is devilish dull—'pon my life, my lady—my lord—beg a thousand pardons," he added, bowing to both, and blushing violently. Here he had committed himself; but his august companions bowed to him very kindly, and he presently recovered his self-possession.

"Are you fond of hunting, Mr. Titmouse?" inquired the Earl.

"Why, my lord, can't exactly say that I am—but your lordship sees, cases alter circumstances, and when I get down there among the country gents, p'raps I may do as they do, my lord."

"I presume, Mr. Titmouse, you have scarcely chosen a town residence yet?" inquired Lady Cecilia.

"No, my lady—not fixed it yet—was thinking of taking Mr. Aubrey's house in Grosvenor Square, understanding it is to be sold;" then turning towards the Earl—"because, as your lordship sees, I was thinking of getting into both the nests of the old birds, while both are warm"—he added, with a very faint smile.

"Exactly; yes—I see, sir—I understand you," replied Lord Dreddington, sipping his wine. His manner rather discomposed Titmouse, to whom it then very naturally occurred that the Earl might be warmly attached to the Aubreys, and not relish their being spoken of so lightly; so Titmouse hastily and anxiously added—"your lordship sees I was most particular sorry to make the Aubreys turn out. A most uncommon respectable gent, Mr. Aubrey: I assure your lordship I think so."

"I had not the honor of his acquaintance, sir," replied the Earl, coldly, and with exceeding stiffness, which flustered Titmouse not a little; and a pause occurred in the conversation for a minute or two. Dinner had now considerably advanced, and Titmouse was beginning to grow a little familiar with the routine of matters. Remembering Gammon's caution concerning the wine, and also observing how very little was drunk by the Earl and Lady Cecilia, Titmouse did the same; and during the whole of dinner had scarcely three full glasses of wine.

"How long is it," inquired the Earl addressing his daughter, "since they took that house?" Lady Cecilia could not say. "Stay—now I recollect—surely it was just before my appointment to the Household. Yes; it was about that time, I now recollect. I am alluding, Mr. Titmouse," continued the Earl, addressing him in a very gracious manner, "to an appointment under the Crown of some little distinction, which I was solicited to accept at the personal instance of his Majesty, on the occasion of our party coming into power—I mean that of Lord Steward of the Household."

"Dear me, my Lord! Indeed! Only to think, your lordship!" exclaimed Titmouse, with infinite deference in his manner, which encouraged the Earl to proceed.

"That, sir, was an office of great importance, and I had some hesitation in undertaking its responsibility. But, sir, when I had once committed myself to my sovereign and my country, I resolved to give them my best services. I had formed plans for effecting very extensive alterations, sir, in that department of the public service, which I have no doubt would have given great satisfaction to the country, as soon as the nature of my intentions became generally understood; when faction, sir, unfortunately prevailed, and we were compelled to relinquish office."

"Dear me, my lord! How particular sorry I am to hear it, my lord!" exclaimed Titmouse, as he gazed at the disappointed statesman with an expression of respectful sympathy.

"Sir, it gives me sincere satisfaction," said the Earl, after a pause, "to hear that our political opinions agree."

"Oh yes! my lord, quite; sure of that!"

"I assure you, sir, that some little acquaintance with the genius and spirit of the British constitution has satisfied me that this country can never be safely or advantageously governed except on sound Whig principles." He paused.

"Yes, my lord; it's quite true, your lordship."

"That, sir, is the only way I know of by which aristocratic institutions can be brought to bear effectively upon, to blend harmoniously with, the interests of the lower orders—the people, Mr. Titmouse." Titmouse thought this wonderfully fine, and sat listening as to an oracle of political wisdom. The Earl, observing it, began to form a much higher opinion of his little kinsman. "The unfortunate gentleman, your predecessor at Yatton, sir, if he had but allowed himself to have been guided by those who had mixed in public affairs before he was born," said the Earl with great dignity.

"'Pon my word, my lord, he was I've heard, a d—d Tory!—Oh my lady! my lord! humbly beg pardon," he added, turning pale; but the fatal word had been uttered, and heard by both; and he felt as if he could have sunk through the floor.

"Shall I have the honor of taking another glass of wine with you, sir?" inquired the Earl, rather gravely and severely, as if wishing Mr. Titmouse fully to appreciate the fearful breach of etiquette of which he had just been guilty. After they had bowed to each other, a very awkward pause occurred, which was at length broken by the considerate Lady Cecilia.

"Are you fond of the opera, Mr. Titmouse?"

"Very, my lady—most particular," replied Titmouse, who had been there once only.

"Do you prefer the opera, or the ballet? I mean the music or the dancing?"

"Oh, I understand your ladyship. 'Pon my word, my lady, prefer them both in their turns. The dancing is most uncommon superior; though I must say, my lady, the lady dancers there do most uncommonly—rather, I should say"—He said abruptly; his face flushed, and he felt as if he had been into a perspiration. What the deuce was he about? It seemed as if some devil within were urging him on from time to time, to commit himself. Good gracious! another word, and out would have come his opinion as to the shocking indecency of the ballet!

"I understand you, sir; I quite agree with you," said Lady Cecilia calmly; "the ballet does come on at a sad late hour; I often wish they would now and then have the ballet first."

"'Pon my life, my lady," quoth Titmouse, eagerly snatching at the plank that was thrown to him; "that is what I meant—nothing else, upon my soul, your ladyship."

"Do you intend taking a box there, Mr. Titmouse?" inquired her ladyship, with an appearance of interest in the expected answer.

"Why, your ladyship, they say a box there is a precious long figure;—but in course, my lady, when I've got to rights a little with my property—your ladyship understands—I shall do the correct thing."

Here a very long pause ensued. How dismally quiet and deliberate was every thing! The very servants, who noiselessly they waited! Every thing done just when it was wanted, yet no hurry, or bustle, or noise; and they looked so composed—so much at their ease. He fancied that they had scarce any thing else to do than look at him, and watch all his movements, which greatly embarrassed him, and he began to hate them. He tried hard to inspire himself with a reflection upon his own suddenly acquired and really great personal importance; absolute master of Ten Thousand a-Year, a relation of the great man at whose table he ate, and whose hired servants they were; but then his timorously-raised eye would light, for an instant, upon the splendid insignia of the earl; and he felt as oppressed as ever. What would he not have given for a few minutes' interval and sense of complete freedom and independence! And were these to be his feelings ever hereafter? Was this the sort of tremulous apprehension of offence, and embarrassment as to his every motive, to which he was to be doomed in high life? Oh, that he had but been born to it, like the Earl and the Lady Cecilia!

"Were you ever in the House of Lords, Mr. Titmouse?" inquired Lord Dreddington suddenly, after casting about for some little time for a topic on which he might converse with Titmouse.

"No, my lord, never—should most uncommon like to see it, my lord"—replied Titmouse, eagerly.

"Certainly, it is an impressive spectacle, sir, and well worth seeing."

"I suppose, my lord, your lordship goes there every day?"

"Why sir, I believe I am pretty punctual in my attendance. I was there to-day, sir, till the House rose. Sir, I am of opinion that hereditary legislators—a practical anomaly in a free state like this—but one which has innumerable unperceived advantages to recommend it—Sir, our country expects at our hands, in discharge of so grave a trust—in short, if we were not to be true to—we who are in a peculiar sense the guardians of public liberty—if we were once to betray our trust—Let me trouble you, sir, for a little of that—," said the Earl, using some foreign word which Titmouse had never heard of before, and looking towards a delicately constructed fabric, as of compressed snow, that stood before Titmouse. A servant stood in a twinkling beside him with his lordship's plate. Ah me! that I should have to relate so sad an event as presently occurred to Titmouse! He took a spoon; and, imagining the glistening fabric before him to be as solid as it looked, brought to bear upon it an adequate degree of force, even as if he had been going to scoop out a piece of Stilton cheese—and inserting his spoon at the summit of the snowy and deceitful structure, souse to the bottom went spoon, hand, coat-cuff and all, and a very dismal noise evidenced that the dish on which the spoon had descended with so much force—was no longer a dish. It was, in fact, broken in halves, and the liquid from within ran about on the cloth. * * * A cluster of servants was quickly around him. * * A mist came over his eyes; the color deserted his cheek; and he had a strange feeling, as if the end of all things was at hand.

"I beg you will think nothing of it—it really signifies nothing at all, Mr. Titmouse," said the Earl, kindly, observing his agitation.

"Oh dear! Oh my lord—your ladyship—what an uncommon stupid ass!"

"Pray don't distress yourself, Mr. Titmouse," said Lady Cecilia, really feeling for his evident misery, "or you will distress us."

"I beg—humbly beg pardon—please your lordship—your ladyship. I'll replace it with the best in London, the very first thing in the morning." Here the servant beside him, who was arranging the table-cloth, uttered a faint sound of suppressed laughter, which disconcerted Titmouse still more.

"Give yourself no concern—'tis only a trifle, Mr. Titmouse!—You understand?" said the Earl, kindly.

"But if your lordship will only allow me—expense is no object. I know the very best shop in Oxford Street."

"Suppose we take a glass of champagne together, Mr. Titmouse!" said the Earl, rather peremptorily; and Titmouse had sense enough to be aware that he was to drop the subject. It was a good while before he recovered even the little degree of self-possession which he had since first entering Lord Dreddington's house. He had afterwards no very distinct recollection of the manner in which he got through the rest of dinner, but a general sense of his having been treated with the most kind and delicate forbearance—no fuss made. Suppose such an accident had occurred at Satin Lodge, or even Alibi House!

Shortly after the servants had withdrawn, Lady Cecilia rose to retire. Titmouse, seeing the Earl approaching the bell, anticipated him in ringing it, and then darted to the door with the speed of a lamplighter to open it, as he did, just before a servant had raised his hand to it on the outside. Then he stood within, and the servant without, each bowing, and Lady Cecilia passed between them with stately step, her eyes fixed upon the ground, and her lip compressed, with the effort to check her inclination to a smile—perhaps, even laughter. Titmouse was now left alone with Lord Dreddington; and, on resuming his seat, most earnestly renewed his entreaties to be allowed to replace the dish which he had broken, assuring Lord Dreddington that "money was no object at all." He was encountered, however, with so stern a negative by his lordship, that, with a hurried apology, he dropped the subject; the Earl, however, good-naturedly adding, that he had perceived the joke intended by Mr. Titmouse, which was a very good one. This would have set off poor Titmouse again; but a glance at the face of his magnificent host sealed his lips.

"I have heard it said, Mr. Titmouse," presently commenced the Earl, "that you have been engaged in mercantile pursuits during the period of your exclusion from the estates which you have just recovered. Is it so sir?"

"Ye-e-e—sir—my lord—" replied Titmouse, hastily considering whether or not he should altogether sink the ship; but he dared hardly venture upon so very decisive a lie—"I was, please your lordship, in one of the greatest establishments in the mercery line in London—at the west end, my lord; most confidential, my lord; management of every thing; but somehow, my lord, I never took to it—your lordship understands!"

"Perfectly, sir; I can quite appreciate your feelings. But, sir, the mercantile interests of this great country are not to be overlooked. Those who are concerned in them, are frequently very respectable persons."

"Begging pardon, my lord—no, they a'n't—if your lordship only knew them as well as I do, my lord. Most uncommon low people. Do any thing to turn a penny, my lord; and often sell damaged goods for best."

"It is very possible, sir, that there may exist irregularities of that description; but upon the whole, sir, I am disposed to think that there are many very respectable persons engaged in trade. I have had the happiness, sir, to assist in passing measures that were calculated, by removing restrictions and protective duties, to secure to this country the benefits of free and universal competition. We have been proceeding, sir, for many years, on altogether a wrong principle; but, not to follow out this matter further, I must remind you, sir, that your acquaintance with the principles and leading details of mercantile transactions—undoubtedly one of the mainsprings of the national greatness—may hereafter be of use to your sir."

"Yes, my lord, 'pon my soul—when I'm furnishing my houses in town and country, I mean to go to market myself—please your lordship, I know a trick or two in trade, and can't be taken in, my lord. For instance, my lord, there's Tag-rag—a hem! hem!" he paused abruptly, and looked somewhat confusedly at the Earl.

"I did not mean that exactly," said his lordship, unable to resist a smile. "Pray, fill your glass, Mr. Titmouse." He did so. "You are of course aware that you have the absolute patronage of the borough of Yatton, Mr. Titmouse?—It occurs to me, that as our political opinions agree, and unless I am presumptuous, sir, in so thinking—I may be regarded, in a political point of view, as the head of the family—you understand, I hope, Mr. Titmouse?"

"Exactly, my lord—'pon my soul, it's all correct, my lord."

"Well—then—the family interests, Mr. Titmouse, must be looked after."

"Oh! in course, my lord, only too happy—certainly, my lord, we shall, I hope, make a very interesting family, if your lordship so pleases—I can have no objection, my lord!"

"It was a vile, a disgraceful trick, by which Ministers popped in their own man for our borough, Mr. Titmouse."

[Lord Dreddington alluded to the circumstance of a new writ having been moved for, immediately on Mr. Aubrey's acceptance of the Chiltern Hundreds, and, before the Opposition could be prepared for such a step, sent down without delay to Yatton, and Sir Percival Pickering, Bart., of Ludington Court, an intimate friend of Mr. Aubrey's, and a keen, unflinching Tory, being returned as member for the borough of Yatton, before the Titmouse influence could be brought for even one moment into the field; the few and willing electors of that ancient and loyal borough being only too happy to have the opportunity of voting for a man whose principles they approved—probably the last opportunity they would have of doing so.]

"Yes, my lord—Sir What-d'ye-call-him was a trifle too sharp for us, in that business, wasn't he?"

"It has succeeded, sir, for the moment, but"—continued his lordship, in a very significant and impressive manner—"it is quite possible that their triumph may be short in duration—Mr. Titmouse. Those who, like myself, are at headquarters—let me see you fill your glass, Mr. Titmouse. I have the honor to congratulate you, sir, on the recovery of your rights, and to wish you health and long life in the enjoyment of them."

"May it please your lordship, you're most uncommon polite"—commenced Titmouse, rising, and standing while he spoke—for he had had experience enough of society, to be aware that when a gentleman's health was drunk on important occasions, it became him to rise and acknowledge the compliment in such language as he could command—"and am particularly proud—a—a—I beg to propose, my lord, your lordship's very good health, and many thanks." Then he sat down; each poured out another glass of claret, and drank it off.

"It is extremely singular, sir, the reverses in life that one hears of."

[I cannot help pausing, for a moment, to suggest—what must have become of the Earl and his daughter, had they been placed in the situation of the unfortunate Aubreys.]

"Yes, my lord, your lordship's quite true, 'pon my word!—Most uncommon ups and downs! Lord, my lord, only to fancy me, a few months ago, trotting up and down Oxford street with my yard mea—" He stopped short, and colored violently.

"Well, sir, however humble might have been your circumstances, it is a consolation to reflect that the fates ordained it. Sir, there is nothing dishonorable in being poor, when it is not your own fault. Reverses of fortune, sir, have happened to some of the greatest characters in our history. You remember Alfred, sir!" Titmouse bowed assentingly; but had he been questioned, could have told, I suspect, very little about the matter.

"Allow me, sir, to ask whether you have come to any arrangement with your late opponent concerning the back rents?" inquired the Earl, with a great appearance of interest.

"No, my lord, not yet; but my solicitors say they'll soon have the screw on, please your lordship—that's just what they say—their very words."

"Indeed, sir!" replied the Earl, gravely. "What is the sum to which they say you are entitled, sir?"

"Sixty thousand pounds, my lord, at least—quite set me up at starting, my lord," replied Titmouse with great glee; but the Earl shuddered, and sipped his wine in silence.

"By the way, Mr. Titmouse," said the Earl, after a considerable pause—"I trust you will forgive me for suggesting whether it would not be a prudent step for you to go to one of the universities for at least a twelvemonth?"

"Humbly begging your lordship's pardon, am not I too old?" replied Titmouse. "Besides, I've talked the matter over with Mr. Gammon."

"Mr. Gammon? Allow me, sir, to ask who that may be?"

"One of my solicitors, my lord; a most remarkable clever man, and an out-and-out lawyer, my lord. It was he that found out all about my case, my lord. If your lordship was only to see him for a moment, your lordship would say, what a remarkable clever man that is!"

"You will forgive my curiosity, sir; but it must have surely required very ample means to have carried on so arduous a lawsuit as that which has terminated so successfully?"

"Oh yes, my lord! Quirk, Gammon and Snap did all that; and, between me and your lordship, I suppose I shall have to come down a pretty long figure, all on the nail, as your lordship understands; but I mean them to get it all out of that respectable gent, Mr. Aubrey." By quietly pressing his questions, the Earl got a good deal more out of Titmouse than he was aware of, concerning Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap; and conceived a special dislike for Gammon. The Earl gave him some pretty decisive hints about the necessity of being on his guard with such people—and hoped that he would not commit himself to any thing important without consulting his lordship, who would of course give him the advantage of his experience in the affairs of the world, and open his eyes to the designs of those whose only object was to make a prey of him. Titmouse began to feel that here, at length, he had met with a real friend—one whose suggestions were worthy of being received with the profoundest deference. Soon afterwards, he had the good fortune to please the Earl beyond expression, by venturing timidly to express his admiration of the splendid star worn by his lordship, who took the opportunity of explaining that and the other marks of distinction he wore, and others which he was entitled to wear, at great length, and with much minuteness—so as that he at length caused Titmouse to believe that he, Lord Dreddlington—the august head of the family—must have rendered more signal service, somehow or other, to his country than most men living. His lordship might not, perhaps, intend it; but he went on till he almost defied himself in the estimation of his little listener! One very natural question was perpetually trembling on the tip of Titmouse's tongue, viz., how and when he could get a star and garter for himself.

"Well, Mr. Titmouse," at length observed the Earl, after looking at his watch—"shall we adjourn to the drawing-room? The fact is, sir, that Lady Cecilia and I have an evening engagement at the Duke of Dunderwhistle's. I much regret being unable to take you with us, sir; but, as it is, shall we rejoin the Lady Cecilia?" continued his lordship, rising. Up jumped Titmouse; and the Earl and he were soon in the drawing-room, where, besides the Lady Cecilia, sat another lady, to whom he was not introduced in any way. This was Miss Macspleuchan, a distant connexion of the Earl's late countess—a very poor relation, who had entered the house of the Earl of Dreddlington, in order to eat the bitter, bitter bread of dependence. Poor soul! you might tell by a glance at her, that she did not thrive upon it. She was about thirty, and so thin! She was dressed in plain, white muslin; and there were a manifest constraint and timidity about her motions, and a depression in her countenance, whose lineaments showed that if she could be happy she might be handsome. She had a most lady-like air; and there was thought in her brow and acuteness in her eye, which, however, as it were, habitually watched the motions of the Earl and the Lady Cecilia with deference and anxiety. Poor Miss Macspleuchan felt herself gradually sinking into a sycophant; the alternative being that or starvation. She was very accomplished, particularly in music and languages, while the lady Cecilia really knew scarcely any thing—for which reason, principally, she had long ago conceived a bitter dislike to Miss Macspleuchan, and inflicted on her a number of petty but exquisite mortifications; such, perhaps, as none but a sensitive soul could appreciate, for the Earl and his daughter were exemplary persons in the proprieties of life, and would not do such things openly. She was a sort of companion to Lady Cecilia, and entirely dependent upon her and the Earl for subsistence. She was sitting on the sofa, beside Lady Cecilia, when Titmouse re-entered the drawing-room; and Lady Cecilia eyed him through her glass with infinite nonchalance, even when he had advanced to within a few feet of her. He made Miss Macspleuchan, as she rose to take her seat and prepare tea, a most obsequious bow: absurd as was the style of its performance, Miss Macspleuchan saw there was politeness in the intention; 't was, moreover, a courtesy towards herself, that was unusual from the Earl's guests; and these considerations served to take off the edge of the ridicule and contempt with which Lady Cecilia had been preparing her to receive their newly-discovered kinsman. After standing for a second or two near the sofa, Titmouse ventured to sit himself down upon it—on the very edge only—as if afraid of disturbing Lady Cecilia, who was reclining on it with an air of languid hauteur.

"So you're going, my lady, to a dance to-night, as my lord says?" quoth Titmouse, respectfully—"hope your lordship will enjoy yourself."

"We regret that you do not accompany us, Mr. Titmouse," said Lady Cecilia, slightly inclining towards him, and glancing at Miss Macspleuchan with a faint and bitter smile.

"Should have been most uncommon proud to have gone, your lordship," replied Titmouse, as a servant brought him a cup of tea.

"These cups and saucers, my lady, come from abroad, I suppose? Now, I dare say, though they've rather a funny look, they cost a good deal?"

"I really do not know, sir; we have had them a very long while."

"Pon my life, my lady, I like them amazing!" Seeing her ladyship not disposed to talk, Titmouse became silent.

"Are you fond of music, Mr. Titmouse?" inquired the Earl, presently observing the pause in the conversation to become embarrassing to Titmouse.

"Very, indeed, my lord; is your lordship?"

"I am rather fond of vocal music, sir—of the opera."

This the Earl said, because Miss Macspleuchan played upon the piano very brilliantly, and did not sing. Miss Macspleuchan understood him.

"Do you play upon any instrument, Mr. Titmouse?" inquired Lady Cecilia, with a smile lurking about her lips, which increased a little when Titmouse replied in the negative, that he had once begun to learn the clarinet some years ago, but could not manage the notes. "Excuse me, my lady, but what an uncommon fine piano that is!" said he. "If I may make so bold, will your ladyship give us a tune?"

"I dare say, Miss Macspleuchan will play for you, Mr. Titmouse, if you wish it," replied Lady Cecilia, coldly.

Some time afterwards, a servant announced to her ladyship and the Earl that the carriage was at the door; and presently they both retired to their dressing-rooms to make some slight alteration in their dress; the Earl to add a foreign order or two, and Lady Cecilia to place upon her haughty brow a small tiara of brilliants. As soon as they had thus retired—"I shall feel great pleasure, sir, in playing for you, if you wish it?" said Miss Macspleuchan, in a voice of such mingled melancholy and kindness, as must have gone to Titmouse's heart if he had possessed one. He jumped up, and bowed profoundly. She sat down to the piano, and played with exquisite taste, and great execution, such as she supposed would suit her auditor—namely, waltzes and marches, till the door opened, and Lady Cecilia re-appeared drawing on her gloves, with the glittering addition which I have mentioned—followed presently by the Earl, who had removed the red riband, and added two little foreign orders.

"Well, sir," said he, with dignified affability, "I need not repeat how highly gratified I feel at our introduction to each other. I trust you will henceforth consider yourself no stranger here."

"Oh, pon my life, my lord!" exclaimed Titmouse, in a low tone, and with a sudden and profound bow.

"And that on your return from Yorkshire," continued the Earl, drawing on his gloves, "you will let us see you: we both feel great interest in your good fortunes. Sir, I have the honor to wish you a good evening!" He extended his gloved hand to Mr. Titmouse, whose hands he touched with little more than the ends of his fingers.

"We exceedingly regret that we must leave you, Mr. Titmouse; but as we wish to leave the Duchess's early, in order to go to another ball, we must go early. Good evening, sir," and having dropped him a formal curtsy, she quitted the drawing-room followed by the Earl, Titmouse making four or five such bows as provoked a smile from all who witnessed them. The next moment he was alone with Miss Macspleuchan. Her unaffected goodnatured address made him feel more at home within the next five minutes, than he had been since entering that frigid scene of foolish state—since being in the oppressive presence of the greatness just departed. She felt at first a contempt for him bordering upon disgust, but which very soon melted into pity. What a wretched creature was this to put into such a dazzling position! He soon got pretty communicative with her, and told her about the Tag-rags, Miss Tag-rag, and Miss Quirk, both of whom were absolutely dying of love for him, and thought he was in love with them, which was not the case—far from it. Then he hinted something about a most particular uncommon lovely gal that had his heart, and he hoped to have hers, as soon as he had got all to rights at Yatton. Then he told her of the great style in which he was going down to take possession of his estates. Having finished this, he told her that he had been the morning before to see a man hanged for murdering his wife; that he had been into the condemned cell, and then into the press-room, and had seen his hands and arms tied, and shaken hands with him; and he was going on into such a sickening minuteness of detail, that to avoid it, Miss Macspleuchan, who felt both shocked and disgusted, suddenly asked him if he was fond of heraldry, and, rising from the sofa, she went into the second room, where on an elegant and antique stand lay a huge roll of parchment, on a gilded stick, splendidly mounted and most superbly illuminated—it was about three quarters of a yard in breadth, and some ten or twenty yards in length. This was the Pedigree of the Dreddlingtons. She was giving him an account of Simon de Dreinecourt, an early ancestor of the Earl's, who had come over with William the Conqueror, and performed stupendous feats of valor at the battle of Hastings, Titmouse listening in open-mouthed wonder, and almost trembling to think that he had broken a valuable dish belonging to a nobleman who had such wonderful ancestors, not at the moment adverting to the circumstance that he was himself descended from the same ancestors, and had as rich blood in him as the Earl and Lady Cecilia—when a servant entered and informed him in a whisper that "his carriage had arrived!" He considered that etiquette required him to depart immediately.

"Beg your pardon; but if ever you should come down to my estate in the country, shall be most uncommon proud to see your ladyship."

"I beg your pardon; you are mistaken, sir," interrupted Miss Macspleuchan hastily, and blushing scarlet; the fact being that Titmouse had not caught her name on its having been once or twice pronounced by Lady Cecilia, and very naturally concluded that she also must be a lady of rank. Titmouse was, however, so occupied with his efforts to make a graceful exit, that he did not catch the explanation of his mistake; and bowing almost down to the ground, reached the landing, where the tall servant, with a very easy grace, gave him his hat and cane, and preceded him down stairs. As he descended, he felt in his pockets for some loose money, and gave several shillings between the servants who stood in the hall to witness his departure; after which, one of them having opened the door and let down the steps of the glass coach, Titmouse popped in to it.

"Home, sir?" inquired the servant, as he closed the door.

"The Cabbage-Stalk Hotel, Covent Garden," replied Titmouse.

That was communicated to the coachman, and off rumbled the glass coach. As soon as Titmouse had become calm enough to reflect upon the events of the evening, he came to the conclusion that the Earl of Dreddlington was a very great man indeed; the Lady Cecilia very beautiful, but rather proud; but Miss Macspleuchan (Lady Somebody, as he supposed,) one of the most interesting ladies he had ever met with, something uncommon pleasing about her; in short he felt a sort of grateful attachment towards her, which, how long it would have lasted after he had heard that she was only a plain Miss, and a poor relative, I leave the acute reader to conjecture.

Mr. Gammon was with him about half-past nine o'clock the next morning, sufficiently anxious to hear how he had got on over night. He was received by Titmouse in a manner totally different from that in which he had ever before been received by him; and concluded, for a few minutes, that Lord Dreddlington had been pumping Titmouse, had learned from him his position with respect to him, Gammon, in particular, and had injected distrust and suspicion into the mind of Titmouse concerning him. But Gammon, with all his acuteness, was quite mistaken. The truth was, 'twas only an attempt on the part of poor Titmouse to assume the composed demeanor, the languid elegance, which he had observed in the distinguished personages with whom he had spent the preceding evening, and which had made a very deep impression on his mind. He drew out his words, looked as if he were half asleep, and continually addressed Gammon as "Sir," and "Mr. Gammon," just as the Earl of Dreddlington had constantly addressed him—Titmouse. Our friend was sitting at breakfast, on the present occasion, in a most gaudy dressing-gown, and with the newspaper before him; in short, his personal appearance and manner were totally different from what Gammon had ever seen before, and he looked now and then at Titmouse, as if for a moment doubting his identity. Whether or not he was now on the point of throwing overboard those who had piloted him from amidst the shoals of poverty into the open sea of affluence, shone upon by the vivid sunlight of rank and distinction, Gammon did not know; but he contracted his brow, and assumed a certain sternness and peremptoriness of tone and bearing, which were not long in reducing Titmouse to his proper dimensions; and when at length Mr. Gammon entered upon the delightful subject of the morrow's expedition, telling him that he, Gammon, had now nearly completed all the preparations for going down to, and taking possession of Yatton in a style of suitable splendor, according to the wish of Titmouse—this quickly melted away the thin coat of mannerism, and Titmouse was "himself again." He immediately gave Mr. Gammon a full account of what had happened at Lord Dreddlington's and, I fear, of a great deal more that might possibly have happened, but certainly had not; e. g. his lordship's special laudation of Mr. Gammon as a "monstrous fine lawyer," which Titmouse swore were the very exact words of his lordship, and that he "should have been most happy to see Mr. Gammon," and a good deal to the like effect. Also that he had been "most uncommon thick" with "Lady Cicely," (so he pronounced her name;) and that both she and Lord Dreddlington had "pressed him very hard" to go with them to a ball at a duke's! He made no mention of the broken trifle-dish; said they had nearly a dozen servants to wait on them, (only three sitting down to dinner,) and twenty different sorts of wine, and no end of courses, at dinner. That the Earl wore a star, and garter, and blue riband—which Gammon erroneously thought as apocryphal as the rest; and had told him that he—Titmouse—might one day wear them, and sit in the House of Lords; and had, moreover, advised him most strenuously to get into Parliament as soon as possible, as the "cause of the people wanted strengthening." [As Lord Coke somewhere says, in speaking of a spurious portion of the text of Lyttleton, "that arrow came never out of Lyttleton's quiver"—so Gammon instantly perceived that the last sentence came never out of Titmouse's own head, but was that of a wise and able man and statesman.]

As soon as Titmouse had finished his little romance, Gammon proceeded to the chief object of his visit—their next day's journey. He said that he very much regretted to say that Mr. Snap had expressed a very anxious wish to witness the triumph of Mr. Titmouse; and that Mr. Titmouse, unless he had some particular objection—"Oh none, 'pon honor!—poor Snap!—devilish good chap in a small way!" said Titmouse; and at once gave his consent—Gammon informed him that Mr. Snap would be obliged to return to town by the next day's coach. The reader will smile when I tell him, and if a lady, will frown when she hears, that Miss Quirk was to be of the party—a point which her anxious father had secured some time ago. Mrs. Alias had declared that she saw no objection, as Mr. Quirk would be constantly with his daughter, and Gammon had appeared most ready to bring about so desirable a result. He had also stiven hard, unknown to his partners, to increase their numbers by the Tag-rags, who might have gone down, all three of them, if they had chosen, by coach, and so have returned. Gammon conceived that this step might not have been unattended with advantage in several ways; and would, moreover, have secured him a considerable source of amusement. Titmouse, however, would not listen to the thing for one moment, and Gammon was forced to give up his little scheme. Two dashing young fellows, fashionable friends of Titmouse, (who had picked them up Heaven only knows where, but they never deserted them,) infinitely to Gammon's annoyance, were to be of the party. He had seen them but once, when he had accompanied Titmouse to the play, where they soon joined him. One was a truly disgusting-looking fellow—a Mr. Yahoo—a man about five-and-thirty years old, tall, with a profusion of black hair parted down the middle of his head, and falling down in long clustering curls from each temple upon his coat collar. His whiskers, also, were ample, and covered two-thirds of his face; and he had a jet-black tuft—an imperial—depending from his under lip. He had an execrable eye—full of insolence and sensuality. In short, his whole countenance bespoke the thorough debauchee. He had been, he said, in the army; and was nearly connected with some of the first families in the North. He was now a man of pleasure about town—which contained not a better billiard player, as the admiring Titmouse had had several opportunities of judging. He was a great patron of the ring—knew all their secrets—all their haunts. He always had plenty of money, and drove about in a most elegant cab, in which Titmouse had often had a seat; and as soon as Mr. Yahoo had extracted, from his communicative little companion, all about himself, he made it his business to conciliate his good graces by all the arts of which he was master—and he succeeded. The other chosen companion of Titmouse was Mr. Algernon Fitz-Snooks, a complete fool. He was the sole child of a rich tradesman—who christened him by the sounding name given above: and afterwards added the patrician prefix to the surname, which also you see above, in order to gratify his wife and son. The youth never “took to business”—but was allowed to saunter about, doing and knowing nothing, till about his twenty-second year, when his mother died, followed a year afterwards by his father, who bequeathed to his hopeful son some fifty thousand pounds—absolutely and uncontrolledly. He very judiciously thought that youth was the time to enjoy life; and before he had reached his thirtieth year, he had got through all his fortune except about five or six thousand pounds—in return for which, he had certainly got something; viz. an impaired constitution and a little experience, which might, possibly, be useful. He had a very pretty face—regular features, and interesting eyes; his light hair curled beautifully; and he spoke in a sort of lisp and in a low tone—and, in a point of dress, always turned out beautifully. He, also, had a cab, and was a great friend of Mr. Yahoo, who had introduced him into a great deal of high society, principally in St. James’ Street, where both he and Mr. Yahoo had passed a great deal of their time, especially during the nights. There was no intentional mischief in poor Fitz-Snooks; nature had made him only a fool—his prudent parents had done the rest: and if he fell into vice, it was only because he could not help it. Such were the chosen companions of Titmouse; the one a fool, the other a rogue—and “he must,” he said, “have them down to the jollifying at Yatton.” A groom and a valet, both newly hired the day before, would complete the party of the morrow. Gammon assured Titmouse that he had taken all the pains in the world to get up a triumphant entry into Yatton; his agents at Grilston, Messrs. Bloodsuck and Son, attorneys—the Radical electioneering attorneys of the county—who were well versed in the matter of processions, bands, flags, &c. &c. &c., had by that time arranged everything, and they were to be met, when within a mile of Yatton, by a procession. The people at the Hall, also, were under orders from Mr. Gammon, through Messrs. Bloodsuck and Son, to have all in readiness—and a banquet prepared for nearly a hundred persons—in fact, all comers were to be welcome. To all this Titmouse listened with eyes glistening, and ears tingling with rapture; but can any tongue describe his emotion, on being apprised that the sum of £2500, in the banker’s hands, was now at his disposal—that it would be doubled in a few weeks—a check for £500, drawn by Mr. Titmouse on the London agents of the Grilston bankers, had been honored on the preceding afternoon? Titmouse’s heart beat fast, and he felt as if he could have worshipped Gammon. As for the matter of carriages, Mr. Gammon said, that probably Mr. Titmouse would call that morning on Mr. Axle, in Long Acre, and select one to his mind—it must be one with two seats—and Mr. Gammon had pointed out several which were, he thought, eligible, and would be shown to Mr. Titmouse. That would be the carriage in which Mr. Titmouse himself would travel; the second, Mr. Gammon had taken the liberty of already selecting. With this, Mr. Gammon (just as the new valet brought in no less than seven boxes of segars, ordered over-night by Titmouse) shook his hand and departed, saying that he should make his appearance at the Cabbage-Stalk the next morning precisely at eleven o’clock—about which time it was arranged they were all to start. Titmouse hardly knew how to contain himself on being left alone. About an hour or two afterwards, Titmouse made his appearance at Mr. Axle’s. He carried on two businesses, one public, i. e. a coach-builder—one private, i. e. a money-lender. He was a rich man—a very obliging and “accommodating” person, by means of which he had amassed a fortune of, it was believed, a hundred thousand pounds. He never made a fuss about selling on credit, lending, taking back, exchanging, carriages of all descriptions; nor in discounting the bills of his customers to any amount. He was generally right in each case in the long run. He would supply his fashionable victim with as splendid a chariot, and funds to keep it some time going, as he or she could desire; well knowing, that in due time, after they had taken a few turns in it about the park, and a few streets and squares in the neighborhood, it would quietly drive up to one or two huge dingy fabrics in a different part of the town, where it would deposit its burden, and then return to its maker little the worse for wear, who took it back at about a twentieth part of its cost, and soon again disposed of it in a similar way. Mr. Axle showed Mr. Titmouse very obsequiously over his premises, pointing out (as soon as he knew who he was) the carriages which Mr. Gammon had the day before desired should be shown to him, and which Mr. Titmouse, with his glass stuck in his eye—where it was kept by the pure force of muscular contraction—examined with something like the air of a connoisseur—rapping with his agate-headed cane every now and then—now against his teeth, then against his legs. He did not seem perfectly satisfied with any of them; they looked “devilish plain and dull.”

of laughter, he commenced a most tempting eulogium upon the splendid structure—remarking on the singularity of the circumstance of its happening just at that exact moment to be placed at this disposal by its former owner—a gentleman of great distinction, who had no longer any occasion for it. Mr. Axle had had numerous applications for it already; on hearing which, Titmouse got excited. The door was opened; he got in; sat on each seat. “Do n’t it hang beautifully?” inquired the confident proprietor, swaying about the head of the carriage as he spoke.

“Let us see, who was after it yesterday? Oh, I think it was Sir Goosey Gander; but I’ve not closed with him.”

After some little higgly-haggling, Mr. Titmouse bought it!!!—for there was nothing like closing at once where there was keen competition. Mr. Gammon could not have seen it, when he was making his choice the day before. For the rest of the day he felt infinitely elated at his fortunate purchase, and excited his imagination by pictures of the astonishment and admiration which his equipage must call forth on the morrow. Punctual to his appointment, Mr. Gammon, a few moments before the clock struck eleven on the ensuing morning, drew up to the Cabbage-Stalk, as near at least as he could get to it, in a hackney coach, with his portmanteau and carpet-bag. I say, as near as he could; for round about the door stood a little crowd, gazing with a sort of awe on a magnificent vehicle standing there, with four horses harnessed to it. Gammon looked at his watch as he entered the hotel, and asked which of the sheriffs’ carriages was standing at the door. The waiter to whom he spoke seemed nearly splitting with laughter, which almost disabled him from answering that it was Mr. Titmouse’s carriage, ready for setting off for Yorkshire. Mr. Gammon opened his eyes involuntarily, turned pale, and seemed nearly dropping down.

“Yes, sir—been here this hour at least packing; such a crowd all the while; every body think it’s the sheriff’s sir,” replied the waiter, scarce able to keep his countenance. Mr. Gammon rushed up stairs with greater impetuosity than he had perhaps ever been known to exhibit before, and burst into Mr. Titmouse’s room. There was that gentleman, with his hat on, his hands stuck into his coat-pockets, a cigar in his mouth, and a tumbler of brandy and water before him. Mr. Yahoo, and Mr. Fitz-Snooks, and Mr. Snap were similarly occupied; and Mr. Quirk was sitting down with his hands in pockets, and a glass of negus before him, with any thing but a joyful expression of countenance.

“Ah, how d’ye do, Gammon? punctual!” interrupted Titmouse, extending his hand.

“Forgive me; but can it be that the monstrous thing now before the door, with a crowd grinning around it, is your carriage?” inquired Gammon, with dismay in his face.

“My dear sir,” replied Gammon, in a kind of agony, “is it impossible! It never can be! Do you mean to say that you bought it at Mr. Axle’s?”

“He’s been grossly imposing on you, sir! Permit me to go at once and get you a proper vehicle.”

“‘Pon my life, Mr. Gammon, I think that it’s a monstrous nice thing—a great bargain—and I’ve bought it and paid for it, that’s more.”

“Gentlemen, I appeal to you, confidently,” said Gammon, turning in an agony to Mr. Yahoo and Mr. Fitz-Snooks.

“As for me, sir,” replied the former, coolly, at the same time knocking off the ashes from his cigar;—“since you ask my opinion, I confess I rather like the idea—ha! ha! ‘Twill produce a sensation; that’s something in this dull life! Eh, Snooks?”

“Ay—a—I confess I was a little shocked at first, but I think I’m getting over it now,” lisped Mr. Fitz-Snooks, adjusting his shirt-collar, and then sipping a little of his brandy and water. “I look upon it now as an excellent joke; egad, it beat Chitterfield kollow, though he, too, has done a trick or two lately.”

“Did you purchase it as a joke, Mr. Titmouse?” inquired Gammon, with forced calmness, ready to expire with vexation and anger.

“Why—a—‘pon my life—if you ask me—wonder you do n’t see it! Of course I did! Those that do n’t like it, may ride, you know, in the other.”

“Exactly—that’s the novelty I like,” said Mr. Yahoo, looking at Mr. Gammon with a smile of ineffable insolence.

Mr. Gammon made him no reply, but fixed an eye upon him, under which he became plainly rather uneasy. He felt outdone. Talk of scorn!—the eye of Gammon, settled at that instant upon Mr. Yahoo, was its complete and perfect representative; and from that moment he, Mr. Yahoo, felt something like fear of the eye of man, or of submission to it. When, moreover, he beheld the manner in which Titmouse obeyed Gammon’s somewhat haughty summons out of the room, he resolved to make a friend of Gammon. Titmouse proved, however, inexorable for once; he had bought and paid for the carriage; it suited his taste; and where was the harm of gratifying it? Besides, it was already packed; all was prepared for starting. Gammon gave it up; and, swallowing down his rage as well and as quickly as he could, endeavored to reconcile himself to this infernal and most unexpected predicament.

It seems that Miss Quirk, however, really anxious to go down to Yatton—to do any thing, in short, calculated to commit Mr. Titmouse to her—was quite staggered on discovering, and shocked at seeing, the kind of persons who were to be their travelling companions. As for Mr. Yahoo, she recoiled from him with horror as soon as she had seen him. What decent female, indeed, would not have done so? She had retired to a bed-chamber soon after entering the Cabbage-Stalk, and, seeing her two unexpected fellow-travellers, presently sent a chambermaid to request Mr. Quirk to come to her.

He found her considerably agitated. She wished earnestly to return to Alibi House; and consented to proceed on her journey only on the express promise of Mr. Titmouse, that no one should be in the carriage in which she went except Mr. Quirk and Mr. Gammon—unless, indeed, Mr. Titmouse thought proper to make the fourth.

Mr. Quirk, on this, sent for Mr. Gammon, who, with a somewhat bad grace, (“Confound it,” thought he, “every thing seems going wrong,”) undertook to secure Mr. Titmouse’s consent to that arrangement.

While he was thus closeted for about five or ten minutes with Mr. Quirk, one of the waiters informed Mr. Titmouse that a lad had brought a parcel for him, which he, the aforesaid lad, was himself to deliver into the hands of Mr. Titmouse. Accordingly there was presently shown into the room a little lad, in tarnished livery, in whom Titmouse recollected the boy belonging to Mr. Tag-rag’s one-horse chaise, and who gave a small parcel into Mr. Titmouse’s hands, “with Mr. and Miss Tag-rag’s respects.”

As soon as he had quitted the room. “By Jove! What have we here?” exclaimed Titmouse, just a little flustered as he cut open the string. Inside was another parcel, wrapped up in white paper, and tied in a pretty bow, with red satin ribands. This again, and another within it having been opened,—behold there were three nice cambric pocket-handkerchiefs, which, on being examined, proved to be each of them marked “T. T.” in hair; and Mr. Yahoo happening to unfold one of them, lo! in the centre, was—also done in hair—the figure of a heart transfixed with an arrow!!! Mr. Yahoo roared, and Mr. Fitz-Snooks lisped, “is she pretty, Tit? Where’s her nest, any old birds?—eh?”

Titmouse colored a little, then grinned, and put his finger to the side of his nose, and winked his eye, as if favoring the bright idea of Mr. Fitz-Snooks. On a sheet of gilt-edged paper, and sealed with a seal bearing the tender words, “Forget me not,” was written the following:

“SIR: Trusting you will excuse the liberty, I send you three best cambric pocket-handkerchiefs, which my daughter has marked with her own hair, and I beg your acceptance thereof, hoping you may be resigned to all that may befall you, which is the prayer of, dear sir, yours respectfully, MARTHA TAG-RAG.”

“P. S.—My daughter sends what you may please to wish and accept. Shall we have the great happiness to see you here again?”

“SATIN LODGE, 18th May, 18—”

“Where’s Satin Lodge?” inquired Mr. Fitz-Snooks.

“It’s a country-house on the—the Richmond road,” said Titmouse with a little hesitation; and just then the return of Gammon, who had resumed his usual calmness of manner, relieved him from his embarrassment. Mr. Gammon succeeded in effecting the arrangement suggested by Mr. Quirk and his daughter; and within about a quarter of an hour afterwards, behold the ex-sheriff’s resplendent but cast-off carriage filled by Miss Quirk and Titmouse, and Mr. Quirk and Gammon—the groom and valet sitting on the coach-box; while in the other, a plain, yellow carriage covered with luggage, sat Mr. Yahoo, Mr. Fitz-Snooks, and Mr. Snap, all of them with lighted cigars—Snap never having been so happy as at that moment.

THE INSIDE OF AN OMNIBUS.

BY LEIGH HUNT.

ENOUGH has been said, in this quick and graphic age, respecting coachmen and cabmen, and conductors, and horses, and all the exterior phenomena of things vehicular; but we are not aware that an ‘article’ has yet been devoted to the subject before us.

Come then, our old friend Truth; do what thou canst for us. If thou dost not, we know, that with all our trying, we can do nothing for ourselves; nor will men have any thing to do with our representations, though we paint for them the prettiest girl in the world,—unlike!

By the invention of the Omnibus, all the world keeps its coach!—And with what cheapness! And to how much social advantage! No ‘plague with servants,’ no expense for liveries;—no coach-makers’ and horse-doctors’ bills;—no keeping one’s fellow-creatures waiting for us in the cold night-time and rain, while the dance is going down the room, or another hour is spent in bidding good bye, and lingering over the comfortable fire. We have no occasion to think of it, till we want it; and then it either comes to one’s door, or you go forth, and in a few minutes see it hulling up the street,—the man-of-war among coaches,—the whale’s back in the metropolitan flood,—while the driver is beheld sitting, super-eminent, like the guide of the elephant on his neck.

We cannot say much for the beauty of its appearance; but there is a certain might of utility in its very bulk, which supercedes the necessity of beauty, as in the case of the whale itself, or in the idea we entertain of Doctor Johnson, who shouldered porters as he went, and ‘laughed like a rhinoceros.’ Virgil metamorphosed sea-nymphs into ships. The Doctor, by a process certainly not more violent, might be supposed transformed into a vehicle for his favorite London streets; and, if so, he would undoubtedly have anticipated the date of the present invention, and become an Omnibus. His mouth seems to utter the word.

BOSWELL (in Elysium.) “Sir, if you were living now, and were to be turned into a coach, what sort of a coach would you become?”

JOHNSON (rolling about and laughing with bland contempt.) “Sir, in parliamentary language, you are ‘frivolous and vexatious;’ but the frivolity surmounts the vexatiousness.”

BOSWELL (tenderly.) “Nay, Sir, but to oblige an humble, and, I hope, not altogether undeserving friend.”

JOHNSON. “Sir, where reply is obvious, interrogation is disgusting. Nay, Sir, (seeing the tears in Boswell’s eyes.) I would not be harsh or uncompelling; but do you not see the case at once? I should formerly have chosen to be a bishop’s carriage, perhaps, or a chancellor’s, or any respectable lord’s.”

BOSWELL (smiling.) “Except a lord mayor’s.”

JOHNSON (angrily.) "And why, Sir, should I not have been a lord mayor's? What have I done, that it should be doubted whether I would countenance the dignity of integrity and the universality of commerce?"

BOSWELL (in confusion.) "Sir, I beg pardon; but to confess the truth, I was thinking of Mr. Wilkes."

JOHNSON. "And why, Sir, think of Mr. Wilkes, when the smaller idea should be merged in the greater? when the great office itself is concerned, and not the pettiness of an exception? Besides, Sir, Wilkes, though a rascal and a Whig, was a gentleman in manners, as well as birth (looking sternly at Boswell). He would not have made such a remark. To be sure (relenting a little, and looking arch) he got drunk sometimes."

BOSWELL (interrupting.) "Dear Sir!"

JOHNSON. "Neither was he scrupulous in his admiration of beauty."

BOSWELL. "Dearest Sir!"

JOHNSON. "Though whatsoever the frenzy of his inebriation, or the vagrancy of his nocturnal revels, he would hardly have mistaken the plethora of an oyster-woman for a prohibited attraction. Well, well, Sir, let us be mutually considerate. Let us be decent. To cut this matter short, Sir, I should be an Omnibus."

BOSWELL (with grateful earnestness.) "May I presume, dear Sir, to inquire the reason?"

JOHNSON. "Sir, I should not be a cart. That would be low. Neither should I aspire to be the triumphal chariot of an Alexander, nor the funeral car of a Napoleon. Post-humous knowledge has corrected those sympathies with ambition. A gig is pert; a curlicue coxcombical; and the steam-carriage is too violent, perturbed, and migratory. Sir, the Omnibus for me. It suits with my past state and my present; with the predilections I have retained, and the humanities I have acquired. Sir, it even makes me beg pardon for what I have said of Wilkes. Mors omnibus communis. Like death, it is common to all, and gathers them into its friendly bosom. It is decent, deliberate, and unpretending; no respecter of persons; a king has been known to ride in it; and opposite him may have sat a republican weaver."

BOSWELL. "But you would choose, Sir, to be a London Omnibus, rather than a Parisian one, or even a Litchfield?"

JOHNSON (with bland indulgence.) "Surely, Sir; and to go up the Strand and Fleet-street, and occasionally to stop at the Mitre. And, Sir, I would not be driven by every body, though I can now tolerate every body. I would have a human and respectable driver; an elderly man, Sir; and my windows should be taken care of, that the people might not catch cold."

Here Boswell, begging a thousand pardons, with shrugged shoulders, lifted eyebrows, and hands spread out in deprecation of offence, bursts, nevertheless, into an uncontrollable fit of laughter, at the idea of the solemn and illustrious Johnson converted into an Omnibus. And the Doctor, though a little angry at first, recollects his Elysian experiences, and at length contributes to a roar worthy of the indistinguishable laughter of the gods in Homer.

JOHNSON (subdividing into a human measure of joviality.) "Sir, it was ludicrous enough, if you consider it as a man; but if you consider it as a child or a divine person (to speak in the language of our new friend Plato,) the subject will be invested with the mild gravity of an impartial universality. I see, however, that it will take many more draughts of Lethe, before you, Boswell, can get the fumes of the old tavern wine out of your head; so let us consult your capabilities, and return to human measures of discourse;—let us have reason once more, Sir;—Sir (for I see you wish me to say it,) let us be good, mortal, jolly dogs, and have 't other bottle."

Vanish the ever pleasant shades of Johnson and Boswell, and enter the Omnibus in its own proper person. If a morning Omnibus, it is full of clerks and merchants; if a noon, of chance fares; if a night, of returning citizens, and fathers of families; if a midnight, of play-goers, and gentlemen lax with stiff glasses of brandy and water.

Being one of the chance fares, we enter an Omnibus which has yet no other inside passenger; and having no book with us, we make intense acquaintance with two objects: the one being the heel of an outside passenger's boot, who is sitting on the coach-top; and the other, that universally studied bit of literature, which is inscribed at the further end of every such vehicle, and which purports, that it is under the royal and charming jurisdiction of the young lady now reigning over us, by whom it is permitted to carry "twelve inside passengers, AND NO MORE;"—thus showing extreme consideration on her Majesty's part, and that she will not have the sides of her loving subjects squeezed together like figs.

Enter a precise personage, probably a Methodist, certainly, "well off," who seats himself right in the midway of his side of the Omnibus; that is to say, at equal distances between the two extremities; because it is the spot in which you least feel the inconvenience of the motion. He is a man who seldom makes a remark, or takes notice of what is going forward, unless a payment is to be resisted, or the entrance of a passenger beyond the lawful number. Now and then he hems, and adjusts a glove; or wipes a little dust off one of the cuffs of his coat.

In leaps a youngster, and seats himself close at the door, in order to be ready to leap out again.

Item, a maid-servant, flustered with the fear of being too late, and reddening furthermore betwixt awkwardness, and the resentment of it, at not being quite sure where to seat herself. A jerk of the Omnibus pitches her against the precision, and makes both her and the youngster laugh.

Enter a young lady, in colors and big ear-rings, and excessively flounced and ringletted, and seats herself opposite the maid-servant, who beholds her with admiration, but secretly thinks herself handsomer, and what a pity it is she was not a lady herself, to become the ringlets and flounces better.

Enter two other young ladies, in white, who pass to the other end in order to be out of the way of the knees and boots of those who go out. They whisper and giggle much, and are quizzing the young lady in the reds and ringlets; who, for her part (though she knows it, and could squeeze all their bonnets together,) looks as firm and unconcerned as a statue.

Enter a dandy, too handsome to be quizzed; and then a man with a bundle, who is agreeably surprised with the gentlemanly toleration of the dandy, and, luckily, unaware of the secret disgust of the Methodist.

Item, an old gentleman; then, a very fat man; then two fat elderly women, one of whom is very angry at the incommensurate presence of her likeness, while the other, full of good humor, is comforted by it. The younger has in the mean time gone to sit on the coach-top, in order to make room; and we set off to the place of our destination.

What an intense intimacy we get with the face, neck-cloth, waistcoat, and watch-chain of the man who sits opposite us! Who is he? What is his name? Is his care a great care,—an affliction? Is his look of cheerfulness real? At length he looks at ourselves, asking himself, no doubt, similar questions; and, as it is less pleasant to be scrutinized than to scrutinize, we now set him the example of turning the eyes another way. How unpleasant it must be to the very fat man to be so gazed at; Think, if he sat as close to us in a private room, in a chair! How he would get up, and walk away! But here, sit he must, and have his portrait taken by our memories. We sigh for his plethora, with a breath almost as piteous as his wheezing. And he has a sensible face withal, and has, perhaps, acquired a painful amount of intellectual as well as physical knowledge, from the melancholy that has succeeded to his joviality. Fat men always appear to be "good fellows," unless there is some manifest proof to the contrary; so we wish, for his sake, that every body in this world could do just as he pleased, and die of a very dropsey of delight.

Exeunt our fat friend, and the more ill-humored of the two fat women; and enter, in their places, two young mothers,—one with a good-humored child, a female; the other with a great, handsome, red-cheeked wilful boy, all flounce and hat and feathers and red legs, who is eating a bun and seems resolved that the other child, who does nothing but look at it, shall not partake a morsel. His mother, who "snubs" him one instant, and lets him have his way the next, has evidently been a spoiled child herself, and is doing her best to learn to repent the sorrow she caused her own mother, by the time she is a dozen years older. The elderly gentlemen compliments the boy on his likeness to his mamma, who laughs and says he is "very polite." As to the young gentleman, he fancies he is asked for a piece of his bun, and falls a kicking; and the young lady in the ringlets tosses her head.

Exit the Methodist, and enter an affable man; who, having protested it is very cold, and lamented a stoppage, and vented the original remark that you gain nothing by an Omnibus in point of time, subsides into an elegant silence; but he is fastened upon by the man with the bundle, who, encouraged by his apparent good-nature, tells him, in an under tone, some anecdotes relative to his own experience of Omnibuses; which the affable gentleman endures with a variety of assenting exclamations, intended quite as much to stop as to encourage, not one of which succeeds; such as "Ah!"—"Oh!"—"Indeed!"—"Precisely!"—"I dare say!"—"I see!"—"Really!"—"Very likely!"—jerk the top of his stick occasionally against his mouth as he speaks, and nobody pitying him.

Meantime the good-humored fat woman, having expressed a wish to have a window closed which the ill-humored one had taken upon her to open, and the two young ladies in the corner giving their assent, but none of the three being able to pull it up, the elderly gentleman, in an ardor of gallantry, anxious to show his pleasing combination of strength and tenderness, exclaims, "Permit me;" and jumping up, cannot do it at all. The window cruelly sticks fast, and, only brings up all the blood into his face with the mingled shame and incompetence of the endeavor. He is a conscientious kind of incapable, however, is the elderly gentleman; so he calls in the conductor, who does it in an instant. "He knows the trick," says the elderly gentleman. "It's only a little bit new," says the conductor; who hates to be called in.

Exeunt elderly and the maid servant, and enter an unreflecting young gentleman, who has bought an orange, and must needs eat it immediately. He accordingly begins by peeling it, and is first made aware of the delicacy of his position by the giggling of the two young ladies, and his doubt where he shall throw the peels. He is "in for it," however, and must proceed; so being unable to divide the orange into its segments, he ventures upon a great liquid bite, which resounds through the Omnibus, and covers the whole of the lower part of his face with pip and drip. The young lady with the ringlets is right before him. The two other young ladies stuff their handkerchiefs into their mouths, and he, into his own mouth, the whole of the rest of the fruit, "elohy" and too big, with desperation in his heart, and 'he tears in his eyes. Never will he eat an orange again in an Omnibus. He doubts whether he shall even venture upon one at all in the presence of his friends, the Miss Wilkinsons.

Enter, at various times, an irascible gentleman, who is constantly threatening to go out; a long-legged dragoon, at whose advent the young ladies are smit with sudden gravity and apparent objection; a young sailor, with a face innocent of every thing but a pride in his slops, who says his mother does not like his going to sea; a gentleman with a book, which we long to ask him to let us look at; a man with a dog, which embitters the feet and ankles of a sharp-visaged old lady, and completes her horror by getting on the empty seat next her, and looking out of the window; divers bankers' clerks and tradesmen, who think of nothing but the bills in their pockets; two estranged friends, ignoring each other; a pompous fellow, who suddenly looks modest and bewitched, having detected a baronet in the corner; a botanist with his tin herbarium; a young married couple, assuming a right to be fond in public; another from the country, who exalt all the rest of the passengers in self-opinion by betraying the amazing fact, that they have never before seen Piccadilly; a footman, intensely clean in his habiliments, and very respectful, for his hat subdues him, as well as the strange feeling of sitting inside; four boys going to school, very pudding-faced, and not knowing how to behave (one pulls a string and top half-way out of his pocket, and all reply to questions in monosyllables); a person with a constant smile on his face, having just cheated another in a bargain; close to him a very melancholy person, going to see a daughter on her death-bed, and not hearing a single one of the cheater's happy remarks; a French lady, looking at once amiable and worldly—hard, as it were, in the midst of her softness, or soft in the midst of her hardness—which you will—probably an actress, or a teacher; two immense-whiskered Italians, uttering their delicious language with a precision which shows that they are singers; a man in a smock-frock, who, by his sitting on the edge of the seat, and perpetually watching his time to go out, seems to make a constant apology for his presence; ditto, a man with some huge mysterious accompaniment of mechanism, or implement of trade, too big to be lawfully carried inside; a pedant or a fop, ostentatious of some ancient or foreign language, or talking of a lord; all sorts of people talking of weather, and the harvest, and the Queen, and the last bit of news; in short, every description of age, rank, temper, occupation, appearance, life, character, and behavior, from the thorough gentleman who quietly gives himself a lift out of the rain, secure in his easy, unaffected manner, and his accommodating good-breeding, down to the blackguard who attempts to thrust his opinion down the throat of his neighbor, or keeps his leg thrust out the door-way, or lets his umbrella drip against a sick child.

Temper is exhibited most at night, because people by that time have dined and drunk, and finished their labors, and because the act of going home serves to bring out the domestic habit. You do not then, indeed, so often see the happy fatigue, delighted with the sudden opportunity of rest; nor the anxious look, as if it feared its journey's end; nor the bustling one, eager to get there. The seats are most commonly reckoned upon, and more allowance is made for delays; though some passengers make a point of always being in a state of indignation and ill-treatment, and express an impatience to get home, as if their house were a paradise (which is assuredly what it is not, to those who expect them there.) But at night, tongues are loosened, wills and pleasures more freely expressed, and faces rendered less bashful by the comparative darkness. It is then the jovial "old boy" lets out the secret of his having dined somewhere, perhaps at some Company's feast in Goldsmith's or Stationer's Hall; and it is with difficulty he hinders himself from singing. Then the arbitrary or the purse-proud are wrathful if they are not driven up to the identical inch of curb-stone, fronting their door. Then the incontinent nature, heedless of any thing but its own satisfaction, snores in its corner; and politicians are loud; and gay fellows gallant, especially if they are old and ugly; and lovers, who seem unconscious of one another's presence, are intensely the reverse.

Then also the pick-pocket is luckiest at his circumventions, and the lady, about to pay her fare, suddenly misses her reticule. Chiefly now also, sixpences, nay, pence, are missed in the straw, and lights are brought to look for it, and the conductor is in an agonizing perplexity whether to pronounce the loser an impudent cheat, or to love him for an innocent or a ninny. Finally, now is the time when selfishness and generosity are most exhibited. It rains, and the coach is full; a lady applies for admittance; a gentleman offers to go outside; and, according to the nature of the various passengers, is despised or respected accordingly. It rains horribly; a "young woman" applies for admittance; the coach is overstocked already; a crapulous fellow who has been allowed to come in by special favor, protests against the exercise of the like charity to a female (we have seen it), and is secretly detested by the least generous; a similar gentleman to the above, offers to take the applicant on his knee, if she has no objection; and she enters accordingly, and sits. Is she pretty? Is she ugly? Above all, is she good-humored?

A question of some concern, even to the least interested of knee-givers. On the other hand, is the gentleman young or old, pleasant or disagreeable; a real gentleman, or only a formal "old frump," who has hardly a right to be civil? At length the parties get a look at one another, the gentleman first, the young woman suddenly from under her bonnet. Ought she to have looked at all? And what is the particular retrospective expression which she instinctively chooses out of many, when she has looked? It is a nice question, varying according to circumstances. "Making room" for a fair interloper is no such dilemma as that; though we may be allowed to think, that the pleasure is greatly enhanced by the pleasantness of the countenance. It is astonishing how much grace is put, even into the tip of an elbow, by the turn of an eye.

There is a reflection which all Omnibus passengers are agreed upon, and which every one of them perhaps has made, without exception, in the course of their intellectual reciprocities; which is, that Omnibuses are "very convenient;"—"an astonishing accommodation to the public;"—"not quick,—save little time (as aforesaid),—and the conductors are very tiresome; but a most useful invention, and wonderfully cheap. There are also certain things which almost all Omnibus passengers do; such as help ladies to and fro; gradually get nearer to the door whenever a vacant seat occurs, so as to force the new comer further up than he likes; and every body stumbles, forward or sideways, when they first come in, and the coach sets off before they are seated. Among the pleasures, are seeing the highly satisfied faces of persons suddenly relieved from a long walk; being able to read a book; and, occasionally, observing one of a congenial sort in the hands of a fellow passenger. Among the evils, are dirty boots and wetting umbrellas; broken panes of glass in bad weather, afflicting the napes of the necks of invalids; and fellows who endeavor to convenience themselves at every body's expense, by taking up as much room as possible, and who pretend to alter their oblique position when remonstrated with, without really doing it. Item, cramps in the leg, when thrusting it excessively backward underneath the seat, in making way for a new comer,—the patient thrusting it forth again with an agonized vivacity, that sets the man opposite him laughing. Item, cruel treadings upon corns, the whole being of the old lady or gentleman seeming to be mashed into the burning foot, and the sufferer looking in an ecstasy of tormented doubt whether to be decently quiet or murderously vociferous,—the inflicter, meanwhile, thinking it sufficient to say "Very sorry" in an indifferent tone of voice, and taking his seat with an air of luxurious complacency. Among the pleasures also, particularly in going home at night, must not be forgotten the having the Omnibus finally to yourself, re-adjusting yourself in a corner betwixt alumbering and waking, and throwing up your feet on the seat opposite; though as the will becomes piqued in proportion to its luxuries, you always regret that the seats are not wider, and that you cannot treat your hat, on cold nights, as freely as if it were a night-cap.

The last lingers on these occasions (with the exception of play-goers,) are apt to be staid suburb-citizens,—alters with hands crossed upon their walking-sticks,—men of parcels and eatables, breakers of last baskets of oranges, chuckling over their bargains. There's one in the corner, sleeping,—the last of the dwellers in Paddington. To deposit him at his door is the sole remaining task of the conductor. He wakes up: hands forth a bag of apples,—a tongue,—a bonnet, and four pairs ladies' shoes. A most considerate spouse and "Papa" is he, and almost worthy and flourishing hoiser. Venerable in his lax throat in his bit of white neckcloth (he has never taken to black); but jovially also he shakes his wrinkles, if you talk of the stationer's widow, or the last city feast.

"Don't drop them ladies' shoes, Tom," says he, chuckling; "they'll be worn out before their time."

"Wery expensive, I believe, Sir, them 'ere kind o'shoes," says Tom.

"Very;—oh, sadly. And no better than paper. But men well to do in the world, can't live as cheap as poor ones."

Tom thinks this a very odd proposition; but it does not disconcert him. Nothing disconcerts a conductor, except a passenger without a sixpence.

"True, Sir," says Tom; "it's a hard case to be forced to spend one's money; but then you know—I beg pardon" (with a tone of modest deference and secret contempt), "it's much harder, as they say, where there's none to spend."

"Hah! Ha, ha! Why, yes, eh?" returns the old gentleman, again chuckling; "so there's your sixpence, Tom, and good night."

"Good night, Sir." And up jumps Tom on the coach-box, where he amuses the driver with an account of the dirt which the hoiser has got from the coach-wheel without his knowing it; and off they go to a far less good supper, but, it must be added, a much better sleep, than the rich old citizen.

FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.—Velvet is at this moment the favorite material in the fashionable world, whether for bonnets, paletots or dresses; of the latter, many are made with bias, or have lace flounces and mantilles on the bodies; watered silks and satins, veloutés, are also trimmed with black lace; redingotes have two rows of buttons down the front; the velvet bodies are again worn this season, in black, green, or violet, with short sleeves trimmed with lace, and with muslin skirts embroidered, or with three flounces of lace; as also with crape skirts, having three folds of velvet of the color of the corsage. There is no particular change in the make of dresses; the small short sleeves are much ornamented, and lace is much used; it is considered the long, tight sleeve is already losing favor; the newest form now making in Paris is tight from the wrist to the elbow, and then gradually enlarges to the shoulder. For evening dress, white, blue Joinville, and rose de Corinthe are in favor. Scarfs of tartane, embroidered and trimmed with lace, are much in demand, and for young ladies scarfs are made of plain tartane, lined with gauze, and trimmed with a fringe of pink and white. Long gloves are finished on the top with wreaths of gold feuillage, cords of silver or gold, flowers, feather fringe, lace coques of ribbons, &c. &c.

The hair continues to be dressed low; bandeaux are very generally worn, plaits being rather out of favor; ringlets are fashionable; flowers are much used in coiffures, the newest are the diamantes, having dew drops sparkling like diamonds, some covered with snow, frost, &c., &c.; and the coiffure seraphique composed of a rouleau of marabouts placed at the back of the head, enlarging and terminating on each side near the cheeks, with deep fringes plaited at the ends, and floating on the shoulders. Turbans, resille hats, petits bords, all are now in demand. Bonnets of black velvet have been lined with pink velours epinglé of citron, white, and green, &c., &c., is much used; one novelty is the introduction of buttons to ornament bonnets, three small buttons confine the navels at the side; other trimmings are roses pompons, curled feathers, cactus, and wreaths of moss, united by ribbon; another novelty is the bonnet of pluche bouchée ornamented with coques of the same on one side, and a berthe of much smaller coques encircling the face. Many bonnets are now made of one piece of silk, without the usual join of the front and crown, which is advantageous for the trimmings.

In the famous wardrobe of the cathedral of Notre Dame, I remember, when Napoleon was a prisoner at St. Helena, seeing the robes in which he had been crowned. With the most extraordinary want of what may be called historical taste, the restored Bourbon family had ordered that the innumerable bees with which it had pleased Bonaparte to have his robes embroidered, should be picked out! In a similar spirit, the same or some other emblem of the empire was carefully removed from a magnificent carpet of the Gobelins manufacture, used to cover the floor of the principal rooms of the Tuileries. In their place had been substituted, of course, a set of fleur-de-lis, the ancient device of the Bourbon line. These held their places till the fierce lustré of the glorieuses Journées burnt up the lilies of Charles X. in France, that is to say, in Paris, which is France, just as Constantinople is Turkey, whatever the geography books may say to the contrary. As soon as the bustle of the "Revolution of July" was well over, and the elder branch of the Bourbons expatriated, the fleur-de-lis, the ancient symbol of so much royal renown, was held in such abhorrence that the poor carpet was once more packed off to the Gobelins, where I saw a party of workmen actually employed in taking out the lilies and substituting stars in their place.—[Patchwork, by Basil Hall.

CHOICE OF EVILS.—To show the dangerous consequences of ebriety, the Catholic legends tell us of a hermit to whom the devil gave his choice of three crimes—two of them of the most atrocious kind, and the other to be drunk. The poor hermit chose the last as the least of the three, but, when intoxicated, committed the other two.

A RESEMBLANCE.—"Colonel W. is a fine looking man, ain't he?" said a friend of ours the day. "Yes," replied another, "I was taken for him once." "You! why you're as ugly as sin!" "I don't care for that; I was taken for him—I endorsed his note, and was taken for him—by the Sheriff."

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1841

A BOMB-SHELL FOR THE CAPITOL.

The Whig party for the last ten years have been particularly disgusted with the appointment of members of Congress to office. Nothing, perhaps, has so shocked their rampant patriotism as this invasion of popular sovereignty, by converting Congress into a conclave of place-hunters, occupied all the while with President making, or yielding implicit obedience to Executive dictation. This was all very well while the Whigs were seeking power. They have got it, and what do we now find?

It is stated, on pretty good authority, that nineteen-twentieths of the present members of Congress are candidates for public employment! They are all on the spot, and occupy a most favorable position for mutual certifying. Mr. A. wants a post office, Mr. B. an attorneyship, and Mr. C. a lucrative place in the customs; and they club their influence with the various departments to secure the positions of profit or honor for which they are the cringing applicants. We fear that a scene of bargaining and corruption is about to be acted at Washington, such as will find no parallel in the annals of JACKSON'S administration; and the VAN BUREN journals are lying quiet to avail themselves of the first great blunder to which the urgency of Congressional beggars exposes the incoming administration.

We have no objection to give members of Congress their share of the loaves and fishes, if they are hungry and must be fed. Four cabinet appointments ought to go a good ways toward satisfying their ravenous appetite, but they promise only to whet and stimulate it. We understand that of four members of Congress from this city two are candidates for office, and a third would not object to a foreign mission. We hope that one of them at least may be gratified. Of the two leading Conservatives from this State, it is understood that Mr. JOHN C. CLARK wants the consulship to Liverpool. This looks well for Conservative patriotism; it is almost equal to that of the Whigs.

We do not learn that any member of Congress from New England is a candidate for a post office; but we believe that Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. REED are both "talked of" as the phrase is, for the collectorship of Boston. For the honor of Massachusetts we hope that neither of them will receive it.

The best of the joke is, however, to witness the acquiescence of the Whig newspapers in this state of things. They have not a word to say against it. The Courier is as mum as an oyster. The Express thinks of blanks, paper and twine, and positively takes the field in favor of appointing members of Congress! The Commercial acquiesces at a foreign post of honor, with a pension, and thinks members of Congress very clever fellows, and very influential with the departments. Even the guns of the American are spiked, and the Star is under a cloud. The same acquiescence extends to the Whig press of every section. Almost every Whig member is an applicant for office, and each member manages to muzzle the press of his own district.

Why does not the Intelligencer or the Madisonian tell the truth on this subject? Are they delicate in regard to the public printing? Is there to be this marked difference, at the outset, between WHIGS in place and WHIGS out of place?

The WHIGS have held Gen. JACKSON to a strict account for his doctrines on this subject, avowed in his letter to the Legislature of Tennessee, on the occasion of his being nominated to the Presidency. They have pretended to approve those doctrines; and surely they deserve to be written in letters of gold on the front of the Capitol. "I would impose a provision," said General Jackson, "RENDERING 'ANY MEMBER OF CONGRESS INELIGIBLE TO OFFICE UNDER THE GENERAL GOVERNMENT DURING THE TERM FOR WHICH HE WAS ELECTED AND FOR TWO YEARS THEREAFTER, except in cases of judicial office; and these I would except, for the reason that vacancies in this department are not of frequent occurrence, and because no barrier should be interposed, in selecting to the Bench, men of the first talent and integrity."

This was General JACKSON'S rule. His reasons for it we may give hereafter; for the subject is one of too much interest to be lightly dropped. To this we hold the Whigs. During his recent visit to this city, Mr. CLAY congratulated his friends most emphatically on the prospects that an administration was coming into power that would carry out the doctrines which its members had professed during the candidacy; and fulfil the pledges which it had made to the people.

We hope it is so. We believe it is so. But we know that General HARRISON and his Constitutional advisers will have need of all their firmness, and all their integrity, and all their patriotism, to resist the disgraceful rapacity for office and its emoluments, ascribed, with too much justice, to the Whig members of Congress. In this matter, as in all others, we are neither "Whig" nor "Democrat;" but for the moral effect of the proceeding, we would propose that Gen. HARRISON should enter the Capitol and disperse both bodies of Congress as a gang of greedy spoil-hunters and traitors to principles, then distribute among them the post-offices and custom-houses and underling appointments of all sorts, at home and abroad. Why are the Whig papers silent on this subject? Have they wasted all their extra-patriotism during the canvass? Have they none left to lavish upon the most nefarious and shameless conspiracy ever set on foot by the legislators of a free people to possess themselves of the money-making places of the Government?

We have no personal interest in this matter, and none political. Our objects are answered by the immense and daily growing circulation of the Signal and New World, and we have no favors to ask of "Whig" or "Democrat." If we derive a mischievous satisfaction from holding the WHIGS to their pledges, it is their fault and not ours, for they should not desire to break them. If our patriotic brethren of the Whig press are dumb, or are base enough, like the Express newspaper, to argue away the doctrines which they have been ten years advocating, they need not quarrel with us for exposing the hollowness of their noisy pretensions.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES IN ENGLAND.

There is much curious and anxious speculation here, as to the effect which the news of the recent suspension in Philadelphia will produce in England. In the first place, some are of the opinion that the first move will be the transmission to this country, for immediate sale on any terms, of the $20,000,000 of United States Bank stock owned by the English capitalists—a proceeding which would pretty effectually neutralize itself, so far as withdrawing capital and specie from us is concerned, inasmuch as the introduction into our market of such an amount of stock—or of any considerable portion of it—would force down the price to nothing; in fact, it could not be sold. Such a movement as this, however, must not be regarded as among possibilities—although it would be difficult to say what a stockholder can gain by retaining his stock. This is one of the doubtful points on which all who are so unfortunate as to be directly interested, must judge for themselves. We do not believe that there is a living man, out of the direction of the bank, (if there is one in it,) who can with mathematical precision certainly declare what is the real value of the stock.

But in the next place, it is further assumed that the news of this suspension, coming, as it must, "like a thunder clap," will at one blow annihilate all American credit in England; prevent all future negotiations on American securities; and bring home upon us for sale all such securities as are now held there; including, with the U. S. Bank stock, all other stocks, state bonds, etc., etc., to the amount of $100,000,000, or more. This opinion we conceive to be far more extravagant than the other; and it, like the other does not need an elaborate refutation; for, although such consequences may follow in individual cases, it is, in the nature of things, impossible that such should be the general result.

But the truth is, these opinions, and almost all that we hear on the same subject are based on a wrong estimate of opinions and information in England. The recent suspension may not be such a "thunder-clap" to English ears generally as people seem to imagine. On the contrary, it was gravely doubted in some quarters, in England, whether the bank would be able to resume; and her maintaining resumption was considered nearly out of the question. The following extract from the London Times of February 2d, will show the ground taken by that paper; and will show, also, that even in anticipation of the event, the combination of New-York capitalists was expected to produce exactly what has happened.

The accounts given in the New-York papers of the situation of the "United States" Bank, and that, too, within one week of the period (the 15th ult.) fixed for the resumption of specie payments, have struck dismay among the parties interested in that concern, who had been led to expect far different results, since it was known that the agency in Europe had been undertaken by Messrs. Morrison and Son. It should be observed, however, that there are many circumstances connected with these accounts which have led to the belief that there is both exaggeration and misapprehension in them, and the want of the papers of dates previous to the 8th ult., which would contain the annual report of the meeting of the shareholders of the "United States" Bank on the 4th, almost wholly precludes any just conclusion on the subject. The affair may not, therefore, turn out quite so bad as it now appears to be, but still there was enough known before to justify great doubts whether this bank could resume at all on the 15th, and still greater, if it did resume, of its being able to bear up against the run that would be made upon it, in consequence of other recent disclosures, or to continue specie payments for any length of time.

That a deadly enmity exists in New-York against this and other banks in Philadelphia has long been apparent; and unfortunately, besides the wish that the United States Bank should be finally and totally overthrown, there exists a power in the New-York banks to aid in the accomplishment of that wish, by a pressure for specie, as soon as cash payments are resumed. On the other hand, non-resumption must prove equally fatal, by causing a forfeiture of the charter, unless the Legislature of Pennsylvania, which has peremptorily fixed a "final" period for resumption, should stultify itself so far as further to suspend the execution of its own law. Hence the proper inference seems to be, that whatever exaggeration there may be in the accounts from New-York, the prospects of the parties here who are interested in this bank are of the most unfavorable description.

It must be remembered, however, that there is a wide difference between suspecting and knowing—between fearing and seeing the occurrence of a catastrophe. And what people did, or might do, in the apprehension of the bank's failure, contrasted with what they will do when that event is authentically proclaimed, may, perhaps, be of comparative unimportance. We find, from our foreign quotations, that Bank shares were sold on Saturday, January 31, at about £14, which corresponds to American quotations of about 62½. On Tuesday, Feb. 3d, after the intelligence by the Cambridge had been smuggled ashore and partially promulgated, the shares fell to £11.10, corresponding to about 51½. This must have been nearly a month before the news of the suspension could have reached England.

The state of the money market in England—notwithstanding the length of time that has elapsed since the last arrival previous to the Britannia, and, consequently, the length of the interval which the present news covers—does not present any very striking or important feature. The tendency of public securities is downward, but not to an alarming extent. American securities, with the exception of the U. S. Bank, have not materially varied from previous quotations.

BULWER'S "NIGHT AND MORNING."—Harper and Brothers.—The public—that is the reading public—needs no urging to buy and read when the book offered is a new romance by the author of Pelham. The simple announcement that such a bonne bouche has been provided by the Harpers, immediately sets all appetites longing, and occasions a very general resort to the bookstores and circulating libraries. In the present instance, especially, the "run" is sure to be very great, so long a time having elapsed since the literary baronet has vouchsafed to glad the world of readers with a new creation of his genius. But the time has not been wasted in idleness, as Bulwer's best novel is here present and ready to attest. The author of Pelham, if literary justice is done, will henceforth be heard of no more; his pretensions will be extinguished in the brighter glory that surrounds the title "Author of Night and Morning." Bulwer has eclipsed himself. He has written a work in which there are more vigor of mind, more eloquence of expression, more true judgment, and a more skillful because more faithful and natural dealing with the elements and subjects of his art, than in any one of his previous works. It cannot be read without admiration, or what is better, without profit.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.—Massachusetts is the only State in the Union where poverty is legally made a crime. In that State poor debtors and criminals are shut up in the same loathsome receptacles, and the punishment inflicted seems to be alike severe. Honest poverty needs sympathy. It requires no punishment to add to its pangs. In Massachusetts nearly 800 persons were incarcerated in loathsome jails last year, because they were poor. Or rather, because they had not the means of liquidating the demands which inexorable creditors held, and which they prevented them from acquiring, by restraining their liberty. Massachusetts should wipe off this dark stain from her character. The birth place of liberty should not be the only place where injustice receives legislative sanction.—[Philadelphia North American.]

There is now a bright prospect that this deep disgrace will be erased from the escutcheon of the Old Bay State. A law to abolish imprisonment for debt in all cases whatsoever has passed the Massachusetts House of Representatives by a considerable majority; the Boston pettifoggers—fellows whose minds might find a world of infinite space on the point of a cambric needle—opposed it of course with might and main. We heartily wish that since they were so anxious to preserve this beastly barbarity that an exception had been made in their favor, and a clause inserted in the bill by which, if ever any of them owed a dollar he could not pay, he might have the privilege of being thrust into a dungeon as loathsome as the black hole of Calcutta.

THE TOWER OF LONDON was concluded in the last number of the NEW WORLD. STANLEY THORN and GUY FAWKES are both drawing nigh to their conclusion. As we do not intend to commence any long stories or romances, hereafter unless of extraordinary merit or until those now in the course of publication are concluded, we shall be enabled to impart a much greater variety to the pages of this journal. We have hitherto succeeded in being the first to present the most popular productions of the English press to the American public—and we have made such arrangements as to be certain of being able to do so in future.

Within a few weeks we have given Knowles's New Play "John Di Procidia;" Bulwer's New Play—"Money;" a chapter from Bulwer's new novel "Night and Morning" and a chapter from James's new novel, "The Brigand," in advance of their several publications in London.

A LETTER OF WASHINGTON'S.—The following letter has recently been brought to light by Mr. Sparks. It was written in reply to a proposition made to Washington, at the conclusion of the war, by certain officers of his army, to accept a crown. The following sentiments show the republican spirit that animated the man.

"SEN: With a mixture of great surprise and astonishment, I have read with attention the sentiments you have submitted to my perusal. Be assured, sir, no occurrence in the course of the war has given me more painful sensation than your information of there being such ideas existing in the army as you have expressed, and I must view with abhorrence, and reprehend with severity. For the present, the communication of them will rest in my own bosom, unless some further agitation of the matter shall make a disclosure necessary.

"I am much at a loss to conceive what part of my conduct could have given encouragement to an address which to me seems big with the greatest mischiefs that can befall my country. If I am not deceived in the knowledge of myself, you could not have found a person to whom your schemes are more disagreeable."

"Let me conjure you, then, if you have any regard for your country, concern for yourself or posterity, or respect for me, to banish these thoughts from your mind, and never communicate, as from yourself, or any one else, a sentiment of the like nature. I am, &c.

GEORGE WASHINGTON."

THE EVERGREEN FOR MARCH.—This valuable and cheap periodical, for March, contains the conclusion of the Tower of London; and the commencement of two new stories, which are not published in the World, viz: "Old St. Paul's," and "George St. George Julian." As this work is henceforth to contain selections different from the New World, and be, in its contents, entirely independent of that paper, it will be even more worthy than ever of general patronage. It is certainly the cheapest periodical in the country.

ARRIVAL OF THE BRITANNIA.

TWENTY-EIGHT DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The Steamer Britannia, Capt. Cleland, arrived on Monday morning at her berth at East Boston, at seven o'clock, after a very boisterous passage of 17½ days, having encountered westerly gales during the whole time. She brings dates from Liverpool to February 4th, London February 3d, evening, and Paris February 1st, all inclusive. The news from China is confirmed. The papers speak of the probable adjustment of all the difficulties. The paragraph in the Queen's speech is to the same effect.

The Eastern question is settled. This most important intelligence was received in London on the 1st inst., in despatches from Admiral Stopford. Affairs seem to have been so successfully arranged by Commodore Napier, that on the 11th of January the Pacha made his complete submission to the Sultan, and gave up the whole of the Turkish fleet. Mehmet engaged to send Egyptian officers and men to navigate the fleet to Marmorie Bay.

It further appears that Ibrahim's army was immediately to evacuate Syria and to return to Egypt, and arrangements had been made to send transports to Caiffa, to bring away the women and children, and sick of the army.

On the 13th of January the Sultan sent instructions to his commissioners in Egypt to inform Mehmet Ali, that his submission being complete, he would grant him hereditary tenure of the Pachalic of Egypt. Thus the Eastern question may be now regarded as settled.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

LONDON, Feb. 3, 1841.

It is generally understood that the English army is to be increased to the extent of ten thousand men. An addition, it is also said, will be made to the marines.

A few days ago three thousand stand of arms were distributed among the military stationed at or near Leeds. The threatened violence of the Chartists, in that district, has suggested the propriety of this step.

The great reform festival at Leeds, to which we referred in our last communication as to take place on the 21st of last month, took place on that day. The attendance was much greater than we anticipated, no fewer than 8000 persons having assembled on the occasion. The Chartists mustered strong, and succeeded in converting the household suffrage resolutions which the originators meant to carry, into resolutions reorganizing the principle of a modified universal suffrage.

A German Jew has just died at an advanced age, leaving the enormous fortune of £2,500,000, being, perhaps, the largest sum possessed by any single private individual in modern times.

The christening of the Princess Royal, as mentioned in our last communication, is to take place on the 10th inst., that being the anniversary of the marriage of her Majesty. The ceremony, which is to be on a scale of surpassing splendor, will, it is now understood, take place in the Chapel Royal instead of Buckingham Palace. The names of the Princess are to be Victoria Adelaide Louisa; the first after her Majesty, the second after the Queen Dowager, and the third after the Duchess of Kent.

On Tuesday the 26th ultimo, the Queen opened Parliament in person. Her Majesty looked uncommonly well. Prince Albert, who accompanied her on the occasion, looked pale and dispirited. The following is her Majesty's address on opening the session:

"MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

"I have the satisfaction to receive from Foreign Powers assurances of their friendly disposition, and of their earnest desire to maintain peace.

"The posture of affairs in the Levant had long been a cause of uneasiness, and a source of danger to the general tranquillity. With a view to avert the evils which a continuance of that state of things was calculated to occasion, I concluded with the Emperor of Austria, the King of Prussia, the Emperor of Russia, and the Sultan, a convention intended to effect a pacification of the Levant; to maintain the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire, and thereby to afford additional security to the peace of Europe.

"I have given directions that this Convention shall be laid before you. I rejoice to be able to inform you that the measures which have been adopted in execution of these engagements have been attended with signal success; and I trust that the objects which the contracting parties had in view, are on the eve of being completely accomplished.

"In the course of these transactions my naval forces have co-operated with those of the Emperor of Austria, and with the land and sea forces of the Sultan, and have displayed upon all occasions their accustomed gallantry and skill.

"Having deemed it necessary to send to the coast of China a naval and military force to demand reparation and redress for injuries inflicted upon some of my subjects by the officers of the Emperor of China, and for indignities offered to an agent of my Crown, I at the same time appointed plenipotentiaries to treat upon these matters with the Chinese government. The plenipotentiaries were, by the last accounts, in negotiation with the government of China; and it will be a source of much gratification to me if that government shall be induced, by its own sense of justice, to bring these matters to a speedy settlement by an amicable arrangement.

"Serious differences have risen between Spain and Portugal about the execution of a treaty concluded by those Powers, in 1835, for regulating the navigation of the Douro. But both parties have accepted my mediation, and I hope to be able to effect a reconciliation between them upon terms honorable to both.

"I have concluded with the Argentine Republic, and with the Republic of Hayti, treaties for the suppression of the slave trade, which I have directed to be laid before you.

"GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS:

I have directed the estimates of the year to be laid before you.

"However sensible of the importance of adhering to the principles of economy, I feel it to be my duty to recommend that adequate provision be made for the exigencies of the public service.

"MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

"Measures will be submitted to you without delay which will have for their object the more speedy and effectual administration of justice. The vital importance of this subject is sufficient to ensure for it your early and most serious consideration.

"The power of the commissioners appointed under the act for the amendment of the laws relating to the poor expire at the termination of the present year. I feel assured that you will earnestly direct your attention to enactments which so deeply concern the interests of the community.

"It is always with entire confidence that I recur to the advice and assistance of Parliament. I place my reliance upon your wisdom, loyalty, and patriotism, and I humbly implore of Divine Providence that all your councils may be so directed as to advance the great interests of morality and religion, to preserve peace, and to promote by enlightened legislation the welfare and happiness of all classes of my subjects."

In the discussions which followed, the only points of importance were the conciliatory observations made by the Duke of Wellington in the Lords, and by Sir Robert Peel in the Commons, towards France. Sir Robert Peel expressed his regret that some kindly allusion to France had not been made in the royal speech. The usual address to her Majesty was carried in both Houses, without a dissenting voice.

Another interesting incident which has not yet been stated in the public journals, and which, therefore, as in the case of the information contained in the above paragraphs the Americans are likely to be made acquainted with before the people of England, is, that of the Princess Royal having been vaccinated a THIRD time on Tuesday fortnight. Sir James Clark, and two other medical men went down on that day, from London to Windsor for the purpose. The operation was performed most satisfactorily, and has, I understand, succeeded: in other and more homely language, the "matter" has taken. The reason assigned for

No further intelligence from China has been received since our last. It turns out, however, that no specific understanding has been come to between the Emperor and Admiral Elliot, and that matters are as far from being adjusted as ever.

FRANCE.

The French Chambers have been principally occupied for some weeks past on the proposed fortifications of Paris. The measure is every day diminishing in its popularity; and it is beginning to be doubted whether it will ever be carried into effect.

France has now increased her army to nearly 500,000 men, and has put 22 sail of the line in commission. These extensive warlike preparations are causing the greatest uneasiness to the other powers of Europe.

2 o'clock, P. M.

P. S.—I have just learned that the Four Powers are so indignant at the extensive warlike preparations which France continues to make, notwithstanding all their remonstrances against Thiers, and in the teeth of the pacific assurances given both by Louis Philippe and M. Guizot, that if she persists much longer in her present course, the consequence will be an open rupture with the other powers.

Congressional.

FRIDAY, Feb. 19.

The Senate to day was occupied in discussing the propriety of electing a printer to the next Senate. The measure was advocated by the friends of the present Administration with great earnestness, on the ground that it was the constitutional duty of one Congress to elect a printer for its successor. Messrs. Huntington, Mangum, Bayard, and other friends of the incoming Administration, in reply stoutly maintained the opposite side of the question. In the course of the debate it was intimated by several Whig Senators that the next Senate would use its own pleasure in the choice of a printer.

SATURDAY, Feb. 20

The Senate, after the transaction of some unimportant business, and the reception of the usual number of petitions, proceeded, according to the resolution of yesterday, to the election of a printer for the next session. The ballots having been counted, the Vice President announced the result as follows:

For Blair and Rives.....26

" F. P. Blair.....1

So Blair and Rives were declared to be duly elected printers of the Senate for the 27th Congress.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Clay, for the repeal of the Sub-Treasury law, was then taken up and debated by Messrs. Clay, Allen, Williams and others, after which the question was taken on laying the resolution on the table, and decided in the affirmative—Ayes 27, Noes 25.

MONDAY, Feb. 22.

A warm and animated debate arose upon Mr. Crittenden's asking leave to bring in his bill to prevent the interference of certain federal officers in elections, in which many Senators participated. An eloquent speech by Mr. Preston was followed by a burst of applause from the galleries, immediately followed by cries of "clear the galleries," from Administration Senators. At the request of Mr. Clay the ladies were allowed to remain, while the gentlemen's gallery was cleared as soon as possible.

Mr. Calhoun concluded the debate, and on the question being taken, it was decided in the negative: Yeas 14; nays 26.

The Vice President laid before the Senate a letter from Mr. Webster, informing that body of his having resigned his seat as a Senator from Massachusetts.

MORE INDIAN TROUBLES.—The editors of the Courier learn from the Little Rock Gazette, on the authority of a gentleman, recently from the Indian country, that great excitement has been created among the Cherokees, by the execution of an Indian named Achilla Smith, one of the treaty signers, who had been tried and convicted of murder. Previous to his execution he had asked and obtained leave to have a personal interview with the chief, John Ross, with a view to obtain a reprieve. While before the chief, he was earnest in his protestations of innocence of the crime of which he had been convicted, but stated that he had killed three or four other men. Ross refused to grant a reprieve, and Smith was executed. After this event the excitement became intense amongst the party to which Smith belonged. Threats were made against the life of Ross and his friends, and he thought it prudent to surround himself by a body guard of some forty persons. He was shortly to leave the Nation for the East.

It is further stated that Ross despatched a message to a distinguished member of the Ridge party, a relative of Bonaparte's, who had (it is said,) expressed some threats against him—to know what his intentions were. The reply was characteristic of the man, and of course unsatisfactory to Ross. Thus the matter stood when the informant of the Gazette left.

The people of Arkansas with good reason implore the Federal Government to send to the frontier a force sufficiently large to keep in check the numerous hostile tribes that it has concentrated on the borders of that State.

GREAT MEN BORN IN CONNECTICUT.—The New Haven Herald has the following: "Governor Woodbridge, lately elected by the Legislature of Michigan to represent that State in the Senate of the U. States, is a native of Norwich, Connecticut. Francis Granger, who is to be Post Master General, is the son of Gideon Granger, a native of Suffield in this State. Mr. Badger, who is to be Secretary of the Navy, is the son of a native of Windham in this State. Elisha Whittlesey is said to have been born in Washington, (or New Milford) in this State. Not a bad representation of the land of good habits!

Gov. Woodbridge married a daughter of the late Judge Trumbull, whose wife was the daughter of Dr. Leverett Hubbard of New Haven."

DEATH OF "FLORIO."—We learn from the Albany Evening Journal, of Saturday, that James G. Brooks, Esq., extensively known in early life as a poet, and for the last fifteen years as the editor of different newspapers, after a long illness, died this morning. His remains were conveyed to Troy for interment on Monday.

OLD MASSACHUSETTS COMING RIGHT AT LAST.—The bill introduced by Mr. Dwight, of Springfield, and amended by Mr. Hinekey, of Barnstable, has passed to a third reading in the Massachusetts House of Representatives by a vote of 190 to 140. The following are the words of the bill, "No person shall hereafter be imprisoned on mesne process or execution for any debt founded on any contract."

This liberal and just law puts residents and non-residents on the same footing.

FATAL EPIDEMIC.—We are sorry to learn from the Knoxville Register of the 6th February, that the fatal epidemic which lately made its appearance in West Tennessee, is gradually extending itself, and has created much alarm in the vicinity of Henry County. It is supposed to be the disease known some years since in that section of country as the "Cold Plague." Its ravages are well remembered in several of the upper counties of East Tennessee, and Western Counties of North Carolina.

THE BIRTH DAY OF WASHINGTON was celebrated on Monday with unusual spirit. The day was fine; flags floated from all the public places and the shipping; several of our military companies were out; salutes were fired at the Battery; and in the evening the places of public amusement were thronged. A magnificent ball was given at Niblo's by the Washington Greys, and there were several other balls in honor of the occasion. At the Broadway Tabernacle there was a celebration by the whigs. The house was well filled, the galleries being occupied chiefly by ladies. The services commenced with the tune of "Old Hundred" by the choir; then there was a prayer by a clergyman whose name we did not hear; after which a national ode was sung. Hugh Maxwell then read Washington's Farewell Address, and Daniel Ullman, Esq., delivered an oration. Nature, too, seemed to join in the celebration, for in the evening the heavens were brilliantly illuminated by the Aurora Borealis.

ACCIDENT.—The correspondent of the Courier and Enquirer says: This morning, just about the time for the meeting of the House, experiments were being made in the Capitol yard, in the presence of a large number of members of Congress, of Colt's patent fire arms. Mr. John Quincy Adams had just gotten out of his carriage and gone into the Capitol, when his horses took fright, and ran furiously through the yard, tumbling over a Congress mail carriage; the driver was thrown from his seat, and so much injured that his life is despaired of. The carriage was run against the iron gate, and torn to pieces, and the horses went off. Notwithstanding this sad and melancholy accident, the heartless man who was exhibiting his gun, went on with his firings, and it was with difficulty that other carriages were preserved from dashing off. It was really an affecting sight to see the venerable ex-President assisting to bear into the Capitol the bleeding and apparently lifeless body of his servant, and the anxious and tender assiduity with which he administered to him.

A bill has passed the Legislature of Alabama, providing: "That in addition to the property now allowed by law, from executions, there shall be exempted from execution upon all debts hereafter to be contracted, for the use of every family in this State, forty acres of land, which shall be and enure to the use and benefit of settled and permanent families."

Dr. Eldridge, accused of forgery, &c., will, it is believed, be discharged during the present term of Court. If this man be innocent, of how dreadful an offence are his accusers guilty! His reputation has been ruined: is not that worse than death?

The N. Y. Canal Commissioners say it will require six and a half millions, to continue at the present rate of progress, the works under contract. The Finance Committee of the senate recommended appropriations of only $4,050,000. Of this amount, $2,750,000 is intended for the Erie Canal enlargement, $750,000 for the Genesee Valley Canal, and $650,000 for the Black River Canal.

DEATH OF GOV. WINTHROP.—We regret to learn that the Hon. Thomas L. Winthrop, formerly Lieut. Governor of Massachusetts, father of the Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, Representative to Congress from the Suffolk District, died on Monday morning, at his residence in Boston, at the age of 81 years.

CONNECTICUT.—Francis H. Nicoll, of Fairfield County, has been nominated for Governor by a Van Buren Convention, in opposition to William W. Ellsworth, Whig, the present incumbent. The election takes place in April.

HONOR DECLINED.—The friends of Mr. Van Buren, in Philadelphia, have tendered a dinner to him as he passes through that city after the fourth of March. Mr. Van Buren declines the honor of the dinner, but says he will remain in the city long enough to take his friends by the hand.

SPECIAL MISSION TO LONDON.—The Richmond Whig of Thursday says: "A rumor is afloat, and we devoutly hope it may prove true, that Mr. Clay will be despatched forthwith to London on a special mission to open negotiations for the final adjustment of the difficulties. The occurrences at Leckport seem to require immediate action to avert so direful a calamity as war."

Mr. Fennimore Cooper, it is said, has nearly completed a fifth novel in which Leatherstocking appears as a character. The scene is on one of the New-York lakes, and the date is in the early part of the eighteenth century. This book will, it is said, represent the youth of Leatherstocking, with certain incidents connected with the life of Chingagook, the father of Uncas.

Capt. Marryat being with a select party at a friend's house in this city, "Woodman, spare that tree" was sung by Russell in his best style. At its conclusion the Captain, taking up the song, wrote in pencil the following Parody impromptu, which he requested to have sung. Tea having just been handed round the effect was irresistible, and to none more so than the Brigadier General, who was one of the party:

Lady, give me Tea,
And I will make a brew,
At e'en it pleaseth me,
Pray give it to me now.

"T was my old mother's hand
That poured it from the pot,
Lady, let it stand,
I hate to drink it hot.

The Hon. George Badger, who has been named as the new Secretary of the Navy, was educated at Yale College, where he graduated in 1813, after which he studied Law at the Litchfield School, under the learned and distinguished Judge Gould.

The Connecticut Whig State Convention have nominated all the present State officers for re-election.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

THE DISINTERMENT.

BY B. SIMMONS.

Lost Lord of Song! who grandly gave Thy matchless timber for the spear—
And, by old Hellas' hallow'd wave
Died at the feet of Freedom—hear!
Hear—from thy lone and lowly tomb,
Where 'mid thy own "involute lale,"
Beneath no minister's marble gloom,
No banner's golden smile,
Far from the swarming city's crowd,
Thy glory round thee for a shroud,
Thou sleep'st,—the pious rustic's tread
The only echo o'er thy bed,
Save, few and faint, when o'er the foam
The Pilgrims of thy genius come,
From distant earth, with tears of praise,
The homage of their hearts to raise,
And curse the country's very name,
Unworthy of thy sacred dust,
That draws such lustre from thy fame,
That heaps such outrage on thy bust!
Wake from the Dead—and lift thy brow
With the same scornful beauty now,
As when beneath thy shafts of pride
Eavenom'd CAN'T—the Python—died!
Prophet no less than Bard, behold
Matured the eventful moment, told
In those divine predictive words,
Pour'd to thy lyre's transcendent chords:—

"IF E'RE HIS AWFUL ASHES CAN GROW COLD—
BUT NO, THEIR EMBERS SOON SHALL BURST THEIR MOULD—

—FRANCE SHALL FEEL THE WANT
OF THIS LAST CONSOLATION THOUGH BUT SCANT.
HER HONOR, FAME AND FAITH DEMAND HIS BONES, TO PILE ABOVE A PYRAMID OF THRONES!"
If, then, from thy neglected bier,
One humblest follower thou canst hear,
O Mighty Master! rise and flee,
Swift as some meteor bold and bright,
One fragile cloud attending thee,
Across the dusky tracts of night,
To where the sunset's latest radiance shone
O'er Africa's sea interminably lone.

Below that broad unbroken sea
Long since the sultry sun has dropp'd,
And now in dread solemnity
—As though its course Creation stopp'd
One wondrous hour, to watch the birth
Of deeds portentous unto earth—
The moonless midnight far and wide
Solidly black flings ever all
That giant waste of waveless tide
Her melancholy pall,
Whose folds in thickest gloom unfurl'd.
Each ray of heaven's high face debar,
Save, on the margin of the World
Where leans yon solitary star,
Large, radiant, restless, tingling with far smile
The jagged cliffs of a green barren isle.
Hark! o'er the waves distinctly swell
Twelve slow vibrations of a bell!

And out upon the silent ear
At once ring bold and sharply clear,
With shock more startling than if thunder
Had split the slumbering earth asunder,
And iron sounds of crow and bar;

Ye scarce may know from whence they come,
Whether from Island or from Star,
Both lie so hush'd and dumb!
On, swift and deep, those echoes sweep,
Shaking long-buried Kings from sleep—
Up, up! ye spectred jailers—ho!
Your granite heaped his head in vain;
The very grave gives back your foe—

Dead Cæsar wakes again!
The Nations, with a voice as dread
As that which once in Bethany,
Burst to the regions of the dead
And set the loved-one free,
Have cried, "COME FORTH!" and lo! again,
To smite the hearts and eyes of men
With the old awe he once instill'd
By many an unforgotten field,
Napoleon's look shall startle day—
That look that, where its anger fell,
Scorch'd empires from the earth away
As with the blasts of hell!

Up—from the dust, ye sleepers, ho!
By the blue Danube's stately wave—
From Berlin's towers—from Moscow's snow,
And Windsor's gorgeous grave!
Come—summon'd by the omnis power,
The Spirit of this thrilling hour—

And, stooping from yon craggy height,
Girt by each perished satellite,
Each cunning tool of kingly terror
Who served your reigns of fraud and error,
Behold, where with relentless lock
Ye chain'd Prometheus* to his rock,
And, when his tortured bosom ceased
Your vulture's savage beak to feast,
Where fathom-deep ye dug his cell,
And built and barr'd his coffin down,
Half doubting if even death could quell
Such terrible renown;
Now 'mid the torch's solemn glare,
And banded knees, and muttered prayer,
Within that green sepulchral glen Uncover'd groups of warrior men
Breathless performed the high behest
Of winning back, in priceless trust
For the regenerated West,
Your victim's mighty dust.
Hark! how they burst your cramps and rings—
Ha, ha! ye banded, baffled kings!

Stout men! delve on with axe and bar,
Ye're watched from yonder restless star:
Hew the tough masonry away—
Bid the tomb's ponderous portals fly!
And firm your sounding levers sway,
And loud your clanking hammers ply!
Nor falter though the work be slow,
Ye something gain at every blow,
While deep each heart in chorus sings.
"Ha, ha! ye banded, baffled kings!"
Brave men! delve in with axe and bar,
Ye're watched from yonder glorious star.

"T is morn—the marble floor is cleft,
And slight and short the labor left.
"T is noon—they wind the windless now
To heave the granite from his brow;
Back to each gazer's waiting heart
The life blood leaps with anxious start—
Down Bertrand's cheeks the tear drop steals—
Low in the dust Las Cases kneels,
(Oh! tried and trusted—still, as long
As the true heart's fidelity
Shall form the theme of harp and song,
High Bards shall sing of ye!)
One moment,—and thy beams, O Sun!
The bier of him shall look upon,
Who, save the heaven-expelled, alone
Dared envy thee thy blazing throne;
Who haply oft, with gaze intent,
And sick from victory's vulgar war,
Panted to sweep the firmament,
And dash thee from thy car,
And cursed the clay that still confined
His narrow conquests to mankind.
"T is done—his chiefs are lifting now
The shroud from that tremendous brow,
That with the lightning's rapid might Illumed Marengo's awful night—
Flash'd over Lodi's murderous bridge,
Swept Prussia from red Jena's ridge,
And broke once more the Austrian sword
By Wagram's memorable ford.
And may Man's puny race that shook
Before the terrors of that look,
Approach unshrinking now, and see
How far corruption's mastery
Has tamed the tyrant tamer!

Raise
That silken cloud, what meets the gaze!
The scanty dust, or whitening bones,
Or fleshless jaws' horrific mirth,
Of him whose threshold rose on thrones,
A mockery now to earth!
No—even as though his haughty clay
Seoff'd at the contact of decay,
And from his mind's immortal flame
Itself immortalized became,
Tranquilly there Napoleon lies revealed,
Like a king sleeping on his own proud shield,
Harnessed for conflict, and that eagle-star,
Whose fire-eyed Legion foremost waked the war,
Still on his bosom, tarnished too and dim,
As if hot battle's cloud had lately circled him.

Fast fades the vision—from that glen
Wind slow those aching-hearted men,
While every mountain echo floats,
Filled with the bugle's regal notes—
And now the guns' redoubled roar
Tells the lone peak and mighty main,
Beneath his glorious Tricolor
Napoleon rests again!
And France's galley soon the sail
Shall spread triumphant to the gale;
Till, lost upon the lingering eye,
It melts and mingles in the sky.

Let Paris, too, prepare a show,
And deck her streets in gaudy woe;
And rear a more than kingly shrine,
Whose taper's blaze shall ne'er be dim,
And bid the sculptor's art divine
Be lavished there for Him.
And let him take his rest serene,
(Even so he willed it) by the Seine;
But ever to the poet's heart,
Or pilgrim musing o'er those pages
(Replete with marvels) that impart
His story unto Ages;
The spacious azure of yon sea
Alone his minster floor shall be,
Coped by the stars—red evening's smile
His epitaph; and thou, rude Isle,
Austerly-browed and thunder-rear'd,
Napoleon's only monument!

A PASSAGE IN THE LIFE OF ALFIERI.

BY J. C. C.

Two men who had sought for protection from the rays of the sun in an arbor which was overshadowed by the thick leaves of a wide-spreading vine, were seated opposite to each other, leaning on a table, and smoking perfumed cigarettes.

The elder, who appeared to be about forty years of age, was tall and pale; his costume, which was rich although simple, had somewhat of a military appearance about it. As for the younger, he was characterized by that slovenly elegance which had begun to be fashionable in Italy as well as in France, toward the end of the eighteenth century.

"Faith, Alfieri," said the elder of the two, "you were the last person in the world I expected to have met at Abano."

"Yet, methinks, the sick man's place should be where he may hope to mend his health."

The young man looked at the count: "The fact is, you do look paler than usual; have you consulted the best physicians?"

"Yes."

"And what do they say?"

"The same thing over and over again. They promise me in the winter that I shall be well in the summer; and when the summer comes and I feel no relief, they assure me that I shall be better in the winter. The Milanese doctors recommend the air of Naples, and the Neapolitan doctors that of Milan; and so they go on, turning me over from one to the other, until I expect some day to die on the road between these two places, if I continue to follow their ordinances."

"Come, come, nonsense, did you ever hear of any body dying at your age?"

"Sometimes," murmured Alfieri, pensively, and shaking his head.

"I bet I know what ails you: you have eternally present to your mind the prediction of your old sorceress."

"Am I wrong, Cellini? I was only twelve years of age when that old woman told me all that has happened to me since. She said that I should leave Piedmont, that I should become a poet, and that my name would be celebrated."

"And that you would die at thirty-five. Who does not know that part of your history? You have written on it an admirable sonnet which all Italy knows by heart. But that a man like you should put faith in the mummery of an old woman, is what I cannot understand."

The count sighed, but made no answer: a short silence ensued.

"Shall I tell you what it is that kills you?" rejoined Cellini. "At the bottom you are not ill, you are only low-spirited."

"That's what the doctors say," replied the count, sadly, "but I feel it will carry me off at last."

"Why not seek for some distractions? Why don't you travel? When you quitted Milan, your intention, if I mistake not, was to go to Spain."

"I have been there."

"Ah! indeed—and from thence to France."

"I have been there."

"And thence to Germany."

"I have been there."

"But you must have been everywhere, if that's the case. The fact is, I know you are a most expeditious traveller; you traverse each country as fast as your horse can gallop; but you can't have had time to see anything."

"Pardon me; I have seen mountains, cities, roads, and plains; and, in the midst of all this, numberless myriads of human beings very busy doing nothing."

"And what did you particularly notice?"

"Three splendid institutions; the schlague in Germany, the police in France, and the inquisition in Spain."

"You're as full of satire as ever, I see," said Cellini, laughing; "a misanthropist and a republican, a real descendant of Brutus in the papal states. But really, Alfieri, you do not deserve the favors which fortune has bestowed upon you; all our theatres ring with your triumphs. Italy has its eyes upon you; you are noble, rich, young, and yet you seem tired of life. What is it you would have to be happy?"

"That's more than I can say; something perhaps which is possessed by the lowliest of the crowd which covers me with acclamations; a quiet and retired habitation, an obscure destiny, and a woman who would love me, seated by my side."

"But what hinders you from having all this?"

Alfieri shrugged up his shoulders, and heaved a deep sigh. "You forget," said he, "that chance has made a celebrated man of me, and a celebrated man is like a wild beast, everybody rushes to get a sight of him. Every man thinks that he has a right to spy into my actions; I am never alone; my books are like couriers, they announce my arrival wherever I go. As soon as I appear in an assembly, farewell to free and friendly conversation; universal silence prevails, the guests are all on the tip-toe of expectation; they expect to hear me speak as if I were a book. The women are all silent through fear, or else they give themselves airs to attract my notice. Brought up, as I was, almost in the midst of the woods, secluded from society in my youth, I feel confused at being singled out as the object of universal attention; unable to distinguish between real sympathy and impertinent curiosity, I wrap myself up in my reserve, and remain silent. I am therefore considered proud, when I am only unhappy. Ah! were I poor, destitute, miserable, I might believe in the affection of those who surround me; but I am now ever in doubt whether it is myself or my reputation which is sought after."

"I understand—you are as unfortunate as a king."

"You seem to jest, but it is strictly true nevertheless. When I arrived here, I thought I had escaped from all my troubles; for a few days I was free to live like everybody else, I was comparatively happy—but the arrival of a man, who had seen me I don't know where, destroyed everything."

"That's the way of the world," said Cellini—"your celebrity is a burden to you, and I, who work my fingers off, remain buried in the most enviable obscurity."

"It's your own fault; you don't stick to anything seriously."

"My dear count, you seem to forget that I am in the pay of an impressario, obliged to have three acts ready every month. You don't know what it is to be a composer to a theatre; it's like the landlord of a public house, where there is a continued call on his genius."

"Until he at last gets to the bottom of it."

"That's just what has happened to me; I managed to live some time on a dozen decent ideas—you know what an idea is, a thing you can dish up with fifty different sauces; you can put the beginning at the end, the middle at the beginning, and people wonder at the author's fecundity. I went on in this manner for about three years; but at last the public discovered that I gave them turned cloth for new—I was hissed."

"Well, and how did you manage then?"

"Why, I determined to travel, and regenerate my ideas."

"And do you think you shall succeed?"

"Quite certain of it. There are a great many persons at Abano, and plots are as thick here as the grasshoppers were in Egypt in the time of Pharaoh. In less than a month, I warrant you that I shall have gathered materials enough for as many comedies and dramas as will last me ten years at a moderate calculation. I only arrived yesterday, and am already on the scent of an intrigue."

Alfieri smiled incredulously.

"'Tis a fact," continued Cellini, lowering his voice; "yesterday, heated by travelling and unable to sleep, I ventured into the garden; you know the small pavilion at the extremity of the gravel walk."

"Yes."

"Well, I was strolling about near it, when I heard a door or a window suddenly close. I turned about, and found myself cheek by jowl with a man."

"Can it be possible?"

"Seeing me, he stopped short and seemed inclined to speak, but he altered his mind, turned away and disappeared."

"Did you distinguish his features?"

"As I do yours now—if it was splendid moonlight."

"And you would recognise him again?"

"I have done so already."

"How?"

"This morning I saw him in the pump-room."

"Do you know his name?"

"They call him Marliano."

The count started up with vivacity. "Are you sure he came out of the pavilion?"

"I couldn't swear to it, but I think he did."

"And you are sure that it was close to the pavilion at the bottom of the garden, near the poplar trees, that you met him?"

"Yes, under the windows of the Marchioness Alcanza."

Alfieri turned pale, his lips trembled convulsively, but he mastered his emotion and sat down again.

"You see that I have not lost my time," continued Cellini, who had not remarked the Count's uneasiness. "I am on the scent of a love affair, which will no doubt furnish me with some excellent scenes. I had already remarked this Marliano, on account of his being so very ugly; he looks like the impertinent thief, in my idea. Seeing him continually in the company of the Marchioness, who, by-the-by, appears to hate him, I at first took him for her husband, but I was mistaken; there is a secret about it, which you must help me to penetrate."

It was indeed a secret; but it was not only now that the Count desired to discover it. Cellini was far from being aware how interested his friend was in this mystery, and what anguish his recital had inflicted upon him.

The Marchioness had been about three months at Abano. She had come alone, and was ill. Alfieri had done his best to avoid her; indeed he let slip no opportunity of showing his aversion when chance threw them together; but the young widow did her utmost to overcome a hatred, the cause of which she really was, or affected to be, ignorant of. Subsequently the Count's coldness had yielded to the marks of interest which he received from the Marchioness, and a sort of intimacy, which became more familiar every day, sprang up between them. He felt that this woman exercised more influence over him every time he saw her; that his existence was, as it were, incomplete without her society; and that, in short, his happiness depended on the continuance of that friendship which had so unexpectedly arisen out of his former dislike.

He was on the point of telling her so one day, when Marliano arrived. At the sight of this man Bianca appeared confused; she welcomed him with concealed affright; there arose a sort of mute combat between them, in which the young widow was vanquished.

Alfieri then remarked that she avoided him. It seemed to him as if this Marliano exercised over her a sort of jealous guardianship, to which she submitted, but against her will. What connection could there exist between these two beings? Cellini's story cleared up all his doubts, but he could not bring himself to put faith in the conclusions which it seemed to warrant. Then who was this Marliano? A first glance seemed to indicate one of those men who pass their lives in the frivolities and dissipations of the world; but, after a more minute examination, he descried under this assumed mask a violent tenacity, a stubborn and headstrong will, one of those ignoble and coarse minds in a case of adamant. Alfieri had in vain endeavored to study more deeply this man's character; all his advances were met with distant civility; indeed the Marchioness always interfered to put an end to any discussion which might arise between them; she seemed to fear their coming in contact with each other.

Such was the state of things, when one day the Count, on descending into the garden rather earlier than usual, met the young widow alone. It was the first time since the arrival of Marliano, and he resolved to profit by it. After several useless attempts to discourse on indifferent topics, finding that he became more and more embarrassed, he at last suddenly stopped, and taking the hand of the Marchioness—

"What have you against me?" said he; "and why do you avoid me?"

"I avoid you!" repeated she; "what can induce you to think so?"

"Do you think I am blind, madam? For more than a fortnight this is the first time I have been able to speak to you."

The Marchioness, who had been troubled for a moment, had now recovered herself.

"Are you sure that it is my fault?" asked she, smiling; "we seldom find those whom we do not care to seek."

"Ah, madam! you do not doubt my desire to partake of your society?"

"Why not? I know that my arrival at Abano displeased you at first. Did the intimacy of a few days suffice to destroy all your former prejudices?"

The Count blushed, and endeavored to exculpate himself.

"Do not attempt to deny it," continued the Marchioness; "some one had poisoned your mind against me. I know that the only reason of your stay was your being obliged to wait for some letters which you expected; you were consequently compelled to put up with my society."

"I do not know who can have given you all these details," said Alfieri, with unaffected simplicity, "but I cannot deny my faults, or conceal my thoughts. It is true that your name awakened in me a painful emotion, and that I did not attempt to hide it. But if such be the cause of your coldness toward me, which has succeeded so suddenly to your prior affability, you punish too cruelly a prejudice which your presence has sufficed to dissipate."

"And may I ask you what this prejudice might be?"

"Were I to refuse to give you the explanation you demand, you might be inclined to suppose that it arose from some injurious repugnance on my part; but your presence renewed a sensation of sorrow within my breast, of which I was not the master."

"And for what reason?"

"I once had a friend, madam, who had likewise been the companion of my studies. We had grown together, and I loved him as children love one another, because they are of the same age and enjoy the same pleasures. We had separated, but kept up a regular correspondence, for we could not forget the happy days of our boyhood. I heard that he lived respected by all who knew him at Genoa. About a year back I learned that he had fallen in love with a woman, beautiful, admired, and courted by all. Two of my letters remained unanswered; at last I received one from his mother—his love had been fatal to him."

"And your friend was called?"

"Julio Aldi."

On hearing this name, a cry escaped the marchioness.

"It was then that I heard your name pronounced for the first time," continued Alfieri; but seeing that the young woman had buried her face in her hands—"Pardon me, madam," said he, with a supplicating and agitated voice, "I have afflicted you, but it was unavoidable. Now you are aware why I wished to avoid a person whose presence recalled to me the death of my friend."

"How you must have hated me!" exclaimed the marchioness, bathed in tears.

"No madam; for I knew that you did everything in your power to prevent their duel, that you even went to the place of rendezvous."

"Too late sir—too late!"

"The fault was not yours, and Aldi's mother rendered you full justice; she did not accuse you in the agony of her grief, but the young man's imprudence, which had exposed him to the Baron Rocca's sword. Ah, how often have I condemned him for having ventured, in the chances of a duel, a life full of hope in the future! I then did not know the anguish of always finding near the person beloved a face whose impassibility insults our sufferings—of hearing, wherever her voice is heard, the voice of another who answers her with familiarity! Now I comprehend why Aldi preferred certain death to tortures such as these; for I, a man of thought and reverie as I am, who never touched a sword in my life, I feel a thirst for shedding blood; a challenge is ever on my lips, and I wish to be placed opposite to my adversary, sword in hand, to acquire the right of loving exclusively to myself."

Alfieri's voice had risen as he spoke, his pale face was flushed, and, on pronouncing these last words his hand was outstretched as if he had grasped a sword; the marchioness made an involuntary motion to stop him.

"Ah you need not fear," rejoined he with a bitter smile; "I have devoured my anger. What right had I to provoke a rival? Jealousy is only permitted to him who can hope for a return to his affection. And yet," continued he, after a short pause, "what risk should I run in a duel? Is there not a terrible one engaged between me and my malady? and I well know what will be the issue of that."

The marchioness had insensibly drawn closer to him. Her looks were fixed on the poet's dejected countenance with an indescribable expression of compassion, and she said, in a voice trembling with emotion, "Good heavens! what is the matter with you?"

"Do you ask me? Do you not know both the cause and the cure? Nothing but a little affection which might inspire me with the desire to live; for an instant I imagined I had found it; I then breathed more freely; I felt all the vigor of my first youth return, because I was happy; but it only lasted a few days, for I soon perceived that my hopes were groundless."

"Who told you so?"

"Bianca!" exclaimed he: "have I understood you? Speak, I beseech you—for pity's sake speak!"

The marchioness was about to answer; but she suddenly uttered a cry of terror, and tore herself from his embrace. The count raised his eyes; Marliano was standing at the corner of the parterre.

The Genoise bowed coldly. On seeing him the marchioness had fallen back motionless on the bench; he advanced, and, without appearing to notice her emotion, inquired after her health with impassible politeness.

As for Alfieri, the arrival of this man at the moment that he was about to receive an avowal which he had so long and so ardently sought after, had at first drawn from him a gesture of anger; but his attention was soon attracted toward Bianca, who by her looks seemed to be supplicating Marliano. Alfieri felt all his doubts return; an invincible instinct pointed out this man to him as his rival, and he resolved to do his utmost to verify his suspicions. He observed to the marchioness that it was time to go to the spring, and he offered to escort her there.

"I thank you, sir," said the marchioness with embarrassment; "I remain here; but do not let me interfere with your arrangements."

"My arrangements are yours, madam," said the count; "you know it—the only hours that I enjoy are those which I pass with you."

"I see, count, that you would succeed quite as well in madrigals as in tragedy," replied the marchioness with effort.

Alfieri shook his head. "Do not rail, I beseech you, at the expression of a sentiment which you know to be sincere," said he; "you cannot mistake the cause of the change which your presence has worked in me. Before I knew you I was unhappy, wearied with all that vain applause which is called glory. I saw you—melancholy, fatigue, all disappeared. You have acted on me like the rays of the sun on a drooping plant—I owe you my very existence."

"Sir!" exclaimed the marchioness, terrified; and then she turned her eyes upon Marliano, but he remained calm and motionless.

Alfieri had watched her looks and her movements.

"You will excuse me," rejoined he, turning toward the Genoise; "such confessions are not usually made in the presence of a third person. I have doubtless been indiscreet."

Marliano bowed. "I feel happy," said he, "count, to have inspired you with so much confidence as to induce you to make such an avowal of your sentiments."

"I assure you, signor, that I rejoice that you hear me."

"It is rather for me to rejoice to find that a great poet employs, to express his passion, an eloquence which others in vain seek for in their love."

The irony with which these last words had been pronounced had something so cold, so piercing about it, that it produced on Alfieri the effect of those wounds which we do not feel at first; but when he understood the full force of it, a flush of indignation caused his very blood to boil: his eyes met those of Marliano. Bianca threw herself between these two glances, in which they exchanged their hatred.

"We well know your gallantry, count," said she; "but we have had quite enough on that chapter for to-day. I do not intend to go to the spring, but I do not wish to hinder you from taking your accustomed walk; you will bring me a nosegay on your return."

The count made an effort on himself, and took his leave. Marliano was about to follow him.

"Signor Marliano!" exclaimed the marchioness, "you promised to read me a chapter."

The Genoise turned toward her—a sardonic smile played upon his lips. "Are you so much afraid for him?" said he.

Bianca laid her hand on her heart, and sat down without being able to answer.

"Yet you have reason to be satisfied with me, madam," rejoined Marliano, bitterly. "Did I not allow him to speak of his love? Did I not suffer his insults, for his intention was to insult me? Did I not carry my patience to such a pitch that he must have thought me a vile coward? Does not this suffice you?"

"I must leave this place," said the marchioness with anguish. "I cannot stay here any longer. I shall return to Genoa."

"I am ready."

"Bianca cast on Marliano a long look of terror and indignation."

"Yes," continued she, "I shall return to Genoa, but to bid an eternal adieu to the world. I have often thought of it—my determination is taken—I shall retire into a convent."

Marliano started. "What say you, madam? A convent?"

"I am resolved."

"Impossible! So young, so beautiful—to bury yourself in an eternal prison."

"Am I free now?"

The Genoise looked at her. "It is to avoid me that you shun the world," said he, sorrowfully; "you then hate me more than you love its pleasures."

"And even were it so, have you not forced me to it?"

"What have I done?"

The marchioness briskly raised her head. "Do you dare ask me?" said she, with indignant surprise. "Baron Rocca, have you forgotten the past? Have you not traced around me a fatal circle which none can pass without certain death? You ask me what you have done. Have you not profited by your odious address as a bravo to assume to yourself the authority of a guardian over me against my will, and call to account all those who have dared to approach me? I could not demand the assistance of those who would have had the courage to protect me against this tyranny, for it would have exposed them to certain destruction. Sheltered under the point of honor, you would have awaited their provocation—then, master of the arms and conditions, you would have murdered them as you did the unfortunate Aldi. Thus have you enslaved me to your will during three years, trembling beneath your regard, obliged to suffer your society, and estranging all others from me through fear. In vain have I tried to escape you; you have followed me every where. Even here, where I had fled for concealment, you appear under the false name of Marliano, as if you had feared that yours would have been the signal of my flight—and you ask me what you have done!"

Whilst the marchioness had been speaking, the Genoise had turned paler and paler; his features had assumed an expression impossible to describe; it was an anguish which had something cruel about it—a sort of despair which tormented him, but inspired no pity; it was the grief of Satan crowned king of evil and of pain.

"Why did you not love me?" said he, fixing on the marchioness a withering look of anger. "It is you who have caused all that has happened. Happiness would have softened my soul. You have exasperated it. That skill which you reproach me with—the world itself forced me to acquire it. I was ugly, abandoned; I required a defence against contempt—I acquired the art of killing. What had at first been necessity, became at last a habit—I placed my honor in a science which I had studied merely as a safeguard. Besides, why should I spare those who hate me? The hatred of others renders us cruel, madam. Ah! as soon as I knew you, I take heaven to witness that I repented ever having shed blood—but I could not efface the past. My love was disdained. I saw you despised and hated me. I was then seized with a secret rage. Why should I leave to another the happiness which had been refused to myself? Would you even have thanked me for it at the bottom of your soul? No! If I am cruel, Bianca, it is because I cannot bear the idea that you should love another."

"Thus I am the slave of your passion."

"I love you, and am jealous."

"But I—I do not love you."

"I know—I know it. And yet your love would change my whole life, and redeem the past."

He seized the hands of Bianca, and pressed them convulsively against his heart. "Oh! I love you, Bianca; I love you as man never loved," exclaimed he; "why are you without pity?"

"Leave—leave me," said the young woman, struggling to escape.

"What can I do to induce you to listen to me?"

"Leave me, I say."

"Bianca, you cannot eternally resist my prayers—you will relent—I love you too much—you must be mine at last."

"A convent rather!" exclaimed the young woman, distracted.

"I will tear you from it."

"Then the tomb!"

Marliano let drop her hands, which he had held in his.

"You love the count," said he, gnashing his teeth with rage.

The marchioness shuddered, attempted to speak, but burst into tears.

"To-morrow we will start for Genoa," said he, after a long silence.

At this moment some persons appeared at the extremity of the walk; Marliano offered the countess his arm, and they both walked away.

Hardly had they disappeared among the trees, when Cellini crept cautiously from behind a clump of acacias where he had concealed himself. He had arrived there a little after Alfieri's departure, and having distinguished the voices of the Marchioness and Marliano, he had allowed his curiosity to get the better of his discretion. Wishing to clear up the suspicions which he entertained, he had listened attentively, and had heard all that had passed between them. The beginning of their conversation had only excited his astonishment, and he merely saw in it a capital subject for a scenarist, but the end had taught him the part which Alfieri played in the affair. He therefore ran to him immediately, and told him all he had discovered thus opportunely. His revelation was for the Count as welcome as it was unexpected; his doubts were removed, and he saw that he was beloved. Everything was now explained: the trouble of the Marchioness at the sight of Marliano; her timid submission to his will; the sudden alteration in her behavior toward himself. His joy knew no bounds.

"But," observed Cellini, "she has promised this Marliano, or rather this Baron Rocca, to start to-morrow."

"No, no," exclaimed Alfieri; "she shall stay. Ah! heaven be thanked that I have learned the truth; for this once this Baron Rocca will find some one betwixt him and the woman whom he oppresses."

"You forget that you never handled an arm in your life, and that this man will infallibly kill you."

"I do not care."

"Of course you are too happy just now to care about life; only, if you succumb, the Marchioness will remain without a protector, and exposed to the mercy of her persecutor."

"You are right. But need I fight this man? Would it not be sufficient to publish the truth?"

"It is injurious to the Baron; he will challenge you, and you cannot refuse to give him satisfaction, or it will be said you are afraid."

"Well, I will give him satisfaction."

"Then he will kill you, and you will not have benefitted her in the least. You walk in a circle out of which you can find no issue."

Alfieri stamped with rage on the ground. "Is it possible that this point of honor can cover every enormity? What! because a villain is clever in the art of killing, he has the right to force you to silence, or to murder you? Strange justice of the world! If I refuse to allow myself to be assassinated by this cut throat, a thousand voices will be raised to brand me as a coward, and my celebrity will only serve to publish my shame to every corner of the world, and render my name more despicable. Since life is nothing but an arena of gladiators, why was I not taught to shed blood? What use is what I am and what I know to me? O, God! I would barter my genius, my glory, everything, for the science of a fencing-master. What's to be done—what's to be done?"

"Formerly a bravo might have served your turn; unfortunately they are out of fashion now."

Alfieri shook his head and remained pensive. But he suddenly awoke from his reverie: "Yes," murmured he, "it must be so; it's the only means I have."

"What are you going to do?" asked his friend.

"You shall know very soon," answered the Count, and he left the room.

The following hours were employed by him in arranging his affairs and writing his last instructions. However firm the soul may be, such preparations cannot but weigh heavily upon it. There is always some smiling corner in life, some happy spot, which we then recall to mind, and to which the humid eye looks back with regret. How many doubts arise, how many anxieties do we take up from the bottom of our hearts! Will our name be long remembered? Who will weep for our loss? Melancholy reflections, to solve which we dare not consult the experience of the past.

And Alfieri thought of all this: of the mountains where he had passed his boyhood; of his first emotions; of his first verses; of the old woman's prediction, which was now, doubtless, about to be accomplished. He then examined his papers, separating his finished compositions from those which he had as yet as it were only sketched out, the children of his imagination, which he intended to have impressed with the whole power of his genius and experience. Oh! how many dreams begun, how many inspirations which had formerly but faintly glimmered on his mind, then burst upon him in all their glory! and he groaned, the poet, for that moment had furnished him with more ideas than the labor of a whole life could develop. And he was about to hazard all this against the dexterity of a bravo. He pressed his hand against his forehead, as if to tear from it the treasures which were about to perish with him. For so it is with man: he considers his intelligence as the common inheritance of humanity, and that, were he to keep aught of it to himself, he would commit a robbery on mankind. He cannot take upon himself to carry him with a thought unexpressed.

But time passed away. The Count rapidly finished to put everything in order. He wrote to his sister, bade an eternal adieu to every thing he loved in this world, and then descended into the saloon.

Cellini and Marliano were there alone. The former was warm in praise of a volume of Machiavel which he held in his hand.

"I do not know it," said Marliano, coolly.

"Should you wish to read it?" asked the young man, presenting him the book.

"I never read."

Cellini looked at him with astonishment. This was the epoch of the regeneration of ideas which signalized the end of the eighteenth century. The nobility seemed to have suddenly awoke from the long torpidity in which they had lain, to study something more than the mere art of gallantry, or the noble science of arms. There was a universal rush toward literature, so that a man who declared that he could not read, was considered as extraordinary a being as a courtier of the reign of Charles the Second who lived without a mistress.

The Count, who on entering had remarked Cellini's surprise, observed—

"Signor Marliano is quite right; what can gentlemen have to do with books?"

Marliano looked at him, as if to discover whether he was not victimized; but the count's features were so calm that he hardly knew what to conjecture.

"If you really think so, my dear count," said Cellini, laughing, "I wonder at your passing whole nights over your books, as you are accustomed to do."

"Oh! as for me," rejoined the count, "I'm a poet, a madman! I love Plutarch, and am foolish enough to consider such words as liberty, country, as any thing but ridiculous. I am one of those who would not have every man's happiness or misery depend on the chance of birth. I dream of a world where recompenses would be awarded to the most worthy, honors to the most devoted, happiness to all; but I'm a madman, you know, whilst Signor Marliano is a gentleman."

All this had been said with so much calm, and with such a sameness of intonation, that it would have puzzled any one to guess the interlocutor's real meaning. Its irony was hidden, but was thereby rendered more poignant—you felt the goad without perceiving it. Marliano knew that he was attacked, and winced under his adversary's infliction; but he likewise knew that a quarrel would drive the marchioness to extremities, and he resolved to avoid it if possible; it was, therefore, with a mixture of anger and reserve that he answered—

"I cannot accept your excuses, count. I am satisfied with the world as it is, and leave to philosophers and philanthropists, as they style themselves, literary knight-errants, the care of remodelling it between their repasts, as they would a play or an opera."

"What can such a man as you have to do with philanthropists and philosophers?" exclaimed Alfieri. "Ah, sir, you are really disposed to show us too much indulgence. Nonsense!—men who wish to enlighten the human mind, the monsters!—who love their fellow-creatures, the fools! The clever men are those who profit by abuses instead of combating them, and ornament their avarice and hard-heartedness with the name of principle or political opinions; who grind down the poor to satisfy their habits of indolence and extravagance, and become wealthy on the miseries of others less privileged than themselves. Those are the persons who know how to live; them we should take for our models. Neither is it difficult, heaven knows, to lead a life of the exquisite of high life;—ruin your creditors, dishonor as many women as possible, kill a few of your most intimate friends in duel, and you will leave behind you the reputation of a most perfect gentleman."

Whilst Alfieri had been speaking, Marliano seemed devoured by an increasing irritation. At the last words pronounced by the count, he turned round suddenly; but, as if he wished to avoid a quarrel at any price, he advanced toward a chair on which he had left his hat, and took it up.

"Pardon me, signor," said Alfieri, "perhaps I have wounded your political opinions. I should really be very much grieved if you were obliged to leave the room on my account, although certainly very much flattered at your thus acknowledging yourself conquered."

Marliano threw down his hat. "I was never conquered by any body," said he, haughtily.

Alfieri bowed; a vague smile played on his lips. For a few moments the three persons present were silent. Cellini, embarrassed, hardly knew what his friend was aiming at, and the Genoese evidently seeking to avoid a rupture. He had approached the sideboard, and seemed to be inhaling the perfumes of some rare flowers in a crystal vase, when his eyes fell on a case of pistols, which Cellini had placed there on his return from the shooting-gallery. He opened the box, took out a pistol, which he examined carelessly, and approached the window.

"Are you satisfied with these arms?" asked he of Cellini.

"Very much so: they are of the manufactory of Cosimo."

"Will you allow me to try them?"

"Certainly."

Marliano looked out of the window. "You see that flower yonder," said he, pointing to a rose-bud, which was the only one left on the bush.

"Yes; but it's out of pistol-shot."

Marliano fired.

"Ah, signor?" exclaimed Cellini.

"The flower is down of course," said the count, who had remained at the other extremity of the apartment.

"You seem to jest, but it's a fact."

The count smiled; he saw that Marliano wanted to frighten him.

"By Jove, Signor Marliano," said Cellini, who was still looking at the flower, "if we ever fight, I should not feel inclined to choose pistols as the weapons."

"Why not?" exclaimed Alfieri; "on account of the flower?"

"No, no; on my own account."

"Dear me! who knows? it frequently happens that this extraordinary dexterity will disappear at the moment of danger."

Marliano made a movement.

"I do not say that for you, signor; but the most clever villain cannot always support the look of an honest man, and his conscience will sometimes make his hand tremble. Indeed there are many who only make a parade of their skill, in order to avoid a more dangerous struggle, and who volunteer a proof of their address to dispense with giving a proof of courage."

"Count!" exclaimed Marliano, springing toward Alfieri.

"Once more, I do not say that for you," quietly returned the latter.

"This assurance is useless," said Marliano, his lips trembling with rage. "I know that you dare not address such words to me. Poets are prudent; they only insult by allusions; they never provoke, except under cover of an eratic precaution; and when we are tired with their disguised insolence, they fail to be ignorant of its cause; in case of necessity, they might even invoke their bad health, and call themselves too ill to have any honor."

"You do not mean that for me either, I suppose," said the count, mildly.

"I leave you the judge of that, sir."

"Oh no," continued Alfieri; "for if such were the case, the Signor Marliano knows that I might demand satisfaction."

"Who hinders you from doing so?"

"You then recognize that I have the right to do it? You own that your insolence was directed toward me—that I am insulted?"

"Be it so."

Alfieri sprang toward the Genoese, and, seizing his hand, "I have the choice of arms, sir," exclaimed he.

"It matters not to me."

"We shall soon see." He ran to the sideboard, seized Cellini's pistols, and returning to Marliano—"Choose," said he.

"But one of the pistols is unloaded."

"The other will suffice for one of us."

"What!—do you want to fight?"

"Muzzle to muzzle; and God defend the right."

"It is impossible," exclaimed Marliano.

"Pardon me, signor, I am insulted; you have said it. I have the right to impose the conditions; you have said that too. You cannot refuse, unless you be a vile coward. The point of honor, which has served you so frequently, is against you now. You hoped that, like so many others of your victims, I should be fool enough to stand up to serve as a mark for your bullet or your sword, that you might cut me down as you did that flower, with a smile on your lips. But you were mistaken, Baron Rocca."

"Ah! you know my name, do you?"

"Yes, and think not that I will yield a single fraction of my advantages. I do not fight to make a parade of bravery or generosity, but to deliver the marchioness from your odious persecutions. I fight to kill you."

"Your hope may be deceived," exclaimed the baron, whose surprise was now turned into fury.

"I know it; but whatever be the issue of this combat, Bianca will have nothing more to fear from your tyranny. I have taken all my precautions; if I succumb, all Italy will know the cause of my death; I shall have bought with my blood the right of publishing your infamy; and I shall be believed, for the dead, it is known, never lie. I shall be pitied, for my very enemies will take care to exalt my glory. Your fatal celebrity will be affixed to mine as to a funeral pile, and you will be branded as a villain for having killed me. I shall have broken the yoke which you have imposed upon the marchioness. Placed under the safeguard of public opinion, she will have naught to fear from you, and will require no one to defend her, for you will have lost the privileges of a man of honor, and all will refuse to give you satisfaction."

"Enough! enough!" exclaimed the baron, who was now beside himself, "one of us must die. Follow me."

"I am ready, sir."

They directed their steps toward the door. Cellini stopped them. "One moment, gentlemen—you cannot fight without seconds, especially on such conditions; it is impossible."

"You shall be mine," said Alfieri: "the baron will get one."

"Meet me at the spring in an hour," said Marliano, going out.

When Alfieri was left alone, a sort of moral depression seized upon him. He passed over in his mind the events of his life; he thought of Bianca. Cellini's story had led him to believe that he was beloved, but was that sufficient now that he was about to engage in a combat in which his life was at stake? Was it love or pity that had actuated the marchioness? He was buried in these reflections when she entered the apartment with a book in her hand. On perceiving the count she stopped and blushed, but recovering her presence of mind, "I was with you, you see," said she, showing him the last volume he had published.

"Yes," replied he, "they are more beloved than the author himself. Before people know me, they seek for me in my works, they guess at me through the medium of my poetry; and when they come to find that I am a man like other men, they are astonished, and I fall down from the pinnacle upon which they had placed me. Even you, you love the poet, but you avoid the man: you like my works, Bianca, but you shun me."

The marchioness attempted to reply.

"O! do not deny it," continued Alfieri; "you shun me, and yet you appeared to comprehend me. For an instant I thought I had touched your heart. Then it was that I loved my glory, I was proud to think that I should share it with you. Ah! why did you snatch this delicious hope from me?"

The marchioness seemed affected—there was so much prayer in the count's voice, so much sensibility in his looks, that she remained as it were spell-bound beneath them; she wished to answer, but could only stammer out a few words without meaning.

"Bianca, I beseech you, speak to me—you know that I love you: do not envy me this happiness, perhaps the last I shall ever enjoy."

"What can you mean?"

"Who knows what may happen? you know the fate which has been predicted to me."

"O! banish all such gloomy forebodings."

"Well, supposing this prophecy were about to be realized—if I were to see you now for the last time—could you refuse a dying man a word which would make him happy? Ah! you tremble. Good God!—one word, only one—Bianca, do you love me?"

"Yes," replied the marchioness, bursting into tears, and hiding her face in her hands.

Alfieri uttered a cry of joy.

"It is then true!—She loves me!—Thanks, thanks—Bianca, dearest Bianca!"

"Ah! why did you force me to speak? if you but knew—"

"Nothing—I will hear nothing, except that you love me, weep not, fear not. Now let my destiny be accomplished."

The clock struck—the count shuddered.

"Adieu, Bianca," said he, pressing her to his bosom; "adieu!" And having disengaged himself from her arms, he rushed out of the room.

The marchioness remained motionless. A vague sensation of terror crept over her, as she thought of the misfortunes that would be the result of the confession which she had made. She then remembered the count's trouble, his precipitate flight; a horrible suspicion arose in her mind.

She ran to the garden—Alfieri was not there. She asked for Marliano—he was absent. Her heart beat as if it were ready to burst. She ran to the count's room, hardly knowing what she was about—it was empty. She rushed to the balcony. At this moment the report of a pistol was heard; she uttered a piercing cry, and tottered against the wall. Almost immediately Cellini appeared at the extremity of the garden, exclaiming—"A surgeon!"

Bianca felt the earth turn under her feet; she stretched out her arms for support, and tried to leave the window. Suddenly a noise was heard on the staircase; the door flew open—she uttered an exclamation of joy.

It was Alfieri!

THE AMERICAN NAVY.

We have been favored by a valued correspondent at Portsmouth, to whom we were indebted some time ago for a table of the armaments of all the vessels of war in the British navy, for the following interesting account of the dimensions and armaments of the various classes of ships in the American navy, derived from an official source. It has been the fashion of late, among writers on nautical subjects, to contrast our own ships of war with those of America, and to assign the superiority in point of dimension and armament to the vessels of the latter. We have, indeed, been ourselves misled by more than one of our correspondents into the publication of statements to this effect; and, as all honest and conscientious writers ought to do—profiting by the opportunity which the publication of the under-mentioned data affords us—we acknowledge with cheerfulness and alacrity our misapprehension. From the dimensions hereafter given, it will be seen that we are not only equal in most, but greatly superior in many points, and so far as our more recently constructed ships are concerned, more especially; every class of which are much finer than those of the same classes in the American navy, carrying heavier armaments with infinitely more convenient quarters, more space between decks, and guns much higher from the water.

The first-class line of battle ships, as Ohio, &c., are or were evidently designed from our 84's, Ganges class, with the addition of two feet more beam, thus considerably increasing their tonnage; but, either from some injudicious alterations or bad model, they have not proved the ships they ought to have been, carrying their lower deck midship ports only 5 feet 6 inches from the water, whereas our 84's carry theirs 6 feet 2 inches, and Vanguard 7 feet. The tonnage of these ships is 2,600, the same as our 92's, Rodney class, within a few tons; but their dimensions are the same as the 120's, and they carry their lower deck midships 7 feet from the water, and are evidently a superior description of ship to American two-deckers. The armament of the latter is very heavy, having 42-pounders on their lower decks, and carrying guns on their upper decks all through; making three entire tiers; perhaps their armament is too heavy—give our 62's guns in waist, and they would then mount 1000—but filling up the waist is a very questionable course, and one to which we decidedly object.

The second-class line-of-battle ships, of which there are but three, are fine vessels, about the size of our 80's, as Indus, Bellerophon, but with one foot more beam, making them about 100 tons larger. These ships also have guns all through on their upper decks, but from some cause (perhaps being over-weighted) carry their lower deck ports only 5 feet from the water, being 4 inches less than our old 74's, and 1 foot lower than the Bellerophon.

The first-class frigates are fine vessels, about the size of our razees, but with 2 feet less beam, and therefore inferior, also carrying their main-deck midship ports 1 foot 3 inches lower than our razees; these ships are all double banked, and have carronades on the upper deck. There are but two second-class frigates in the American navy; Macedonian, captured from us during the late war, and Constellation, one of their earliest; both these are rated 36's, carrying about 46 or 50 guns, and are about the size of our Blonde; both very inferior to the Pique and her class.

The first-class sloops of war of the United States are neither so large nor so powerful as our razees, such as the Magicienne, but they are larger than our other corvettes in point of armament and force. Again, they are vastly inferior as fighting vessels to our 26's, like the Vestal, which carry 11, 8 32's and two 68's. The American corvettes are, moreover, heavy sailers, and carry their midports 1 foot 4 inches lower than the Vestal and her class, so that their whole battery is exposed to a vast disadvantage. Indeed, our new 26s are superior to any foreign corvettes in the world.

The second-class of American corvettes are nearly similar to our Pearl and Tweed, of 20 guns. There is nothing between them and schooners. The Americans have no sloops of war brig-rigged—their small sloops carry 16 guns, but are ships.

The American schooners are very inferior in respect to our new 10-gun brigs, as Pantaloon, Rapid, &c., being upwards of 100 tons inferior in burthen, also in length and breadth, and their ports more than a foot lower in water; their height between decks also less by nearly two feet. They are, in fact, hardly equal to our old 10 gun brigs.

The first-class war steamers building will, doubtless, be noble vessels; very much larger than any we have, being 30 feet longer than the Cyclops, 4 feet more beam, and 600 tons more burthen; they will, doubtless, be very heavily armed, perhaps carrying 30 or 40 guns. These are the only two steamers the Americans have in their navy; but although in this branch we are far ahead of them, having at least 20 to their two, still we should at once lay down some five or six of an equal size. It is not a little odd that the dimensions of these two American war steamers are as nearly as possible the same as the steamer by Captain Hendrie, R. N. To conclude, we have nothing to fear from the Americans, come a contest when it may. With our ships properly armed and fully manned, we may defy them and the world.

MASTER HUMPHREY'S CLOCK.

PARTS XLIV & XLV.

CHAPTER LXXII.

When morning came, and they could speak more calmly on the subject of their grief, they heard how her life had closed.

She had been dead for two days. They were all about her at the time, knowing that the end was drawing on. She died soon after daybreak. They had read and talked to her in the earlier portion of the night, but as the hours crept on, she sank to sleep. They could tell, by what she faintly uttered in her dreams, that they were of her journeyings with the old man; they were of no painful scenes, but of those who had helped and used them kindly, for she often said "God bless you!" with great fervor. Waking, she never wandered in her mind but once, and that was of beautiful music which she said was in the air. God knows. It may have been.

Opening her eyes at last, from a very quiet sleep, she begged that they would kiss her once again. That done, she turned to the old man with a lovely smile upon her face—such, they said, as they had never seen, and never could forget—and clung with both her arms about his neck. They did not know that she was dead, at first.

She had spoken very often of the two sisters, who, she said, were like dear friends to her. She wished they could be told how much she thought about them, and how she had watched them as they walked together, by the river side at night. She would like to see poor Kit, she had often said of late. She wished there was somebody to take her love to Kit. And even then, she never thought or spoke about him, but with something of her old, clear, merry laugh.

For the rest, she had never murmured or complained; but, with a quiet mind, and manner quite unaltered—save that she every day became more earnest and more grateful to them—faded like the light upon a summer's evening.

The child who had been her little friend came there almost as soon as it was day, with an offering of dry flowers, which he begged them to lay upon her breast. It was he who had come to the window overnight and spoken to the sexton, and they saw in the snow traces of small feet, where he had been lingering near the room in which she lay before he went to bed. He had a fancy, it seemed, that they had left her there alone; and could not bear the thought.

He told them of his dream again, and that it was of her being restored to them, just as she used to be. He begged hard to see her, saying that he would be very quiet, and that they need not fear his being alarmed, for he had sat alone by his young brother all day long, when he was dead, and had felt glad to be so near him. They let him have his wish; and indeed he kept his word, and was in his childish way a lesson to them all.

Up to that time the old man had not spoken once—except to her—or stirred from the bedside. But when he saw her little favorite, he was moved as they had not seen him yet, and made as though he would have him come nearer. Then pointing to the bed, he burst into tears for the first time, and they who stood by, knowing that the sight of this child had done him good, left them alone together.

Seeing him with his artless talk of her, the child persuaded him to take some rest, to walk abroad, to do almost as he desired him. And when the day came on, which must remove her in her earthly shape from earthly eyes forever, he led him away, that he might not know when she was taken from him.

They were to gather fresh leaves and berries for her bed. It was Sunday—a bright, clear, wintry afternoon—and as they traversed the village street, those who were walking in their path drew back to make way for them, and gave them a softened greeting. Some shook the old man kindly by the hand, some stood uncovered while he tottered by, and many cried "God help him!" as he passed along.

"Neighbor!" said the old man, stopping at the cottage where his young guide's mother dwelt, "how is it that the folks are nearly all in black to-day? I have seen a mourning ribbon or a piece of crape on almost every one."

She could not tell, the woman said.

"You yourself—you wear the color too!" he cried. "Windows are closed that never used to be by day. What does this mean?"

Again the woman said she could not tell.

"We must go back," said the old man, hurriedly. "We must see what this is."

"No, no," cried the child, detaining him. "Remember what you promised. Our way is to the old green lane, where she and I so often were, and where you found us more than once making those garlands for her garden. Do not turn back!"

"Where is she now?" said the old man. "Tell me that?"

"Do you not know?" returned the child. "Did we not leave her, but just now?"

"True. True. It was her we left—was it?"

He pressed his hand upon his brow, looked vacantly round, as if impelled by a sudden thought, crossed the road, and entered the sexton's house. He and his deaf assistant were setting before the fire. Both rose up, on seeing who it was.

The child made a hasty sign to them with his hand. It was the action of an instant, but that, and the old man's look, were quite enough.

"Do you—do you bury any one to-day?" he said, eagerly.

"No, no! Who should we bury, sir?" returned the sexton.

"Aye, who indeed! I say with you, who indeed?"

"It is a holiday with us, good sir," returned the sexton, mildly. "We have no work to do to-day."

"Why, then, I'll go where you will," said the old man, turning to the child. "You're sure of what you tell me? You would not deceive me? I am changed even in the little time since you last saw me."

"Go thy ways with him, sir," cried the sexton, "and Heaven be with ye both!"

"I am quite ready," said the old man, meekly. "Come, boy, come—" and so submitted to be led away.

And now the bell—the bell she had often heard by night and day, and listened to with solemn pleasure almost as a living voice—rang its remorseless toll for her, so young, so beautiful, so good. Decrepit age, and vigorous life, and looming youth, and helpless infancy, poured forth—on crutches, in the pride of strength and health, in the full blush of promise, in the mere dawn of life—to gather round her tomb. Old men were there, whose eyes were dim and senses failing—grandmothers, who might have died ten years ago, and still been old—the deaf, the blind, the lame, the palsied, the living dead in many shapes and forms, to see the closing of that early grave. What was the death it would shut in, to that which still could crawl and creep above it!

Along the crowded path they bore her now; pure as the newly-fallen snow that covered it; whose day on earth had been as fleeting. Under that porch, where she had sat when Heaven in its mercy brought her to that peaceful spot, she passed again, and the old church received her in its quiet shade.

They carried her to one old nook, where she had many and many a time sat musing, and laid their burden softly on the pavement. The light streamed on it through the colored window—a window, where the boughs of trees were ever rustling in the summer, and where the birds sang sweetly all day long. With every breath of air that stirred among those branches in the sunshine, some trembling, changing light, would fall upon her grave.

Earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust. Many a young hand dropped in its little wreath, many a stifled sob was heard. Some—and they were not a few—knelt down. All were sincere and truthful in their sorrow.

The service done, the mourners stood apart, and the villagers closed round to look into the grave before the pavement stone should be replaced. One called to mind how he had seen her sitting on that very spot, and how her book had fallen on her lap, and she was gazing with a pensive face upon the sky. Another told, how he had wondered much that one so delicate as she should be so bold; how she had never feared to enter the church alone at night, but had loved to linger there when all was quiet; and even to climb the tower stair, with no more light than that of the moon rays stealing through the loop-holes in the thick old wall. A whisper went about among the oldest there, that she had seen and talked with angels; and when they called to mind how she had looked, and spoken, and her early death, some thought it might be so, indeed. Thus, coming to the grave in little knots, and glancing down, and giving place to others, and falling off in whispering groups of three or four, the church was cleared in time of all but the sexton and the mourning friends.

They saw the vault covered and the stone fixed down. Then, when the dusk of evening had come on, and not a sound disturbed the sacred stillness of the place—when the bright moon poured in her light on tomb and monument, on pillar, wall and arch, and most of all (it seemed to them) upon her quiet grave—in that calm time, when all outward things and inward thoughts seem with assurances of immortality, and worldly hopes and fears are humbled in the dust before them—then, with tranquil and submissive hearts they turned away, and left the child with God.

Oh! it is hard to take to heart the lesson that such deaths will teach, but let no man reject it, for it is one that all must learn, and is a mighty, universal truth. When death strikes down the innocent and young, for every fragile form from which he lets the panting spirit free, a hundred virtues rise, in shapes of mercy, charity and love, to walk the world, and bless it. Of every tear that sorrowing mortals shed on such green graves, some good is born, some gentler nature comes. In the Destroyer's steps there spring up bright creations that defy his power, and his dark path becomes a way of light to Heaven.

It was late when the old man came home. The boy had led him to his own dwelling, under some pretence, on their way back; and, rendered drowsy by his long ramble and late want of rest, he had sunk into a deep sleep by the fire-side. He was perfectly exhausted, and they were careful not to rouse him. The slumber held him a long time, and when he at length awoke the moon was shining.

The younger brother, uneasy at his protracted absence, was watching at the door for his coming, when he appeared at the pathway with his little guide. He advanced to meet them, and tenderly obliging the old man to lean upon his arm, conducted him with slow and trembling steps toward the house.

He repaired to her chamber, straight. Not finding what he had left there, he returned with distracted looks to the room in which they were assembled. From that, he rushed to the schoolmaster's cottage, calling her name. They followed close upon him, and when he had vainly searched it, brought him home.

With such persuasive words as pity and affection could suggest, they prevailed upon him to sit among them and hear what they should tell him. Then, endeavoring by every little artifice to prepare his mind for what must come, and dwelling with many fervent words upon the happy lot to which she had been removed, they told him, at last, the truth. The moment it had passed their lips, he fell down among them like a murdered man.

For many hours, they had little hope of his surviving; but grief is strong, and he recovered.

If there be any who have never known the blank that follows death—the weary void—the sense of desolation that will come upon the strongest minds, when something familiar and beloved is missed at every turn—the connexion between inanimate and senseless things and the object of recollection, when every household god becomes a monument and every room a grave—if there be any who have not known this, and proved it by their own experience, they can never faintly guess how, for many days, the old man pined and moped away the time, and wandered here and there as seeking something, and had no comfort.

Whatever power of thought or memory he retained, was all bound up in her. He never understood, or seemed to care to understand, about his brother. To every endearment and attention he continued listless. If they spoke to him on this, or any other theme—save one—he would hear them patiently for a while, then turn away, and go on seeking as before.

On that one theme, which was in his, and all their minds, it was impossible to touch. Dead! He could not hear or bear the word. The slightest hint of it would throw him into a paroxysm, like that he had had when it was first spoken. In what hope he lived, no man could tell; but that he had some hope of finding her again—some faint and shadowy hope, deferred from day to day, and making him from day to day more sick and sore at heart—was plain to all.

They bethought them of a removal from the scene of this last sorrow; of trying whether change of place would rouse or cheer him. His brother sought the advice of those who were accounted skilful in such matters, and they came and saw him. Some of the number staid upon the spot, conversed with him when he would converse, and watched him as he wandered up and down, alone and silent. Move him where they might, they said, he would ever seek to get back there. His mind would run upon that spot. If they confined him closely, and kept a strict guard upon him, they might hold him prisoner, but if he could by any means escape, he would surely wander back to that place, or die upon the road.

The boy, to whom he had submitted at first, had no longer any influence with him. At times he would suffer the child to walk by his side, or would even take such notice of his presence as giving him his hand, or would stoop to kiss his cheek, or pat him on the head. At other times, he would entreat him—not unkindly—to be gone, and would not brook him near. But whether alone, or with this pliant friend, or with those who would have given him, at any cost or sacrifice, some consolation or some peace of mind, if happily the means could have been devised, he was at all times the same—with no love or care for anything in life, a broken-hearted man.

At length they found one day that he had risen early, and, with his knapsack on his back, his staff in hand, his own straw hat, and little basket full of such things as she had been used to carry, was gone. As they were making ready to pursue him far and wide, a frightened schoolboy came, who had seen him, but a moment before, sitting in the church—upon her grave, he said.

They hastened there, and going softly to the door, espied him in the attitude of one who waited patiently. They did not disturb him then, but kept a watch upon him all that day. When it grew quite dark, he rose and returned home, and went to bed, murmuring to himself, "She will come to-morrow!"

Upon the morrow he was there again from sunrise until night; and still at night he laid himself down to rest, and muttered, "She will come to-morrow!"

And thenceforth every day, and all day long, he waited at her grave for her. How many pictures of new journeys over pleasant country, of resting-places under the free, broad sky, of rambles in the fields and woods, and paths not often trod—how many tones of that one well-remembered voice—how many glimpses of the form, the fluttering dress, the hair that waved so gaily in the wind—how many visions of what had been, and what he hoped was yet to be—rose up before him, in the old, dull, silent church! He never told them what he thought, or where he went. He would sit with them at night, pondering with a secret satisfaction, they could see, upon the flight that he and she would take before night came again; and still they would hear him whisper in his prayers, "Oh! Let her come to-morrow!"

The last time was on a genial day in spring. He did not return at the usual hour, and they went to seek him. He was lying dead upon the stone.

They laid him by the side of her whom he loved so well; and, in the church where they had so often prayed and mused, and lingered hand in hand, the child and the old man slept together.

CHAPTER THE LAST.

The magic reel, which, rolling on before, has led the chronicler thus far, now slackens in its pace, and stops. It lies before the goal; the pursuit is at an end.

It remains but to dismiss the leaders of the little crowd who have borne us company upon the road, and so to close the journey.

Foremost among them, smooth Sampson Brass and Sally, arm in arm, claim our polite attention.

Mr. Sampson, then, being detained, as already has been shown, by the justice upon whom he called, and being so strongly pressed to protract his stay that he could by no means refuse, remained under his protection for a considerable time, during which the attention of his great entertainer kept him so extremely close, that he was quite lost to society, and never even went abroad for exercise.

saving into a small paved yard. So well, indeed, was his modest and retiring temper understood by those with whom he had to deal, and so jealous were they of his absence, that they required a kind of friendly bond to be entered into by two substantial housekeepers, in the sum of fifteen hundred pounds a-piece, before they would suffer him to quit their hospitable roof—doubting, it appeared, that he would return, if once let loose, on any other terms. Mr. Brass, struck with the humor of this jest, and carrying out its spirit to the utmost, sought from his wide connexion a pair of friends whose joint possessions fell some halfpence short of fifteen pence, and proffered them as bail—for that was the merry word agreed upon on both sides. These gentlemen being rejected after twenty-four hours' pleasantness, Mr. Brass consented to remain, and did remain, until a club of choice spirits called a Grand Jury (who were in the joke) summoned him to a trial before twelve other wags for perjury and fraud, who in their turn found him guilty with a most facetious joy,—nay, the very populace entered into the whim, and when Mr. Brass was moving in a hackney-coach toward the building where these wags assembled, saluted him with rotten eggs and carcasses of kittens, and feigned to wish to tear him into shreds, which greatly increased the comicality of the thing, and made him relish it the more, no doubt.

To work this sportive vein still further, Mr. Brass, by his counsel, moved in arrest of judgement that he had been led to criminate himself, by assurances of safety and promises of pardon, and claimed the leniency which the law extends to such confiding natures as are thus deluded. After solemn argument, this point (with others of a technical nature, whose humorous extravagance it would be difficult to exaggerate) was referred to the judges for their decision, Sampson being meantime removed to his former quarters. Finally, some of the points were given in Sampson's favor, and some against him; and the upshot was that, instead of being desired to travel for a time in foreign parts, he was permitted to grace the mother country under certain insignificant restrictions.

These were, that he should, for a term of years, reside in a spacious mansion where several other gentlemen were lodged and boarded at the public charge, who went clad in a sober uniform of grey turned up with yellow, had their hair cut extremely short, and principally lived on gruel and light soup. It was also required of him that he should partake their exercise of constantly ascending an endless flight of stairs; and lest his legs, unused to such exertion, should be weakened by it, that he should wear upon one ankle an amulet or charm of iron. These conditions being arranged, he was removed one evening to his new abode, and enjoyed, in common with nine other gentlemen and two ladies, the privilege of being taken to this place of retirement in one of Royalty's own carriages.

Over and above these trifling penalties, his name was erased and blotted out from the roll of attorneys; which erasure has been always held in these latter times to be a great degradation and reproach, and to imply the commission of some amazing villany—as indeed would seem to be the case, when so many worthless names remain among its better records, unmolested.

Of Sally Brass, conflicting rumors went abroad. Some said with confidence that she had gone down to the docks in male attire, and had become a female sailor; others darkly whispered that she had enlisted as a private in the second regiment of Foot Guards, and had been seen in uniform and on duty, to wit, leaning on her musket and looking out of a sentry-box in St. James's Park, one evening. There were many such whispers as these in circulation; but the truth appears to be that, after a lapse of some five years (during which there is no direct evidence of her having been seen at all), two wretched people were more than once observed to crawl at dusk from the inmost recesses of St. Giles's, and to take their way along the streets, with shuffling steps and cowering, shivering forms, looking into the roads and kennels as they went in search of refuse food or disregarded offal. These forms were never beheld but into those nights of gloom, when the terrible spectres, who lie at all other times in the obscene hiding-places of London, in archways, dark vaults and cellars, venture to creep in the streets; the embodied spirits of Disease, and Vice, and Famine. It was whispered by those who should have known, that these were Sampson and his sister Sally; and to this day, it is said, they sometimes pass, on bad nights, in the same loathsome guise, close at the elbow of the shrinking passenger.

The body of Quilp being found—though not until some days had elapsed—an inquest was held on it near the spot where it had been washed ashore. The general supposition was that he had committed suicide, and this appearing to be favored by all the circumstances of his death, the verdict was to that effect. He was left to be buried with a stake through his heart in the centre of four lonely roads.

It was rumored afterward that this horrible and barbarous ceremony had been dispensed with, and that the remains had been secretly given up to Tom Scott. But even here, opinion was divided; for some said that Tom had dug them up at midnight, and carried them to a place indicated to him by the widow. It is probable that both these stories may have had their origin in the simple fact of Tom's shedding tears upon the inquest—which he certainly did, extraordinary as it may appear. He manifested, beside, a strong desire to assault the jury; and being restrained and conducted out of court, darkened its only window by standing on his head upon the sill, until he was dexterously tilted upon his feet again by a cautious beadle.

Being cast upon the world by his master's death, he determined to go through it upon his head and hands, and accordingly began to tumble for his bread. Finding, however, his English birth an insurmountable obstacle to his advancement in this pursuit (notwithstanding that his art was in high repute and favor,) he assumed the name of an Italian image lad, with whom he had become acquainted; and afterward tumbled with extraordinary success, and to overflowing audiences.

Little Mrs. Quilp never forgave herself the one deceit that lay so heavy on her conscience, and never spoke or thought of it but with bitter tears. Her husband had no relations, and she was rich. He had made no will, or she would probably have been poor. Having married the first time at her mother's instigation, she consulted in her second choice nobody but herself. It fell upon a smart young fellow enough; and as he made it a preliminary condition that Mrs. Jiniwin should be thenceforth an out-pensioner, they lived together after marriage with no more than the average amount of quarrelling, and led a merry life upon the dead dwarf's money.

Mr. and Mrs. Garland, and Mr. Abel, went on as usual, (except that there was a change in their household, as will be seen presently,) and in due time the latter went into partnership with his friend the notary, on which occasion there was a dinner, and a ball, and great extent of dissipation. Unto this ball there happened to be invited the most bashful young lady that was ever seen, with whom Mr. Abel happened to fall in love. How it happened, or how they found it out, or which of them first communicated the discovery to the other, nobody knows. But certain it is, that in the course of time they were married; and equally certain it is that they were the happiest of the happy; and no less certain it is that they reared a family; because any propagation of goodness and benevolence is no small addition to the aristocracy of nature, and no small subject of rejoicing for mankind at large.

The pony preserved his character for independence and principle down to the last moment of his life; which was an unusually long one, and caused him to be looked upon, indeed, as the very Old Parr of ponies. He often went to and fro with the little phaeton between Mr. Garland's and his son's, and, as the old people and the young were frequently together, had a stable of his own at the new establishment, into which he would walk of himself with surprising dignity. He condescended to play with the children, as they grew old enough to cultivate his friendship, and would run up and down the little paddock with them like a dog; but though he relaxed so far, and allowed them such small freedoms as caresses, or even to look at his shoes, or hang on by his tail, he never permitted any one among them to mount his back or drive him; thus showing that even their familiarity must have its limits, and that there were points between far too serious for trifling.

He was not unsusceptible of warm attachments in his latter life; for when the good bachelor came to live with Mr. Garland, upon the clergyman's decease, he conceived a great friendship for him, and amiably submitted to be driven by his hands without the least resistance. He did not work for two or three years before he died, but lived in clover; and his last act (like a choleric old gentleman) was to kick his doctor.

Mr. Swiveller, recovering very slowly from his illness, and entering into the receipt of his annuity, bought for the Marchioness a handsome stock of clothes, and put her to school forthwith, in redemption of the vow he had made upon his fevered bed. After casting about for some time for a name which should be worthy of her, he decided in favor of Sophronia Sphynx, as being euphonious and genteel, and furthermore indicative of mystery. Under this title the Marchioness repaired, in tears, to the school of his selection, from which, as she soon distanced all competitors, she was removed before the lapse of many quarters to one of a higher grade. It is but bare justice to Mr. Swiveller to say, that, although the expenses of her education kept him in straitened circumstances for half a dozen years, he never slackened in his zeal, and always held himself sufficiently repaid by the accounts he heard (with great gravity) of her advancement, on his monthly visits to the governors, who looked upon him as a literary gentleman of eccentric habits, and of a most prodigious talent in quotation.

In a word, Mr. Swiveller kept the Marchioness at this establishment until she was, at a moderate guess, full nineteen years of age—good-looking, clever, and good-humored; when he began to consider seriously what was to be done next. On one of his periodical visits, while he was revolving this question in his mind, the Marchioness came down to him, alone, looking more smiling and more fresh than ever. Then it occurred to him, but not for the first time, that if she would marry him, how comfortable they might be! So Richard asked her; whatever she said, it was not no; and they were married in good earnest that day week, which gave Mr. Swiveller frequent occasion to remark, at divers subsequent periods, that there had been a young lady saving up for him after all.

A little cottage at Hampstead being to let, which had in its garden a smoking-box, the envy of the civilized world, they agreed to become its tenants; and when the honeymoon was over, entered upon its occupation. To this retreat Mr. Chuckster repaired regularly every Sunday to spend the day—usually beginning with breakfast; and here he was the great purveyor of general news and fashionable intelligence. For some years he continued a deadly foe to Kit, protesting that he had a better opinion of him when he was supposed to have stolen the five-pound note, than when he was shown to be perfectly free of the crime; inasmuch as his guilt would have had in it something daring and bold, whereas his innocence was but another proof of a sneaking and crafty disposition. By slow degrees, however, he was reconciled to him in the end; and even went so far as to honor him with his patronage, as one who had in some measure reformed, and was therefore to be forgiven. But he never forgot or pardoned that circumstance of the shilling; holding that if he had come back to get another he would have done well enough, but that his returning to work out the former gift was a stain upon his moral character which no penitence or contrition could ever wash away.

Mr. Swiveller, having always been in some measure of a philosophic and reflective turn, grew immensely contemplative, at times, in the smoking-box, and was accustomed, at such periods, to debate in his own mind the mysterious question of Sophronia's parentage. Sophronia herself supposed she was an orphan; but Mr. Swiveller, putting various slight circumstances together, often thought Miss Brass must know better than that; and having heard from his wife of her strange interview with Quilp, entertained sundry misgivings whether that person, in his life time, might not also have been able to solve the riddle, had he chosen. These speculations, however, gave him no uneasiness; for Sophronia was ever a most cheerful, affectionate, and provident wife to him; and Dick (excepting for an occasional outbreak with Mr. Chuckster, which she had the good sense rather to encourage than oppose) was to her an attached and domesticated husband. And they played many hundred thousand games of cribbage together. And let it be added, to Dick's honor, that, though we have called her So-phronia, he called her the Marchioness from first to last; and that upon every anniversary of the day on which he found her in his sick room, Mr. Chuckster came to dinner, and there was great glorification.

The gamblers, Isaac List and Jowl, with their trusty confederate, Mr. James Groves, of unimpeachable memory, pursued their course with varying success, until the failure of a spirited enterprise in the way of their profession, dispersed them in different directions, and caused their career to receive a sudden check from the long and strong arm of the law. This defeat had its origin in the untoward detection of a new associate—young Frederick Trent—who thus became the unconscious instrument of their punishment and his own.

For the young man himself, he rioted abroad for a brief term, living by his wits—which means by the abuse of every faculty that, worthily employed, raises man above the beasts, and so degraded, sinks him far below them. It was not long before his body was recognised by a stranger, who chanced to visit that hospital in Paris where the drowned are laid out to be owned; despite the bruises and disfigurements which were said to have been occasioned by some previous scuffle. But the stranger kept his own counsel until he returned home, and it was never claimed or cared for.

The younger brother, or the single gentleman, for that designation is more familiar, would have drawn the poor schoolmaster from his lone retreat, and made him his companion and friend. But the humble village teacher was timid of venturing into the noisy world, and had become fond of his dwelling in the old churchyard. Calmly happy in his school, and in the spot, and in the attachment of Her little mourner, he pursued his quiet course in peace; and was, through the righteous gratitude of his friend—let this brief mention suffice for that—a poor schoolmaster no more.

That friend—single gentleman, or younger brother, which you will—had at his heart a heavy sorrow; but it bred in him no misanthropy or monastic gloom. He went forth into the world, a lover of his kind. For a long, long time, it was his chief delight to travel in the steps of the old man and the child, (so far as he could trace them from her last narrative,) to halt where they had halted, sympathise where they had suffered, and rejoiced where they had been made glad. Those who had been kind to them, did not escape his search. The sisters at the school—those who were her friends, because themselves so friendless—Mrs. Jarley of the wax-work, Codlin, Short—he found them all; and trust me that the man who fed the furnace fire was not forgotten.

Kit's story having got abroad, raised him up a host of friends, and many offers of provision for his future life. He had no idea at first of ever quitting Mr. Garland's service; but, after serious remonstrance and advice from that gentleman, began to contemplate the possibility of such a change being brought about in time. A good post was procured for him, with a rapidity which took away his breath, by some of the gentlemen who had believed him guilty of the offence laid to his charge, and who had acted upon that belief. Through the same kind agency, his mother was secured from want, and made quite happy. Thus, as Kit often said, his great misfortune turned out to be the source of all his subsequent prosperity.

Did Kit live a single man all his days, or did he marry? Of course he married, and who should be his wife but Barbara? And the best of it was, he married so soon that little Jacob was an uncle, before the calves of his legs, already mentioned in this history, had ever been encased in broadcloth pantaloons—though that was not quite the best either, for of necessity the baby was an uncle too. The delight of Kit's mother and of Barbara's mother upon the great occasion is past all telling; finding they agreed so well on that, and on all other subjects, they took up their abode together, and were a most harmonious pair of friends from that time forth. And had n't Astley's cause to bless itself for their all going together once a quarter—to the pit—and did n't Kit's mother always say, when they painted the outside, that Kit's last treat had helped to that, and wonder what the manager would feel if he but knew it as they passed his house!

When Kit had children six and seven years old, there was a Barbara among them, and a pretty Barbara she was. Nor was there wanting an exact fac-simile and copy of little Jacob as he appeared in those remote times when they taught him what oysters meant. Of course there was an Abel, own godson to the Mr. Garland of that name; and there was a Dick, whom Mr. Swiveller did especially favor. The little group would often gather round him of a night and beg him to tell again that story of good Miss Nell who died. This Kit would do; and when they cried to hear it, wishing it longer too, he would teach them how she had gone to Heaven, as all good people did; and how, if they were good like her, they might hope to be there too one day, and to see and know her as he had done when he was quite a boy. Then he would relate to them how needy he used to be, and how she had taught him what he was otherwise too poor to learn, and how the old man had been used to say "she always laughs at Kit;" at which they would brush away their tears, and laugh themselves to think that she had done so, and be again quite merry.

He sometimes took them to the street where she had lived; but new improvements had altered it so much, it was not like the same. The old house had been long ago pulled down, and a fine broad road was in its place. At first he would draw with his stick a square upon the ground to show them where it used to stand. But he soon became uncertain of the spot, and could only say it was thereabouts, he thought, and that these alterations were confusing.

Such are the changes which a few years bring about, and so do things pass away, like a tale that is told!

END OF "THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP."

MASTER HUMPHREY FROM HIS CLOCK-SIDE IN THE CHIMNEY-CORNER.

I was musing the other evening upon the characters and incidents with which I had been so long engaged; wondering how I could ever have looked forward with pleasure to the completion of my tale, and reproaching myself for having done so, as if it were a kind of cruelty to those companions of my solitude whom I had now dismissed, and could never again recall; when my clock struck ten. Punctual to the hour, my friends appeared.

On our last night of meeting, we had finished the story which the reader has just concluded. Our conversation took the same current as the meditations which the entrance of my friends had interrupted, and the Old Curiosity Shop was the staple of our discourse.

I may confide to the reader now, that in connection with this little history I had something upon my mind—something to communicate which I had all along with difficulty repressed—something I had deemed it, during the progress of the story, necessary to its interest to disclose, and which, now that it was over, I wished, and was yet reluctant to disclose.

To conceal anything from those to whom I am attached, is not in my nature. I can never close my lips where I have opened my heart. This temper and the consciousness of having done some violence to it in my narrative, laid me under a restraint which I should have had great difficulty in overcoming, but for a timely remark from Mr. Miles, who, as I hinted in a former paper, is a gentleman of business habits, and of great exactness and propriety in all his transactions.

"I could have wished," my friend objected; "that we had been made acquainted with the single gentleman's name. I don't like his withholding his name. It made me look upon him at first with suspicion, and caused me to doubt his moral character, I assure you. I am fully satisfied by this time of his being a worthy creature, but in this respect he certainly would not appear to have acted at all like a man of business."

"My friends," said I, drawing to the table at which they were by this time seated in their usual chairs, "do you remember that story bore another title beside that one we have so often heard of late?"

Mr. Miles had his pocket-book out in an instant, and referring to an entry therein, rejoined "Certainly. Personal adventures of Master Humphrey. Here it is. I made a note of it at the time."

I was about to resume what I had to tell them, when the same Mr. Miles again interrupted me, observing that the narrative originated in a personal adventure of my own, and that was no doubt the reason for its being thus designated.

This led me to the point at once.

"You will one and all forgive me," I returned, "if, for the greater convenience of the story, and for its better introduction, that adventure was fictitious. I had my share indeed—no light or trivial one—in the pages we have read, but it was not the share I feigned to have at first. The younger brother, the single gentleman, the nameless actor in this little drama, stands before you now."

It was easy to see they had not expected this disclosure.

"Yes," I pursued. "I can look back upon my part in it with a calm, half-smiling pity for myself as for some other man. But I am he indeed; and now the chief sorrows of my life are yours."

I need not say what true gratification I derived from the sympathy and kindness with which this acknowledgment was received; nor how often it had risen to my lips before; nor how difficult I had found it—how impossible, when I came to those passages which touched me most, and most nearly concerned me—to sustain the character I had assumed. It is enough to say that I replaced in the clock-case the record of so many trials—sorrowfully, it is true, but with a softened sorrow which was almost pleasure; and felt that in living through the past again, and communicating to others the lesson it had helped to teach me, I had been a happier man.

We lingered so long over the leaves from which I had read, that as I consigned them to their former resting-place, the hand of my trusty clock pointed to twelve, and there came toward us upon the wind the voice of the deep and distant bell of St. Paul's as it struck the hour of midnight.

"This," said I, returning with a manuscript I had taken, at the moment, from the same repository, "to be opened to such music, should be a tale where London's face by night is darkly seen, and where some deed of such a time as this is dimly shadowed out. Which of us here has seen the working of that great machine whose voice has just now ceased?"

Mr. Pickwick had, of course, and so had Mr. Miles. Jack and my deaf friend were in the minority.

I had seen it but a few days before, and could not help telling them of the fancy I had had about it.

I paid my fee of twopence upon entering, to one of the money-changers who sit within the Temple; and falling, after a few turns up and down, into the quiet train of thought which such a place awakens, paced the echoing stones like some old monk whose present world lay all within its walls. As I looked afar up into the lofty dome, I could not help wondering what were his reflections whose genius reared that mighty pile, when the last small wedge of timber fixed, the last nail driven into its home for many centuries, the clang of hammers, and the hum of busy voices, gone, and the Great Silence whole years of noise had helped to make, reigning undisturbed around, he mused as I did now, upon his work, and lost himself amid its vast extent. I could not quite determine whether the contemplation of it would impress him with a sense of greatness or of insignificance; but when I remembered how long a time it had taken to erect, in how short a space it might be traversed even to its remotest parts, for how brief a term he, or any of those who cared to bear his name, would live to see it, or know of its existence, I imagined him far more melancholy than proud, and looking with regret upon his labor done. With these thoughts in my mind, I began to ascend, almost unconsciously, the flight of steps leading to the several wonders of the building, and found myself before a barrier where another money-taker sat, who demanded which among them I would choose to see. There were the stone-gallery, he said, and the whispering gallery, the geometrical staircase, the room of models, the clock—the clock being quite in my way, I stopped him there, and chose that sight from all the rest.

I groped my way into the Turret which it occupies, and saw before me, in a kind of loft, what seemed to be a great, old, oaken press with folding doors. These being thrown back by the attendant (who was sleeping when I came upon him, and looked a drowsy fellow, as though his close companionship with Time had made him quite indifferent to it) disclosed a complicated crowd of wheels and chains in iron and brass—great, sturdy, rattling engines—suggestive of breaking a finger put in here or there, and grinding the bone to powder—and these were the Clock! Its very pulse, if I may use the word, was like no other clock. It did not mark the flight of every moment with a gentle second stroke as though it would check old Time, and have him stay his pace in pity, but measured it with one sledge-hammer beat, as if its business were to crush the seconds as they came trooping on, and remorselessly to clear a path before the Day of Judgement.

I sat down opposite to it, and hearing its regular and never-changing voice, that one deep, constant note, uppermost amongst all the noise and clatter in the streets below—marking that, let that tumult rise or fall, go on or stop—let it be night or noon, to-morrow or to-day, this year or next—it still performed its functions with the same dull constancy, and regulated the progress of the life around, the fancy came upon me that this was London's Heart, and that when it should cease to beat, the City would be no more.

It is night. Calm and unmoved amidst the scenes that darkness favors, the great heart of London throbs in its Giant breast. Wealth and beggary, vice and virtue, guilt and innocence, repletion and the direst hunger, all treading on each other and crowding together, are gathered round it. Draw but a little circle above the clustering house-tops, and you shall have within its space, everything with its opposite extreme and contradiction, close beside. Where yonder feeble light is shining, a man is but this moment dead. The taper at a few yards' distance, is seen by eyes that have this instant opened on the world. There are two houses separated by but an inch or two of wall. In one, there are quiet minds at rest; in the other a waking conscience that one might think would trouble the very air. In that close corner where the roofs shrink down and cower together as if to hide their secrets from the handsome street hard by, there are such dark crimes, such miseries and horrors, as could be hardly told in whispers. In the handsome street, there are folks asleep who have dwelt there all their lives, and have no more knowledge of these things than if they had never been, or were transacted at the remotest limits of the world—who, if they were hinted at, would shake their heads, look wise, and frown, and say they were impossible, and out of Nature—as if all great tows were net. Does not this Heart of London, that nothing moves, nor stops, nor quickens—that goes on the same, let what will be done—does it not express the city's character well?

The day begins to break, and soon there is the hum and noise of life. Those who have spent the night on door-steps and cold stones, crawl off to bed; they who have slept in beds, come forth to their occupation too, and business is astir. The fog of sleep rolls slowly off, and London shines awake. The streets are filled with carriages, and people gaily clad. The jails are full too, to the threat, nor have the workhouses or hospitals much room to spare. The courts of law are crowded. Taverns have their regular frequenters by this time, and every mart of traffic has its throng. Each of these places is a world, and has its own inhabitants; each is distinct from, and almost unconscious of the existence of any other. There are some people well to do, who remember to have heard it said, that numbers of men and women—thousands they think it was—get up in London every day, unknowing where to lay their heads at night; and that there are quarters of the town where misery and famine always are. They don't believe it quite—there may be some truth in it, but it is exaggerated of course. So, each of these thousand worlds goes on, intent upon itself, until night comes again—first with its lights and pleasures, and its cheerful streets; then with its guilt and darkness.

Heart of London, there is a moral in thy every stroke! As I look on at thy indomitable working, which neither death, nor press of life, nor grief, nor gladness out of doors will influence one jot, I seem to hear a voice within thee which sinks into my heart, bidding me, as I elbow my way among the crowd, have some thought for the meanest wretch that passes, and, being a man, to turn away with scorn and pride from none that bear the human shape.

I am by no means sure that I might not have been tempted to enlarge upon this subject, had not the papers that lay before me on the table, been a silent reproach for even this digression. I took them up again when I had got thus far, and seriously prepared to read.

The hand-writing was strange to me, for the manuscript had been fairly copied. As it is against our rules in such a case to inquire into the authorship until the reading is concluded, I could only glance at the different faces round me, in search of some expression which should betray the writer. Whoever he might be, he was prepared for this, and gave no sign for my enlightenment.

I had the papers in my hand, when my deaf friend interposed with a suggestion.

"It has occurred to me," he said, "bearing in mind your sequel to the tale we have finished, that if such of us as have anything to relate of our own lives, could interweave it with our contribution to the Clock, it would be well to do so. This need be no restraint upon us, either as to time, or place, or incident, since any real passage of this kind may be surrounded by fictitious circumstances, and represented by fictitious characters. What if we made this, an article of agreement among ourselves?"

This proposition was cordially received, but the difficulty appeared to be that here was a long story written before we had thought of it.

"Unless," said I, "it should have happened that the writer of this tale—which is not impossible, for men are apt to do so when they write—has actually mingled with it something of his own endurance and experience."

Nobody spoke, but I thought I detected in one quarter that this was really the case.

"If I have no assurance to the contrary," I added, therefore, "I shall take it for granted that he has done so, and that even these papers come within our new agreement. Everybody being mute, we hold that understanding if you please."

And here I was about to begin again, when Jack informed us softly, that during the progress of our last narrative, Mr. Weller's Watch had adjourned its sittings from the kitchen, and regularly met outside our door, where he had no doubt that august body would be found at the present moment. As this was for the convenience of listening to our stories, he submitted that they might be suffered to come in, and hear them more pleasantly.

To this we one and all yielded a ready assent, and the party being discovered as Jack had supposed, and invited to walk in, entered (though not without great confusion at having been detected) and were accommodated with chairs at a little distance.

Then, the lamp being trimmed, the fire well-stirred and burning brightly, the hearth clean swept, the curtains closely drawn, the clock wound up, we entered on our new story—BARNET RUDGE.

IN EARTH'S LONELY DESERT.

SWISS AIR, 'RANS DES VACHES.'

BY MRS. CRAWFORD.

In Earth's lonely desert,
In regions above,
To mortals and angels
There's nothing like love;
It brightens the landscape
Wherever we go,
And beams like a star
On our pathway of woe.

When the myrtles of love
Breathe their odors around,
The music of hope
Gives to silence a sound.
Oh! dear is the spot
Where our glances first met;
There sorrow will linger,
Though joy may forget.

All melody breathing,
All sunshine and bloom,
Love sings to our cradle,
And garlands our tomb.
Far away, far away,
Where the bright planets roll,
Oh! there is Love's home,
In the land of the soul.

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

Mr. Titmouse had laid aside his cigar, in compliment to Miss Quirk, who had a long, black veil on, and an elegant light shawl, and looked uncommonly like a young bride setting off—oh, Heavens! that it had been so!—on her wedding excursion. Mr. Gammon slouched his hat over his eyes, and inclined his head downward, fit to expire with vexation and disgust, as he observed the grin and titling of the crowd around; but Titmouse, who was most splendidly dressed, took off his hat on sitting down, and bowed several times to, as he supposed, the admiring crowd.

"Get on, boys!" growled Mr. Gammon; and away they went, exciting equal surprise and applause wherever they went. No one that met them but must have taken Titmouse and Miss Quirk for a newly-married couple—probably the son or daughter of one of the sheriffs, who had least the state carriage to add éclat to the interesting occasion.

With the exception of the sensation produced at every place where they changed horses, the only incident worth noting that occurred during their journey, was at the third stage from London. As they came dashing up to the door of the inn, their advent setting all the bells of the establishment ringing, and waiters and ostlers scampering up to them like mad, they beheld a plain and laden dusty travelling-carriage, waiting for horses—and Gammon quickly perceived it to be the carriage of the unfortunate Aubreys! The travellers had alighted. The graceful figure of Miss Aubrey, her face pale, and wearing an expression of manifest anxiety and fatigue, was standing near the door, talking kindly to a beggar-woman, with a cluster of half-naked children around her; while little Aubrey was romping about with Miss Aubrey's beautiful little spaniel, Cato; Agnes, looking on and laughing merrily, and trying to escape from the hand of her attendant. Mr. and Mrs. Aubrey were talking together, close beside the carriage-door. Gammon observed all this, and particularly that Mr. Aubrey was scrutinizing their appearance, with a sort of half-smile on his countenance, melancholy as it was.

"Horses on!" said Gammon, leaning back in the carriage.

"That's a monstrous fine woman standing at the inn door, Titmouse, eh?" exclaimed Mr. Yahoo, who had alighted for a moment, and stood beside the door of Titmouse's carriage, looking with brutal eye toward Miss Aubrey. "I wonder who and what she is? By Jove, 'tis the face—the figure of an angel! egad, they're somebody; I'll look at their panels."

"I know who it is," said Titmouse, rather faintly; "I'll tell you by and by."

"Now, now! my dear fellow. Our divinity is vanishing," whispered Mr. Yahoo eagerly, as Miss Aubrey, having slipped something into the beggar's hand, stepped into the carriage. She was the last to get in; and as soon as the door was closed, they drove off.

"Who's that, Mr. Titmouse?" inquired Miss Quirk, with a little eagerness, observing—woman are very quick in detecting such matters—that both Gammon and Titmouse looked rather embarrassed.

"It's the—the Aubreys," replied Titmouse.

"Eh! By Jove—is it?" quickly inquired old Quirk, putting his head out of the window; "how very odd, to meet the old birds! Egad! their nest must be yet warm—ha, ha!"

"What! dear papa, are those the people you've turned out? Gracious! I thought I heard some one say that Miss Aubrey was pretty! La! I'm sure I thought—now what do you think, Mr. Titmouse?" she added, turning keenly at him.

"Oh! upon my life, I—I—see nothing at all in her—devilish plain, I should say—infernally pale, and all that!" They were soon on their way again. Titmouse quickly recovered his equanimity, but Gammon continued silent and thoughtful for many—many miles; and the reader would not be surprised at it, if he knew as well as I do the thoughts which the unexpected sight of that travelling-carriage of Mr. Aubrey had suggested to Mr. Gammon.

As they approached the scene of triumph and rejoicing, and ascertained that they were within little more than a mile of the peaceful little village of Yatton, the travellers began to look out for indications of the kind which Mr. Gammon had mentioned to Titmouse, viz. a band and procession, and an attendant crowd. But however careful and extensive might have been the arrangements of those to whom that matter had been entrusted, they were likely to be sadly interfered with by a circumstance which, happening just then, might, to a weaker and more superstitious mind than that of Mr. Titmouse, have looked a little ominous—namely, a tremendous thunder-storm. It was then about five o'clock in the afternoon. The whole day had been overcast, and the sky threatening; and just as the two carriages came to that turning in the road which gave them the first glimpse of the Hall—only, however, the tops of the great chimneys, which were visible above the surrounding trees—a fearful, long-continued flash of lightning burst from the angry heavens, followed, after an interval of but a second or two, by a peal of thunder which sounded as if a park of artillery was being rapidly discharged immediately overhead.

"Mind your horses' heads, boys," called out Gammon; "keep a tight rein."

Miss Quirk was dreadfully alarmed, and clung to her father; Titmouse also seemed disconcerted, and looked to Gammon, who was perfectly calm, though his face was not free from anxiety. The ghastly glare of the lightning was again around them—all involuntarily hid their faces in their hands—and again rattled the thunder in a peal that lasted more than half a minute, and seemed in frightful contiguity, as it were only a few yards above their heads. Down, then, came the long-suspended rain, pouring like a deluge, and so it continued, with frequent returns of the thunder and lightning, for nearly a quarter of an hour. The last turning brought them within sight of the village, and also of some fifty or sixty persons crowding under the hedges, on each side—these were the procession; musicians, banner-men, footmen, horsemen, all dripping with wet, surely a piteous spectacle to behold. Out, however, they all turned, true to their orders, as soon as they saw the carriages, which immediately slackened their speed—the rain, also, somewhat abating. The flagman tried to unfold a wet banner, of considerable size, with the words, in gilded letters: while the band (consisting of a man with a big drum, another with a serpent, a third with a trumpet, a fourth with a bassoon, two with clarionets, and a boy with a fife) struck up, "See the conquering hero comes!" They puffed and blew lustily; bang! bang! went the drum; but the rain, the thunder, and the lightning wofully interfered with their harmony. "T'would have made your heart ache to see the wet flag clinging obstinately to the pole, in spite of all the efforts of its burly bearer! First, on horseback, was Barnabas Bloodsuck, (senior,) Esq.; beside him rode his son, Barnabas Bloodsuck, (junior,) Esq.; then came the Reverend Gideon Fleahpot, the vicar of Griston, the only Radical clergyman in that part of the country; beside him, the Reverend Smirk Mudflint, a flippant, bitter, little Unitarian parson, a great crony of Mr. Fleahpot, and his name singularly enough designating the qualities of his brain and heart. Next to these, alone in his one horse chaise (looking like a pill-box drawn by a leech) came the little fat Whig apothecary, Gargle Glyster, Esq. Following him, came Going Gone, Esq., the auctioneer—the main prop of the Liberal side, being a most eloquent speaker—and Mr. Hic Hæc Hoc, a learned schoolmaster, who taught the Latin grammar up as far as the syntax. Then there were Mr. Centipede, the editor, and Mr. Woodlouse, the publisher and proprietor of the "YORKSHIRE STING," for which, also, Mr. Mudflint wrote a great deal. These, and about a dozen others, the flower of "the party" thereabouts, disdainful of the inclement weather, bent on displaying their attachment to the new Whig owner of Yatton, and so-lacing each his patient inner man with anticipation of the jolly cheer that awaited them at the Hall, formed the principal part of the procession; the rest, consisting of rather a miscellaneous assortment of scot-and-lot and pot-walloper looking people, all very wet and hungry, and ever and anon casting a look of devout expectation toward the Hall. Scarcely a villager of Yatton was to be seen stirring; nor did any of the tenants of the estate join in the procession: even had they not felt far otherwise disposed, they had luckily a complete excuse for their non appearance in the deplorable state of the weather. Sometimes the band played; then a peal of thunder came; then a cry of "Hurra! Titmouse forever! hurra!" then the band, and then the thunder, and rain! rain! rain! Thus they got to the park gates, where they paused, shouting, "Titmouse for ever! hurra—a—a!" Mr. Titmouse bobbing about, now at one window, then at the other, with his hat off, in the most gracious manner. Really, it almost seemed as if the elements were conspiring to signalize, by their disfavor, Mr. Titmouse's assumption of Yatton; for just as he was passing under the old gateway, out flashed the lightning more vividly than it had yet appeared, and the thunder bellowed and reverberated among the woods as though it would never have ceased. The music and shouting ceased suddenly; carriages, horsemen, and pedestrians quickened their pace in silence, as if anxious to get out of the storm; the horses now and then rearing violently. Titmouse was terribly frightened, in spite of his desperate efforts to appear unconcerned. He was as pale as death, and looked anxiously at Gammon, as if hoping to derive courage from the sight of his countenance. Miss Quirk trembled violently, and several times uttered a faint scream; but her father, old Mr. Quirk, did not seem to care a pinch of snuff about the whole matter: he rubbed his hands together cheerily, chuckled his daughter under the chin, rallied Titmouse, and nudged and jeered Gammon, who seemed disposed to be serious and silent. Having drawn up opposite the Hall door, it was opened by Mr. Griffiths, with rather a saddened, but a most respectful look and manner; and in the same way might be characterised some six or seven servants standing behind him, in readiness to receive the new-comers. The half-drowned musicians tried to strike up "Rule Britannia," as the hero of the day, Mr. Titmouse, descended from his carriage, Mr. Griffiths holding an umbrella for him, and bounded out of the rain with a hop, step, and a jump into the Hall, where the first words he was heard to utter were—

"WELCOME TO YATTON!"

"What a devilish rum old place!"

"God bless you! God bless you! God bless you, Titmouse!" exclaimed old Mr. Quirk, grasping him by the hand, as soon as he had entered. Titmouse shook hands with Miss Quirk, who immediately followed a female servant to an apartment, being exceedingly nervous and agitated. Gammon seemed a little out of spirits; and said simply, "You know, Titmouse, how fervently I congratulate you."

"Oh! my dear boy, Tit, do, for Heaven's sake, if you do want the thunder and lightning to cease, order those wretched devils off—send them any where, but do stop their cursed noise, my dear boy!" exclaimed Mr. Yahoo, as soon as he had entered, patting his fingers to his ears.

"Mr. What's-your-name," said Titmouse, addressing Mr. Griffiths, "I'll trouble you to order off those fellows and their infernal noise. There's a precious row making up above, and surely one at a time!"

"Ah ha, capital joke, by Jove! capital!" said Mr. Fitz-Snooks.

"A—Titmouse—by Jupiter," said Mr. Yahoo, as, twirling his fingers about his long, black hair, of which he seemed very proud, he glanced about the hall, "this ain't so much amiss! Do you know, my dear boy, I rather like it; it's substantial, antique, and so forth."

"Who are those dem ugly old fellows up there?" presently exclaimed Titmouse, as, with his glass stuck into his right eye, and his hands in his coat pockets, he stood staring at the old-fashioned pictures standing round the hall.

"Some of them are ancestors of the Dreddingtons, others of the Aubrey families. They are very old, sir," continued Mr. Griffiths, "and are much admired, and Mr. Aubrey desired me to say, that if you should be disposed to part"—

"Oh confound him, he may have 'em all, if that's what he wants; I shall soon send them packing off!" Mr. Griffiths bowed, and heaved a very deep sigh. By this time the hall was crowded with the gentlemen who had formed part of the procession, and who came bowing and scraping to Titmouse, congratulating him, and wishing him health and happiness. As soon as he could disengage himself from their flattering but somewhat troublesome civilities, his valet came and whispered, "Will you dress, sir? All is ready," and Titmouse followed him to the dressing-room which had formerly been young Mrs. Aubrey's.

It was the first time that Titmouse ever experienced the attentions of a valet, and he was quite nonplussed at the multitudinousness and elegance of the arrangements around him. Such quantities of clothes of all sorts—dressing-implements, combs, brushes, razors, a splendid dressing-case, scents in profusion, oils, bear's grease, four or five different sorts of soaps, &c., &c., &c., all this gave Titmouse a far livelier idea of his altered circumstances, of his having really become a gentleman, than any thing that he had up to that moment experienced. He thought his valet one of the cleverest and most obliging men in the world, only he oppressed him with his attentions, and at length Mr. Titmouse said he preferred, this time, dressing alone, and so dismissed his obsequious attendant. In about an hour's time, having been obliged to summon Tweedle to his assistance after all, he had completed his toilet, and was ushered into the drawing-room, which, as well as the dining-room, was ready prepared for the banquet, forty or fifty covers, being laid in the two rooms, and good, substantial fare for at least as many more, in the servants' hall, where operations had already commenced. On entering the drawing-room, his appearance seemed to produce a great sensation, and after a little pause, the only county gentleman who was present advanced and introduced himself, his wife and daughter. This was Sir Harkaway Roigut Wildfire, Baronet, a tall and somewhat corpulent man of about fifty, very choleric and overbearing, his countenance showing the hard life he had led, his nose being red, and his forehead and mouth beset with pimples. He had been a bitter political opponent of Mr. Aubrey, and had once been a member of the county, but had so crippled his resources by hunting and horse-racing, as to compel the sacrifice of his town amusements, viz. his seat in the House of Commons, and Lady Wildfire's box at the opera. This had soured both of them not a little, and they had sunk, as it were, out of the county circle, in which they had once been sufficiently conspicuous.

Sir Harkaway had an eye to the borough of Yatton on the happening of the next election, as soon as he had obtained an inkling that the new proprietor of Yatton was a very weak young man; and hence his patronising presence at Yatton, in consequence of the invitation respectfully conveyed to him in Mr. Titmouse's name, through Messrs. Bloodsuck and Son. Besides Lady Wildfire and her daughter, both of whom had inquired with a sort of haughty curiosity about the lady who had accompanied Mr. Titmouse from town—a point which had been at length cleared up to their satisfaction—there were about a dozen ladies, the wives of the gentlemen who had borne so distinguished a part in the triumphal procession. They looked rather a queer set, and none of them dared to speak either to Lady Wildfire or her daughter till spoken to by them. Never had old Yatton beheld within its walls so motley a group; and had the Aubreys continued there, hospitable as they were, accessible and charitable as they were, I leave the reader to guess whether such creatures ever would have found their way thither. By such guests, however, were the two principal tables crowded on this joyous occasion, and about half past six o'clock the feast commenced; and a feast it certainly was, both elegant and substantial, nothing having been spared that money could procure. Mr. Aubrey had a fine cellar of wines at Yatton, which, owing to some strange misunderstanding, had been sold by private contract, not amongst his own friends in the neighborhood, as Mr. Aubrey had intended, and imagined that he had directed, but to Mr. Titmouse. Choice, indeed, were these wines, and supplied on the present occasion in wanton profusion. Champagne, burgundy, and claret flowed like water, and the other wines in like manner; but which last were not, like the former class of wines, confined to the two principal rooms, but found their way into the servants' hall, and were there drunk without stint. Merriment echoed uproariously from all parts of the old Hall, and Mr. Titmouse was universally declared to be a very fine fellow, and likely to become by far the most popular man in the county. The Reverend Mr. Fleahpot said grace, and the Reverend Mr. Mudflint returned thanks; and shortly afterwards Sir Harkaway arose, and, his eye fixed firmly on the adjoining borough, and also on the jolly table which promised to be ever open to him at Yatton, he proposed the health of the distinguished proprietor of Yatton, in certainly a somewhat fulsome strain. The toast was received with the utmost enthusiasm; the gentlemen shouted and jingled their glasses on the table, while the ladies waved their handkerchiefs; indeed the scene was one of such overpowering excitement, that Miss Quirk burst into tears, overcome by her emotions; her papa winking very hard to those about him, and using every exertion in his power to point the attention of those present to the probability that a very near and tender relationship was going to exist between that young lady and Mr. Titmouse. Mr. Gammon, who sat next to Titmouse, assured him that it was absolutely necessary for him to make a speech to the company in acknowledgment of the compliment which had just been paid him.

"I shall put my foot in it—by jingo I shall! You must help me!" he whispered to Mr. Gammon, in an agony of trepidation and a mist of confusion, as he rose from his chair, being welcomed in the most enthusiastic manner by applause of every kind, lasting for several minutes. At length, when the noise had subsided into a fearful silence, he stammered out, prompted incessantly by Mr. Gammon, something exceedingly like the following, if, indeed, he did not use these very words:

"Mr.—I beg pardon—Sir Hark—away, and gentlemen—gentlemen and ladies, am most uncommon, monstrous—particularly happy to—to—(eh? what d'ye say, Mr. Gammon?) see you all here—at this place—here—at Yatton." (Applause.) "Ladies and gentlemen—I say—hem!—unaccustomed as"—(much applause, during which Titmouse stooped and whispered to Gammon, "Curse me if I can catch a word you say!") "Happy and proud to see you all here—at Yatton—homes of my ancestry—known to you all—centuries. Enjoyed yourselves, I hope—(great applause)—and hope you'll often come and do the same—(Still greater applause.) Particular glad to see the ladies—(applause)—often heard of the beauties of Yatton—never believed it—no—beg pardon, mean I now see them—(applause.) Am fond of horses—(applause)—racing, hunting, and all that." (Here Sir Harkaway, extending his hand, publicly shook that of the eloquent speaker.) "Sorry to turn out the—the old bird—but—nest not his—mine all the while—(emotion)—bear him no ill-will—(applause.) Political principles—(profound silence)—good old Whig principles—(loud applause)—rights of the people—religious liberty and all that—(vociferous applause)—found at my post in the hour of danger—enemy stole a march on me—(great laughter and applause.) Won't detain you, ladies and gentlemen—drink your good healths, and many happy returns of the day." Down sat Mr. Titmouse, exhausted with this his maiden speech; and quite overpowered moreover, by the extraordinary applause with which he was greeted at its conclusion. In due course many other toasts were drunk. "Lady Wildfire and the married ladies." "Miss Wildfire and the single ladies." "Sir Harkaway Roigut Wildfire." "Religious liberty," (to which Mr. Mudflint responded in a very eloquent speech.) "The liberty of the Press." "Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap, the enterprising, skilful, and learned professional advisers of Mr. Titmouse." Dancing was now loudly called for; and the hall was speedily prepared for it. By this time, however, it was past eleven o'clock: the free potations of all the men, and indeed of more than one of the ladies, were beginning to tell, and the noise and confusion were very great. Fierce confused sounds issued from the servants' hall, where it proved that a great fight was going on between Pumpkin the gardener, and a man who insisted on shouting "Titmouse for ever—down with the Tory Aubrey!" Pumpkin had much the best of it, and beat his opponent, after a severe encounter, into silence and submission. Then there were songs sung in all the rooms at once—speeches made, half-a-dozen at the same time; in short, never before had such scenes been witnessed, or such uproar heard, within the decorous, the dignified, and venerable precincts of Yatton. Scenes ensued which really baffle description. Mr. Titmouse, of course, drank a great quantity of wine, although Mr. Gammon never left his side, and checked him fifty times when he was about to fill his glass; and the excitement produced by wine will, I trust, in some measure, mitigate the reader's indignation at hearing of a little incident which occurred, in which Titmouse was concerned, and which, about half past 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning, served to bring that brilliant entertainment to a somewhat abrupt and rather unpleasant termination. Scarcely knowing where he was, or what he was about, I am sorry to say, that while standing as well as he could, beside Miss Wildfire, to dance for the fifth time with her—a plump, fair-faced, good-natured girl of about nineteen or twenty—he suddenly threw his arms around her, and imprinted half-a-dozen kisses on her forehead, lips, cheek, and neck, before she could recover from the confusion into which this extraordinary assault had thrown her. Her faint shriek reached her father's ears, while he was, in a distant part of the room, persecuting Miss Quirk with his drunken and profligate importunities. Hastily approaching the quarter where his daughter's voice had issued, he beheld her just extricated from the insolent embrace of the half-unconscious Titmouse, and greatly agitated. With flaming eye and outstretched arm, he approached his unfortunate little host, and seizing hold of his right ear, almost wrung it out of his head, Titmouse quite shrieking with the pain it occasioned. Still retaining his hold, uttering the while most fearful imprecations—he gave him three violent kicks upon the seat of honor, the last of which sent him spinning into the arms of old Mr. Quirk, who was hurrying up to his relief, and who fell flat on the floor, with the violent concussion. Then Miss Quirk rushed forward and screamed; a scene of dreadful confusion ensued; and at length the infuriated and half-drunken baronet, forced away his wife and his daughter, quitted the Hall, and got into his carriage, uttering fearful threats and curses all the way home; without once adverting to the circumstance, of which also Lady Wildfire and her daughter were not aware, that he had been himself engaged in perpetrating the very same kind of misconduct which he had so severely and justly punished in poor Titmouse. As for Mr. Yahoo and Mr. Fitz-Snooks, they had been in quest of the same species of amusement the whole night; and had each of them, in pursuing their adventures in the servants' hall, very narrowly escaped much more serious indignities and injuries than had fallen to the lot of the hospitable owner of the mansion.

About half-past four o'clock, the sun was shining in cloudless splendor, the air cleared, and all nature seeming freshened after the storm of the preceding day; but what a scene was presented at Yatton! Two or three persons, one with his hat off, asleep; another grasping a half-empty bottle; and a third in a state of desperate indisposition, were to be seen, at considerable distances from each other, by the side of the carriage-road leading down to the park-gates. Four or five horses, ready saddled and bridled, but neglected, and apparently forgotten by both servants and masters, were wandering about the fine green old court opposite the hall door, eating the grass, and crushing with their hoofs the beautiful beds of flowers and shrubs which surrounded it. Mr. Glyster's gig had got its wheels entangled with the old sundial—having been drawn thither by the horse, which had been put into it at least two hours ago; opposite the hall-door stood the post-chaise which had brought Mr. and Mrs. Muddint and their daughter. The latter two were sitting in it, one asleep—the other, Mrs. Muddint, anxiously on the look-out for her husband, from time to time calling to him, but in vain; for, about half an hour before, he had quitted the room where he, Mr. Fleeshpot, Mr. Going Gone, and Mr. Centipede had been playing a rubber at whist, till they almost all of them fell asleep with their cards in their hands, and made his way to the stables, where, not finding his chaise in the yard, or his horses in the stalls, he supposed his wife and daughter had gone home, whither he followed them by the footpath leading through the fields which stretched along the high-road to Grilston; and along which said fields he was, at that moment, staggering, hiccupping, not clearly understanding where he was, nor where he had last seen his wife and daughter. Candles and lamps were still burning and glimmering in some of the rooms; and in the servants' hall there were some dozen or so, who, having awaked from deep sleep, were calling for more ale, or wine or whatever else they could get. Some of the old family servants had fled hours ago from scenes of such unwonted riot, to their bed-rooms, and, having locked and barricaded the doors, gone to sleep. Mr. Griffiths sat in an old arm chair in the library, the picture of misery; he had been repeatedly abused and insulted during the night, and had fled thither, unable to bear the sight of the disgusting revelry that was every where around going forward.—In short, at every point that caught the eye, were visible the evidences of the villainous debauchery that had prevailed for the last seven hours; and which, under the Titmouse dynasty, was likely to prevail at all times thereafter. As for Mr. Titmouse, half stunned with the treatment he had experienced at the hands of Sir Harkaway, he had been carried to bed—to the late bed-room of Mr. and Mrs. Aubrey—where his excessive, and miscellaneous, and large-continued potations, aiding the effect of the serious injuries which he had sustained, he lay sprawling on the bed, half undressed, in a truly deplorable condition. Mr. Glyster, who had been summoned to his bed-side upward of an hour before, sat, now nodding in his chair, beside his patient; and pretty nearly in a state of similar exhaustion were his valet and the housekeeper, who had, from time to time, wiped her eyes, and sobbed aloud when thinking of past times, and the grievous change that had come over old Yatton. Mr. Yahoo, Mr. Fitz-Snooks, Mr. Snap, Mr. Quirk, and Miss Quirk, (the last having retired to her bed-room in alarm, at the time of Titmouse's mischance,) were in their respective chambers, all of them probably asleep. Poor Hector, chained to his kennel, having barked himself hoarse for several hours, lay fast asleep, no one having attended to him, or given him any thing to eat since Mr. Titmouse's arrival. Gammon had fled from the scene, in disgust and alarm, to his bed-room some three hours before, but unable to sleep—not, however, with excess of wine, for he had drunk but a very few glasses—had arisen about four o'clock, and was at that moment wandering slowly, with folded arms and downcast countenance, up and down the fine avenue of elm-trees, where, it may be recollected, Mr. Aubrey had spent a portion of the last evening of his stay at Yatton.

Such is my account—and as fair an account as I know how to give of the matter; but it is curious to observe how very differently the same thing will strike different people. As soon as the grateful Mr. Centipede had recovered from the excitement occasioned by the part he had taken in the memorable occasion above described, he set to work with the pen of a ready-writer, and in the next number of the "Yorkshire Stingo," there appeared the following interesting account of the "FESTIVITIES at YATTON-HALL, on the occasion of POSSESSION being taken by TITMOUSE, Esquire.

Yesterday this interesting event came off with signal éclat. Notwithstanding the very unfavorable state of the weather, about five o'clock in the evening, an imposing cavalcade, comprising many of the leading gentry and yeomanry of this part of the county, on foot and on horseback, preceded by an admirable band, and a large and splendid banner, bearing the inscription—"Welcome to Yatton," went out to meet the above gentleman, whose cortege, in two carriages, made its appearance in the village about half-past five. The band immediately struck up "See the Conquering Hero comes!" which, however, was nearly drowned in the shout which welcomed the new proprietor of the noble estate of Yatton. His carriage was of the most tasteful, splendid, and unique description, and attracted universal admiration.—Mr. Titmouse repeatedly bowed through the carriage windows, in graceful acknowledgment of the cordial welcome and congratulations with which he was received. He was dressed in a light-blue surcoat, with velvet collar, full black stock, and a rich velvet waistcoat of plaid pattern. His countenance is handsome and expressive, his eye penetrating, and his brow strongly indicative of thought.—He appears to be little more than twenty-five years old; so that he has before him the prospect of a long and brilliant career of happiness and public usefulness. Tables were spread in all the chief apartments, groaning beneath the most costly viands. All the luxuries of the season were there; and the wines (which we believe were those of Mr. Aubrey) were of the first description. Grace was said by the exemplary vicar of Grilston, the Rev. Mr. Fleeshpot; and the Rev. Mr. Muddint returned thanks. Sir Harkaway Rotgut Wildfire (whose amiable lady and accomplished daughter were present) proposed the health of Mr. Titmouse in a brief, but manly and cordial address; and the manner in which Mr. Titmouse acknowledged the toast, which was drunk with the greatest possible enthusiasm—the simplicity, point, and fervor which characterized every word he uttered—were such as to excite lively emotion in all who heard it, and warrant the highest expectations of his success in parliament.—Nothing could be more touching than his brief allusions to the sufferings and privations which he had undergone—nothing more delicate and forbearing than the feeling which pervaded his momentary allusions to the late occupant of Yatton. When, however, he distinctly avowed his political principles as those of a strong and decided Whig—as those of a dauntless champion of civil and religious liberty among all classes of his Majesty's subjects—the applause was long and enthusiastic. After dinner, the great hall was cleared for dancing, which was opened by Mr. Titmouse and Miss Wildfire; Lady Wildfire being led out by the Honorable Mr. Yahoo, an intimate friend of Mr. Titmouse. We should not omit to mention that Miss Quirk (the only daughter of Caleb Quirk, Esq., the head of the distinguished firm of Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, of London, to whose untiring and most able exertions is owing the happy change which has taken place in the ownership of the Yatton property) accompanied her father, at the earnest request of Mr. Titmouse, who danced several sets with her. Sir Algernon Fitz-Snooks, a distinguished fashionable, also accompanied Mr. Titmouse, and entered with great spirit into all the gaieties of the evening. The "light fantastic toe" was kept "tripping" till a late, or rather very early hour in the morning—when the old hall was once more (for a time) surrendered to the repose and solitude from which it has been so suddenly and joyously aroused." (In another part of the paper was contained a bitter and abusive paragraph, charging Mr. Aubrey with being a party to the "flagrant and iniquitous job," by which Sir Percival Pickering was returned for the borough; and intimating pretty distinctly, that Mr. Aubrey had not gone without "a consideration" for his share in the nefarious transaction.)

A somewhat different account of the affair appeared in the "YORK TRUE BLUE" of the same day.

"We have received one or two accounts of the orgies of which Yatton Hall was yesterday the scene, on occasion of Mr. Titmouse taking possession. We shall not give publicity to the details which have been furnished us—hoping that the youth and inexperience of the new owner of Yatton (all allowance, also, being made for the very natural excitement of such an occasion) will be allowed in some measure to palliate the conduct then exhibited. One fact, however, we may mention, that a very serious fracas arose between Mr. Titmouse and a certain well-known sporting Baronet, which is expected to give employment to the gentlemen of the long robe. Nothing, by the way, could be more absurd and contemptible than the attempt at a 'Procession' which was got up—of which our accounts are ludicrous in the extreme. Will our readers believe it, that the chief personages figuring on the occasion were the editor and publisher of a certain low Radical paper—which will no doubt, this day, favor its readers with a flaming description of this 'memorable affair!'"

Titmouse, assisted by his anxious valet, made a desperate attempt to get up, and make his appearance the next day at dinner. Aided by a glass of pretty strong brandy and water, he at length got through the fatiguing duties of the toilet, and entered the drawing-room, where his traveling companions were awaiting his arrival—dinner being momentarily expected to be announced. He was deadly pale; his knees trembled; his eyes could not bear the light; and everything seemed in undulating motion around him, as he sunk in silent exhaustion on the sofa. After a few minutes' continuance, he was compelled to leave the room, leaning on Gammon's arm, who conducted him to his bed-room, and left him in charge of his valet, who got him again into bed, where he lay enduring much agony, (Dr. Goddard being sent for,) while his friends were enjoying themselves at dinner.

Snap had set off the ensuing day for town, by the first coach, pursuant to the arrangement already spoken of; but I think that old Mr. Quirk would have made up his mind to continue at Yatton till something definite had been done by Titmouse, in two matters which absorbed all the thoughts of the old gentleman—his daughter, and the Ten Thousand Pounds bond. Miss Quirk, however, intense as was her anxiety to become the affianced bride of Titmouse, and as such the mistress of the delightful domain where at present she dwelt only as a guest—and in a very embarrassing position—was not so blind to all perception of womanly delicacy as to prolong her stay at Yatton; and at length prevailed upon her father to take their departure on the day but one after that which they had arrived. Mr. Quirk was perfectly wretched; he vehemently distrusted Titmouse—he feared and detested Gammon. As for the former gentleman, he had not made any definite advances whatever toward Miss Quirk. He had not afforded to any one the slightest evidence of a promise of marriage, either expressed or implied. He chattered to Miss Quirk an infinite deal of civil nonsense—but that was all, in spite of the innumerable opportunities afforded him by the lady. Was Titmouse acting under the secret advice of that deceitful devil Gammon?—thought Mr. Quirk in an ecstasy of perplexity and apprehension—then as to the other matter—but there Gammon had as deep a stake, almost, in proportion, as Quirk himself. On the morning of his departure, he and Gammon had a very long interview, in which they several times came to high words; but in the end Gammon vanquished his opponent as usual; allayed all his apprehensions; accounted for Titmouse's conduct in the most natural way in the world—look at his position just now, the excitement, the novelty, the bewilderment, the indisposition he was experiencing: surely, surely that was not a moment to bring him to book! In short, Gammon at length brought Quirk, who had received the first intimation with a sudden gust of surprise and anger, to acknowledge the propriety of Gammon's remaining behind, to protect Titmouse from the designing Yahoo that had got hold of him; and solemnly pledged himself, as in the sight of Heaven, to use his utmost efforts to bring about, as speedily as possible, the two grand objects of Mr. Quirk's wishes. With this the old man was fain to be satisfied; but entered the chaise which was to convey Miss Quirk and himself to Grilston, with as rueful a countenance as he had ever exhibited in his life. Mr. Titmouse was sufficiently recovered to be present at the departure of Miss Quirk, who regarded his interesting and languid looks with an eye of melting sympathy and affection. With half a smile and half a tear, she slipped into his hand, as he led her to the chaise, a little sprig of heart's ease, which he at once stuck into the button-hole of his coat.

"Pon my soul—must you go? Devilish sorry you can't stay to have seen some fun! The old gent (meaning her father) do n't quite seem to like it—he, he!" said he in a low tone; then he handed her into the chaise, she dropping her veil to conceal the starting tear of mingled disappointment, and desire, and disgust—and they drove off, Titmouse kissing his hand to her, as he stood upon the steps; and, as soon as they were out of sight, he exchanged a very significant smile with Mr. Gammon.

The next day, Titmouse rose about ten o'clock, almost entirely recovered from his indisposition. Accompanied by Mr. Yahoo and Mr. Fitz-Snooks, with whom he was conversing as to the course he should take with reference to Sir Harkaway—whom, however, they advised him to treat with silent contempt, as he, Titmouse, was clearly in the wrong—he took a stroll, about noon, down the path leading to the park gates. They all three had cigars in their mouths. Titmouse walking between them, as odious-looking a little puppy, sure, as man ever saw—puffing out his smokes lowly, and with half-closed eyes, his right hand stuck into his coat pocket, and resting on his hip. These three figures—Heaven save the mark!—were the new lord of Yatton and his select friends!

"By jingo, here comes a parson," quoth Titmouse; "what the d—l can he want with me?" "T was Dr. Tatham, who slowly approached them, dressed in his Sunday suit, and leaning on his old-fashioned walking-stick, given him many, many years ago by the deceased Mrs. Aubrey.

"Let's have sport," said Fitz-Snooks.

"We must look devilish serious—no grinning till the proper time," said Yahoo.

"Hallo—you, sir!" commenced Titmouse, "who are you?"

Dr. Tatham took off his hat, bowed, and was passing on.

"Devilish cool, upon—my—soul—sir!" said Titmouse, stopping, and staring impudently at the worthy little Doctor, who seemed taken quite by surprise.

"My worthy old gentleman," said Yahoo, with mock respect, "are you aware who it was that asked you a question?"

"I am not, sir," replied Dr. Tatham quietly, but resolutely.

"My name is Tittlebat Titmouse, at your service—and you are now in my grounds," said Titmouse, approaching him with an impudent air.

"Have I really the honor to address Mr. Titmouse?" inquired Dr. Tatham, somewhat incredulously.

"Why, 'pon my life I think so, unless I'm changed lately: and by Jove, sir—now, who are you?"

"I am Dr. Tatham, sir, the vicar of Yatton; I had intended calling at the Hall to offer my compliments, but I fear I am intruding."

"Devil a bit—no, 'pon honor, no! you're a very good old fellow, I do n't doubt—is that little church outside, yours?"

"It is, sir," replied Dr. Tatham, seriously and sternly; his manner a little abashing the presumptuous little coxcomb who addressed him.

"Oh—well—I—I—'pon my soul, happy to see you, sir—you'll find something to eat in the Hall, I dare say."

"Do you preach there next Sunday?" inquired Mr. Yahoo, whose gross countenance filled Dr. Tatham with unspeakable aversion.

"I preach there every Sunday, sir, twice," he replied, gravely and distantly.

"You see, sir," lisped Fitz-Snooks, "the prayers are so—so—devilish long and tiresome—if you could—eh?—shorten 'em a little?"

Dr. Tatham slowly turned away from them, and disregarding their calls to him, though their tone and voice were greatly altered, walked back again toward the gate, and quitted the park, for the first time in his life, with feelings of mortal repugnance. On reaching his little study, he sat down in his old arm-chair, and fell into a sad reverie that lasted more than an hour, and then he got up to go and see the old blind stag-hound fed—and he looked at it, licking his hands, with feelings of unusual tenderness; and the little doctor shed a tear or two as he patted its smooth grey old head.

On a Saturday morning, Mr. Titmouse, at Mr. Gammon's instance, had fixed to go over the estate, accompanied by that gentleman and by Mr. Waters and Dickons, to give all the information required of them, and point out the position and extent of the property. To an eye capable of appreciating, in what admirable order was everything! but Titmouse quickly tired of it, and when about a mile from the Hall, discovered that he had left his cigar-box behind him; at which he expressed infinite concern, and, greatly to the annoyance of Gammon, and the contempt of his two bailiffs, insisted on returning home; so they re-entered the park. How beautiful it was! Its gently undulating surface, smooth as if overspread with green velvet; trees, great and small, single and in clumps, standing in positions so picturesque and commanding; the broad, babbling, clear trout-stream winding through every part of the park, with here and there a mimic fall, seen faintly flashing and glistening in the distance; herds of deer suddenly started amid their green pastures and silent shades, and moving off with graceful ease and rapidity; here and there a rustic bridge over the stream; here an old stone bench placed on an elevation commanding an extensive prospect; there a kind of grotto, or an ivy-covered summer-house; then the dense, extensive, and gloomy woods, forming a semicircular sweep round the back of the Hall; all around, nearly as far as the eye could reach, land of every kind in the highest state of cultivation, plentifully stocked with fine cattle, and interspersed with snug and substantial farms.

All this, thought Titmouse, might do very well for those who fancied that sort of thing; but as for him, how the devil could he have thought of leaving his cigars behind him! Where, he wondered, were Yahoo and Fitz-Snooks? and quickened his pace homeward.

On Gammon the scene they had been witnessing had made a profound impression; and as his attention was now and then called off from contemplating it by some ignorant and puerile remark of the proprietor of the fine domain, he felt a momentary exasperation at himself for the part he had taken in the expulsion of the Aubreys, and the introduction of such a creature as Titmouse. That revived certain other thoughts, which led him into speculations of a description which would have afforded uneasiness even to the little idiot beside him, could he have been made aware of them. But the cloud that had darkened his brow was dispelled by a word or two of Titmouse. "Mr. Gammon, 'pon my soul you're devilish dull to-day!" said he. Gammon started; and with his winning smile and cheerful voice, instantly replied, "Oh, Mr. Titmouse, I was only thinking how happy you are; and that you deserve it!"

"Yes; 'pon my soul it ought all to have been mine at my birth! Don't it tire you, Mr. Gammon, to walk in this up-and-down, zig-zag, here-and-there sort of way? It does me 'pon my life! What would I give for a cigar at this moment!"

The next day was the Sabbath, tranquil and beautiful; and just as the little tinkling bell of Yatton church had ceased, Dr. Tatham rose, in his reading desk, and commenced the prayers. The church was quite full, for every one was naturally anxious to catch a glimpse of the new tenants of the squire's pew. It was empty, however, till about five minutes after the service had commenced, when a gentleman walked slowly up to the church-door; and having whispered an inquiry of the old pew-opener which was the squire's pew, she led him into it—all eyes settled upon him, and all were struck with his appearance, his calm, keen features, and gentlemanly figure. 'Twas of course, Gammon; who, with the utmost decorum and solemnity, having stood for near a minute with his hat covering his face, during which time he reflected that Miss Aubrey had sat in that pew on the last occasion of his attendance at the church, turned round, and behaved with the greatest seriousness and reverence throughout the service, paying marked attention to the sermon. Gammon was an unbeliever, but he thought Dr. Tatham a very sensible man, who was most probably in earnest; and he felt disposed to admit, as his eyes glanced round the attentive and decent congregation, that the sort of thing was not without its advantages. Almost all present took him for Titmouse, and watched every turn of his countenance with intense interest; and, in their simplicity, they rejoiced that Mr. Aubrey's successor was, at all events, so grave and respectable-looking a man; and they fancied that he frequently thought of those whose seat he was occupying with kindness and regret. About the middle of the service, the doors of the church being wide open, the congregation beheld three gentlemen smoking cigars, and laughing and talking together, approaching the porch. They were dressed very finely indeed; and were supposed to be some of the great friends of the new squire. They stopped when within a few yards of the church; and after whispering together for a moment, one of them having expelled a mouthful of smoke, stepped forward to the door holding his cigar in one hand, and with the other taking off his hat. There was a faint smirk on his face, (for he did not catch the stern countenance of Gammon anxiously directed toward him,) till he beheld Dr. Tatham's solemn eye fixed upon him, while he made a momentary pause. Titmouse blushed scarlet; made a hesitating but a most respectful bow; and, stepping back a few paces, replaced his hat on his head, and lit his cigar from that of Mr. Fitz-Snooks, perhaps unconsciously, within view of more than half the congregation. Then the three gentlemen, after Mr. Titmouse had spoken a word or two to them, burst out into a laugh, and quitted the churchyard.

Aubrey's sudden plunge into the cold and deep stream of trouble, had—the first shock over—served, as it were, to brace his nerves. 'Tis at such a time, and on such an occasion, that the temper and quality of the soul are tried; whether it be weak in seeming strength or strong in seeming weakness. How many are there, walking with smiling, complacent confidence along the flowery bank, who, if suddenly bidden to strip and enter, would turn pale and tremble as they reluctantly prepared to obey the stern mandate; and, after a convulsive shudder, a faint shriek, a brief struggle, disappear from the surface, paralysed, never to be seen again! In such a point of view, let me hope that the situation of Aubrey, one of deepening difficulty and danger—the issue of which, hid in the darkness of the future, no earthly intelligence can predict—will excite in the thoughtful reader an anxiety not unmingled with confidence.

The enervating effects of inactivity upon the physical structure and energies of mankind, few can have failed to observe. Rust is more fatal to metal than wear. A thorough-bred racer, if confined in stable or paddock, or a boxer, born of the finest muscular make, if prematurely incarcerated in a jail, will, after a few years, become quite unable to compete with those vastly their inferiors in natural endowments and capabilities; however, they may, with careful training, be restored to the full enjoyment and exercise of their powers. Thus is it with the temper and intellect of man, which, secluded from the scenes of appropriate stimulus and exercise, become relaxed and weakened. What would have become of the glorious spirit and powers of Achilles, if his days had all melted away in the tender, delicate, emasculating inactivity and indulgence of the court of Lyncmedes? The language of the ancient orator concerning art may be applied to life, that not only its greatness, but its enjoyment, consists in action—action—ACTION. The feelings, for instance, may become so morbidly sensitive, as to give an appearance of weakness to the whole character; and this is likely to be especially the case of one born with feelings of superior liveliness and delicacy, if he moves only in the regions of silent and profound abstraction and contemplation—in those refined regions which may be termed a sort of paradise, where every conceivable source of enjoyment is cultivated for the fortunate and fastidious occupants, to the very uttermost, and all those innumerable things which fret, worry, and harass the temper, the head and the heart of the dwellers in the rude regions of ordinary life—most anxiously weeded out; instead of entering into the throng of life, and taking part in its constant cares and conflicts—scenes which require all his energies always in exercise, to keep his place and escape being trodden under foot. Rely upon it, that the man who feels a tendency to shrink from collision with his fellows, to run away with distaste or apprehension from the great practical business of life, does not enjoy complete moral or intellectual health—will quickly contract a silly conceit and fastidiousness, or sink into imbecility and misanthropy; and should devoutly thank Providence for the occasion, however momentarily startling and irritating, which stirs him out of his lethargy, his cowardly lethargy, and sends him among his fellows—puts him, in a manner, upon a course of training; upon an experience of comparative suffering, it may be of sorrow, requiring the exercise of powers of which he had scarcely been conscious, and gives him presently the exhilarating consciousness that he is exhibiting himself—a man; and "ay, every inch"—A MAN.

"It is probable," says a very acute and powerful writer of the present day, Mr. Foster in his Essay on "Decision of Character"—"that the men most distinguished for decision, have not, in general, possessed a large share of tenderness; and it is easy to imagine that the laws, according to which our nature is formed, will with great difficulty allow the combination of the refined sensibilities, with a hardy, never shrinking, never yielding constancy. Is it not almost of the essence of this constancy, to be free from even the perception of such impressions as cause a mind, weak through susceptibility, to relax, or to waver? No doubt, this firmness consists partly in overcoming feelings; but it may consist partly, too, in not having them." The case I am contemplating is perhaps the difficult, though by no means, I am persuaded, uncommon one—of a person possessing these delicate sensibilities these lively feelings; yet with a native strength of character, beneath which, when the occasion for its display has arisen—when it is placed in a scene of constant and compulsory action, will fully evince and vindicate itself. It is then "that another essential principle of decision of character," to quote from another part of the same essay, "will be displayed; namely, a total incapability of surrendering to indifference or delay the serious determinations of the mind." A strenuous WILL must accompany the conclusions of thought, and constantly urge the utmost efforts for their practical accomplishment. The intellect must be invested, as it were, with a glowing atmosphere of passion, under the influence of which the cold dictates of reason take fire, and spring into active powers."

There is, indeed, nothing like throwing a man of the description we are considering upon his own resources, and compelling him to exertion. Listen, ye languid and often gifted victims of indolence and ennui, to the noble language of one gifted with as great powers as perhaps were ever vouchsafed to man—Edmund Burke!

"DIFFICULTY is a severe instructor, set over us by the Supreme ordination of a parental guardian and legislator, who knows us better than we know ourselves, as he loves us better, too. Pater ipse colendi, haud facilius esse viam voluit. He then wrestles with us, strengthens our nerves and sharpens our skill; our antagonist is our helper. This amicable contest with difficulty, obliges us to an intimate acquaintance with our object, and compels us to consider it in all its relations; it will not suffer us to be superficial."

The man whose disposition is one of sterling excellence, despite the few foibles which it may have contracted in comparative solitude and inactivity, when he is compelled to mix indiscriminately with the great family of man, oh, how patient and tolerant becomes he of the weakness and errors of others, when thus constantly reminded of, and made to feel, his own! Oh, how pitiful! how very pitiful is he!—how his heart yearns and overflows with love, and mercy, and charity toward his species, individually—whose eye looks on their grievous privations, their often incurable distress and misery! and who penetrates even to those deserted quarters,

"Where hopeless anguish pours her moan
And lonely want retires to die!"

It may be that some of the preceding observations are applicable to many individuals of the purest and most amiable characters, and powerful and cultivated intellects, in the higher classes of society, whose affluence exempts them from the necessity of actively intermingling with the concerns of life, and feeling the consciousness of individual responsibility, of having a personal necessity for anxious care and exertion. A position of real precariousness and danger, is that which is requisite for developing the energies of a man of high moral and intellectual character, as it will expose to destruction one of a contrary description. I have endeavored, in previous portions of this history, to delineate faithfully the character of Mr. Aubrey—one (how idle and childish would have been the attempt!) by no means perfect, yet with very high qualities; a noble simplicity, generous, confiding, sincere, affectionate; possessing a profound sense of religion, really influencing his course in life; an intellect of a superior order, of a practical turn, of a masculine strength—as had been evidenced by his successful academical career, his thorough mastery of some of the most important and difficult branches of human knowledge, and by his superior aptitude for public business. He was at the same time possessed of a sensibility that was certainly excessive. He had a morbid tendency to pensiveness, if not melancholy, which, with a feeble physical constitution, was partly derived from his mother and partly accounted for by the species of life which he had led. From his early youth he had been addicted to close and severe study, which had given permanence and strength to his naturally contemplative turn. Permit me also to observe, that he had not, moreover, with too many of his means and station, entered, just at the dawn and bloom of manhood, upon that course of dissipation which is a sure and speedy means of destroying "the freshness of thought and of feeling," and inducing a lowered tone of feeling, and a callousness which some consider necessary to enable them to pass through life easily and agreeably. He, on the contrary, had stepped out of the gloom and solitude of the cloister into the pure and peaceful region of domestic life, with all its hallowed and unutterable tendernesses, where the affections grew luxuriantly; in the constant society of such women as his mother, his sister, his wife, and latterly, his lovely children. Then he was possessed all this while, of a fine fortune—one which placed him far beyond the necessity for anxiety or exertion. With such tastes as these, such a temperament as his, and leading such a life as his, is it surprising that the tone of his feelings should have become somewhat relaxed? The three or four years which he had spent in Parliament, when he plunged into its fierce and absorbing excitement with characteristic ardor and determination, though calculated to sharpen the faculties, and draw forth the resources of his intellect, subjected him to those alternations of excitement and depression, those extremes of action and re-action, which were not calculated to correct his morbid tendencies. Therefore there came up to him a messenger from Heaven with trouble and affliction in his countenance, telling him to descend from the happy solitude of his high mountain, into the dismal hubbub and conflict in the plain beneath. He came down with humility and awe, and with reverent resignation; and was instantly surrounded.

A weak man would have been confused and stunned, and so sunk helpless into the leaden arms of despair. But it was not so with Aubrey. There was that dormant energy within, which, when appealed to, quickly shook off the weakness contracted by inaction, and told him to be up and doing; and that, not with the fitful energy of mere impulse, but the constant strength of a well-regulated mind, conscious of its critical position; and also of a calm inflexible determination to vanquish difficulty, and escape the eminent danger, however long and doubtful might prove the conflict. Above all, he was consoled and blessed by the conviction, that nothing could befall him that was not the ordination of Providence.

Alike in what it gives and what denies;"

that His was the ordering of the sunshine and the gloom, the tempest and the calm of life. This was—this is—as the humble writer of these pages (who has had in his time his measure of anxiety and affliction) has in his soul a profound and intimate persuasion and conviction of—the only source of real fortitude and resignation, amidst the perplexities and afflictions, and dangers of life. Depend upon it, a secret and scarce-acknowledged disbelief, or at least doubt and distrust of the very existence of God, and of his government of the world—HIS REAL PRESENCE AND INTERFERENCE with the men and the things of the world—lies at the bottom of almost all impatience and despair under adverse circumstances. How can he be impatient, or despairing, who believes not only the existence of God, and his moral government of the world, but that He has mercifully vouchsafed to reveal and declare expressly that the infliction of suffering and sorrow is directly from Himself, and designed solely for the advantage of his creatures? "If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons; for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not? We have had fathers of our flesh which corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits, and live? For they verily for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure; but he for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness. Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterwards, it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness, unto them which are exercised thereby. Wherefore, lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees." While thus benignantly teacheth the voice of God, thought Aubrey, shall I rather incline mine ear to the blighting whisper of the Evil One—a fiar, and the father of a lie, who would fain that I should become a fool, saying within my heart there is no God—or, if I can! not but believe that there is one, provoking me to charge Him foolishly, to curse Him, and die? Not so, however, had Aubrey read the Scriptures—not so had he learned the Christian religion.

The last time that we caught a glimpse of the ruined family of the Aubreys, they had arrived nearly at the end of their long and melancholy journey from Yatton to the metropolis. When before had such been the character of their journey to town? Had they not ever looked forward with pleasure toward the brilliant gayeties of the season; their reunion with an extensive and splendid circle of friends—and he to the delightful excitement of political life—the opening of the parliamentary campaign? Alas, how changed now all this! how gloomy and threatening the aspect of the metropolis, whose dusky outlooks they were entering! with what feelings of oppression—of vague indefinite apprehension—did they now approach it; their spirits heavy, their hearts bleeding with their recent severance from Yatton! And distress, desertion, dismay, seemed associated with the formidable name of "London." They had now no place of their own awaiting, thoroughly prepared for them, their welcome arrival—but must drive to some quiet and unexpensive family hotel for temporary shelter. As their eyes caught familiar point after point in their route through the suburbs—now passed at a moderate pace, with a modest pair of horses; formerly dashed through by them in their carriage-and-four—there were very few words spoken by those within the carriage. Both the children were fast asleep. Poor Kate as they entered Piccadilly, burst into tears; her pent up feelings suddenly gave way, and she cried heartily; Mrs. Aubrey also shedding tears. Mr. Aubrey was calm, but evidently oppressed with profound anxiety. Still he affectionately grasped their hands, and, in something designed for a cheerful tone and manner, besought them to restrain their feelings, and thank Heaven that so far they had got on safely.

"I shall be better presently, Charles," said Miss Aubrey passionately, burying her face in her handkerchief, "but I feel quite afraid of London!"

Over the pavement they rattled, meeting carriages rolling in all directions—for it was about the dinner hour, and in the height of the season; and it was the casual but vivid evidence thus afforded of their desolate position, this sudden glimpse of old familiar scenes, which had momentarily overcome the fortitude of Miss Aubrey. They drove to a quiet family hotel in a retired street running parallel with Piccadilly; they were all wearied, both in mind and body, and after a very slight repast, and much anxious and desponding conversation, they bade each other affectionate adieu, and retired to rest. They rose in the morning refreshed with repose, and in a much more tranquil mood of mind than could have been expected.

"Now, we enter," said Aubrey, with a cheerful smile, "upon the real business of life; so we must discard sentiment—we must not think of the past, but the future."

At their request, they, shortly after breakfast, accompanied him to the house agent, who had been commissioned by Mr. Runnington to look out two or three residences such as, on their arrival in town, they might easily select from. One was particularly recommended to them; and, after due enquiry, within three days after their arrival in town, they engaged it. "It was a small, but convenient, airy, and comfortable house, within five minute's walk of Hyde Park, and situated in Vivian Street—a recent street—and as quiet and retired as they could have wished. The rent, too, was moderate—fifty pounds a year. Though none of the houses in the street were large, they were all strictly private residences, and had an air of thorough respectability. Mr. Aubrey's house had but one window to the dining-room, and two to the drawing-room."

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1841.

THE WAR QUESTION seems to be the all-absorbing topic of the day; and it has gained much additional interest from the fact of news having arrived by the steamer President, of a debate in the British Parliament on the point at issue between Great Britain and the United States, viz: the arrest and approaching trial of McLeod. Indeed, until within a day or two there have been two grounds of contention; but the late news from Washington on the Maine Boundary question is so decidedly pacific, that we may consider it (at least temporarily) settled; and we therefore treat the McLeod affair as the only one deserving much regard.

The official declaration, by Lord Melbourne in the House of Lords, and by Lord Palmerston in the House of Commons, that the British government assumed the responsibility of the destruction of the steamboat Caroline, reduces the matter to a very simple issue. That act, on the part of the authorities of Canada, must be discussed by the respective governments, and the violation of our territory must be atoned for in some adequate and satisfactory manner as speedily as snail-paced negotiation can accomplish so desirable a result. How far England will perseveringly attempt to justify what she does not now hesitate to avow, remains to be seen; and it also remains to be seen, in case such attempt at justification is made, how far our own government will acquiesce in the proceeding. But all this part of the matter is of future concern only: for many months may elapse before any decisive action can be had in the premises.

In the meantime, what is to be done with McLeod? for upon this question all that is of immediate interest depends. The British Government, having assumed the act for an alleged participation in which McLeod is now awaiting his trial, must, and of course will, formally claim his discharge from our authorities, not from the general or state government alternatively; for the British Government can make no distinction: diplomatically, they know but one party in the transaction, and he is the Chief Magistrate of the United States: an attempt on his part to evade the demand, and refer the English Government to the Governor of New York, could be regarded in no other light than a refusal to accede to the claim. Besides what we have said the British Government must and would do in regard to claiming the discharge of McLeod, we may add, it unquestionably has done, through the bearer of despatches who arrived in the President.

Now, in this posture of affairs, one of two things must happen: the President will flatly refuse to surrender McLeod; or, he will despatch a Plenipotentiary Extraordinary to London to answer the demand, guaranteeing McLeod's personal safety in the mean time.

The former of these two things we do not regard as likely to take place; it would be rather too summary a way of treating a momentous subject. Of course the latter event, or something equivalent to it, must, in our judgement, occur; and the result of such a mission will necessarily depend much on the man, and more on his instructions.

But, meanwhile, McLeod must be tried; and if he is acquitted, there is an end of the business. And inasmuch as acquitting a guilty man—supposing him to be guilty—is a very insignificant matter compared with a question of peace or war, we must devoutly hope that such will be the result of the trial: more especially as the fact of his guilt is very doubtful. We will freely acknowledge, however, that if he should be found guilty, the affair would become rather delicate.

Not that we think war would inevitably ensue, even should New-York follow up the verdict by sentence and execution: for we are strongly of the opinion that England would think twice, and look across the channel once, before going to extremities. However, we waive this part of the matter, as being of very improbable occurrence. Indeed, independently of other considerations, it may well be doubted whether it would be proper to hang a man for partially participating in an act, to the commission of which he, in connexion with others, was imperatively ordered by the rulers whom he was legally bound to obey: so that, supposing a verdict of guilty to be rendered, it would, under all the circumstances, be a very proper case for the exercise of executive clemency.

Nevertheless, in contemplation of such a pardon, national honor must not be disregarded. Great Britain might take ground so peremptorily and inopportunistically as to prevent a pardon otherwise inevitable: that is, she might say, before our executive had an opportunity to exercise his prerogative,—if you hang McLeod, we declare war; and this might happen to occur at such a stage of proceedings that it would be difficult to grant even an equitable pardon, lest we should be suspected of having done so under compulsion, or in fear of the consequences of a different course. Should such an unfortunate crisis arrive, everything would depend on the address of our plenipotentiary.

In fact, this functionary may, in a supposable case, have the whole affair in his own hands—viz. our claim for redress in the matter of the Caroline, and the British claim for McLeod's discharge. If the British Government is ready to admit our claim, the release of McLeod—guilty or not guilty—may very properly be made the turning point of the negotiation: we may, with honor, propose to discharge him even under the clearest evidence of guilt, if Great Britain, on her part, will make adequate compensation for her authorized and avowed act. The death of McLeod, under such circumstances, could be of no relative value or importance to us—but his release might, upon a reasonable basis, decide a question of peace or war. Whatever be his merits, we have an equitable claim for redress—and if, in the event, McLeod's position can be made use of to expedite the settlement of that claim, his arrest will prove to have been a very fortunate occurrence. We, certainly, have far greater reason for declaring war if our claim is disregarded, than Great Britain would have in case McLeod were executed: and as the British ministers cannot fail to perceive this, we apprehend that they will be rather glad of the opportunity of making the proper atonement, under cover of our acceding to their own claim for Mr. McLeod's release.

In view of the whole ground, therefore, we come to the conclusion—corresponding to the opinion we have long entertained and frequently expressed—that there is no prospect of war.

LATEST FROM WASHINGTON.

By the Government express, which reached this city at half past 11 o'clock on Thursday night in the unexpired time of ten and a half hours from Washington, we have received the INAUGURAL ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT HARRISON, pronounced by him before an assemblage of some 50,000 citizens at the Capitol on Thursday. We place it before our readers with the greatest possible dispatch. They will not expect any comments at this time; but the Inaugural strikes us on first reading as characterized by great vigor and soundness of thought, clearness and general felicity of expression, and as calculated to add to the great popularity of its illustrious author.

From some unexplained cause, the letter of our special correspondent, descriptive of the Inauguration, did not reach us by the Express, though we had made a liberal disbursement to secure its arrival. We believe the Government Express, arranged by Postmaster NILES, through the liberality of the Railroad Companies, has superseded that arranged by the newspapers of this city; and this has probably been precluded from bringing any thing beside the Inaugural. Further intelligence in our next.

From the Washington papers of Wednesday night and Thursday morning, we learn that the Senate held protracted Executive Sessions on the nights of both Tuesday and Wednesday. From the latter we have no advices; but at the former the Judicial nominations of President Van Buren were all confirmed, including that of Peter V. Daniel to be a Justice of the Supreme Court in place of P. B. BARBOUR, deceased, although the Senate had previously decided by a strong vote to abolish the district (Virginia and North Carolina) from which Mr. Daniel is taken. The Whig Senators had nearly all retired before these appointments were confirmed. The National Intelligencer is very severe upon them.

We understand from Washington that Vice President JOHNSON will give a cordial support to the Administration of his old associate in arms, President HARRISON.

The Twenty-sixth Congress expired by limitation on Wednesday night, leaving full three-fourths of its business unfinished. Not one twentieth of the bills reported by the Committees were definitely acted on. All the regular appropriation bills, however, were passed, with amendments cutting down all the most lucrative offices. The Navy Pension Bill was lost in the Senate—23 to 17. The bill providing for the payment of Maine for her Aroostook War expenses, was passed with an amendment paying a similar claim to Georgia.

The bill reorganizing the Judicial Districts of the United States was in the House. A motion to take it up was lost: Yeas 93 (not two-thirds); nays 72.

Hon. R. M. JOHNSON vacated the chair of the Senate on Tuesday evening. On Wednesday, Hon. WM. R. KING of Alabama, was chosen President pro tem. by 16 votes to 9 for Hon. Samuel Southard and 5 scattering.

Hardly any private bills have passed.

We learn from Richmond that the Which Members of the Virginia Legislature, on Tuesday evening, selected Hon. WILLIAM S. ARCHER, (formerly a distinguished Member of the House) as their candidate for U. S. Senator. The election was to be made the next day. It was rumored that the Van Buren Members had a caucus and agreed to cast their votes for an "Impracticable" Whig, and had hopes of electing him, or preventing a choice.

The Vice President elect (Gov. Tyler) called on the President of the United States (Mr. Van Buren) on Tuesday, by whom he was very courteously received, and on the ex-Vice President, who was not at the moment at home.

From the Washington Globe of Wednesday, March 3d, APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT.

Philemon Dickerson, to be Judge of the United States for the District of New Jersey, in the place of Mahlon Dickerson, resigned.

Peter N. Daniel, of Virginia, to be one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the place of Philip P. Barbour, deceased.

John Y. Mason, of Virginia, to be Judge of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, in the place of Peter V. Daniel.

Solomon Westcott, to be Deputy Postmaster at Hudson, in the State of New York.

John F. Kackler, Collector of the Customs for the District of St. Marks, in the Territory of Florida, vice Francis S. Beattie removed.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS

PRESIDENT HARRISON.

Called from a retirement which I had supposed was to continue for the residue of my life, to fill the chief Executive office of this great and free nation, I appear before you, fellow-citizens, to take the oaths which the Constitution prescribes as a necessary qualification for the performance of its duties. And in obedience to a custom coeval with our Government, and what I believe to be your expectations, I proceed to present to you a summary of the principles which will govern me in the discharge of the duties which I shall be called on to perform.

It was the remark of a Roman Consul, in an early period of that celebrated Republic, that a most striking contrast was observable in the conduct of candidates for offices of power and trust, before and after obtaining them—they seldom carrying out in the latter case the pledges and promises made to the former. However much the world may have improved, in many respects, in the lapse of upward of two thousand years since the remark was made by the virtuous and indignant Roman, I fear that a strict examination of the annals of some of the modern elective Governments would develop similar instances of violated confidence.

Although the fiat of the People has gone forth, proclaiming me the Chief Magistrate of this glorious Union, nothing on their part remaining to be done, it may be thought that a motive may exist to keep up the delusion under which they may be supposed to have acted in relation to my principles and opinions; and perhaps there may be some in this assembly who have come here either prepared to condemn those I shall now deliver, or, approving them, to doubt the sincerity with which they are uttered. But the lapse of a few months will confirm or dispel their fears. The outline of principles to govern, and measures to be adopted by an Administration not yet begun, will soon be exchanged for immutable history, and I shall stand, either exonerated by my countrymen, or classed with the mass of those who promised that they might deceive, and flattered with the intention to betray.

However strong may be my present purpose to realize the expectations of a magnanimous and confiding People, I too well understand the infirmities of human nature, and the dangerous temptations to which I shall be exposed from the magnitude of the power which it has been the pleasure of the People to commit to my hands, not to place my chief confidence upon the aid of the Almighty Power, which has hitherto protected me, and enabled me to bring to favorable issues other important but still greatly inferior trusts, heretofore confided to me by my country.

The broad foundation upon which our Constitution rests being the People—a breath of theirs having made, as a breath can unmake, change, or modify it—it can be assigned to none of the great divisions of Government but to that of Democracy. If such is its theory, those who are called upon to administer it must recognise, as its leading principle, the duty of shaping their measures so as to produce the greatest good to the greatest number. But, with these broad admissions, if we would compare the sovereignty acknowledged to exist in the mass of our People with the power claimed by other sovereignties, even by those which have been considered most purely democratic, we shall find a most essential difference. All others lay claim to power limited only to their own will. The majority of our citizens, on the contrary, possess a sovereignty with an amount of power precisely equal to that which has been granted to them by the parties to the national compact, and nothing beyond. We admit of no Government by Divine right; believing that, so far as power is concerned, the beneficent Creator has made no distinction among men, that all are on an equality, and that the only legitimate right to govern is an express grant of power from the governed. The Constitution of the United States is the instrument containing this grant of power to the repreral departments composing the Government. On an examination of that instrument, it will be found to contain declarations of power granted, and of power withheld.—The latter is also susceptible of division into power which the majority had the right to grant, but which they did not think proper to entrust to their agents, and that which they could not have granted, not being possessed themselves. In other words, there are certain rights possessed by each individual American citizen, which, in his compact with the others, he has never surrendered. Some of them, indeed, he is unable to surrender, being, in the language of our system, unalienable.

The boasted privilege of a Roman citizen was to him a shield only against a petty provincial ruler, whilst the proud democrat of Athens could console himself under a sentence of death, for a supposed violation of the national faith, which no one understood, and which at times was the subject of the mockery of all, or of banishment from his home, his family, and his country, with or without an alleged cause; that it was the act not of a single tyrant, or hated aristocracy, but of his assembled countrymen. Far different is the power of our sovereignty. It can interfere with no one's faith, prescribe forms of worship for no one's observance, inflict no punishment but after well-ascertained guilt, the result of investigation under forms prescribed by the Constitution itself. These precious privileges, and those scarcely less important of giving expression to his thoughts and opinions, either by writing or speaking, unrestrained but by the liability for injury to others, and that of a full participation in all the advantages which flow from the Government, the acknowledged property of all, the American citizen derives from no charter granted by his fellow-man. He claims them because he is himself a man, fashioned by the same Almighty hand as the rest of his species, and entitled to a full share of the blessings with which he has endowed them.

Notwithstanding the limited sovereignty possessed by the People of the United States, and the restricted grant of power to the Government which they have adopted, enough has been given to accomplish all the objects for which it was created. It has been found powerful in war, and, hitherto, justice has been administered, an intimate union effected, domestic tranquility preserved, and personal liberty secured to the citizen. As was to be expected, however, from the defect of language, and the necessarily tentative manner in which the Constitution is written, disputes have arisen as to the amount of power which it has actually granted, or was intended to grant. This is more particularly the case in relation to that part of the instrument which treats of the legislative branch. And not only as regards the exercise of powers claimed under a general clause, giving that body the authority to pass all laws necessary to carry into effect the specified powers, but in relation to the latter also. It is, however, consolatory to reflect that most of the instances of alleged departure from the letter or spirit of the Constitution have ultimately received the sanction of a majority of the People. And the fact, that many of our statesmen, most distinguished for talent and patriotism, have been, at one time or other of their political career, on both sides of each of the most warmly-disputed questions, forces upon us the inference that the errors, if errors there were, are attributable to the intrinsic difficulty, in many instances, of ascertaining the intention of the framers of the Constitution, rather than the influence of any sinister or unpatriotic motive.

But the great danger to our institutions does not appear to me to be in a usurpation, by the Government, of power not granted by the People, but by the accumulation, in one of the departments, of that which was assigned to others. Limited as are the powers which have been granted, still enough have been granted to constitute a despotism, if concentrated in one of the departments. The danger is greatly heightened, as it has always been observable that men are less jealous of encroachments of one department upon another, than upon their own reserved rights.

When the Constitution of the United States first came from the hands of the Convention which formed it, many of the sternest republicans of the day were alarmed at the extent of the power which had been granted to the Federal Government, and more particularly of that portion which had been assigned to the Executive branch. There were in it features which appeared not to be in harmony with their ideas of a simple representative democracy, or republic. And knowing the tendency of power to increase itself, particularly when executed by a single individual, predictions were made that, at no very remote period, the Government would terminate in virtual monarchy. It would not become me to say that the fears of these patriots have been already realized. But, as I sincerely believe that the tendency of measures, and of men's opinions, for some years past, has been in that direction, it is, I conceive, strictly proper that I should take this occasion to repeat the assurances I have heretofore given, of my determination to arrest the progress of that tendency, if it really exists, and restore the Government to its pristine health and vigor, as far as this can be affected by any legitimate exercise of the power placed in my hands.

I proceed to state, in as summary a manner as I can, my opinion of the sources of the evils which have been so extensively complained of, and the correctives which may be applied. Some of the former are unquestionably to be found in the defects of the Constitution; others, in my judgement, are attributable to a misconstruction of some of its provisions. Of the former is the eligibility of the same individual to a second term of the Presidency. The sagacious mind of Mr. Jefferson early saw and lamented this error, and attempts have been made, hitherto without success, to apply the amendatory power of the States to its correction.

As, however, one mode of correction is in the power of every President, and consequently in mine, it would be useless, and perhaps invidious, to enumerate the evils of which, in the opinion of many of our fellow-citizens, this error of the sages who framed the Constitution may have been the source, and the bitter fruits which we are still to gather from it if it continues to disfigure our system. It may be observed, however, as a general remark, that republics can commit no greater error than to adopt or continue any feature in their systems of government which may be calculated to create or increase the love of power in the bosoms of those to whom necessity obliges them to commit the management of their affairs. And surely nothing is more likely to produce such a state of mind than the long continuance of an office of high trust. Nothing can be more corrupting, nothing more destructive of all those noble feelings which belong to the character of a devoted republican patriot. When this corrupting passion once takes possession of the human mind, like the love of gold, it becomes insatiable. It is the never-dying worm to his bosom, grows with his growth, and strengthens with the declining years of its victim. If this is true, it is the part of wisdom for a republic to limit the service of that officer, at least, to whom she has entrusted the management of her foreign relations, the execution of her laws, and the command of her armies and navies, to a period so short as to prevent his forgetting that he is the accountable agent, not the principal—the servant, not the master. Until an amendment of the Constitution can be effected, public opinion may secure the desired object. I give my aid to it by renewing the pledge heretofore given, that, under no circumstances, will I consent to serve a second term.

But if there is danger to public liberty from the acknowledged defects of the Constitution, in the want of limit to the continuance of the Executive power in the same hands, there is, I apprehend, not much less from a misconstruction of that instrument, as it regards the power actually given. I cannot conceive that, by a fair construction, any or either of its provisions would be found to constitute the President a part of the legislative power. It cannot be claimed from the power to recommend, since, although enjoined as a duty upon him, it is a privilege which he holds in common with every other citizen. And although there may be something more of confidence in the propriety of the measures recommended in the one case than in the other, in the obligations of ultimate decision there can be no difference. In the language of the Constitution, "all the legislative powers" which it grants "are vested in the Congress of the United States." It would be a solecism in language to say that any portion of these is not included in the whole.

It may be said, indeed, that the Constitution has given to the Executive the power to annul the acts of the Legislative body by refusing to them his assent. So a similar power has necessarily resulted from that instrument to the Judiciary: and yet the Judiciary forms no part of the Legislature. There is, it is true, this difference between these grants of power: the Executive can put his negative upon the acts of the Legislature for other cause than that of want of conformity to the Constitution, whilst the Judiciary can only declare void those which violate that instrument. But the decision of the Judiciary is final in such a case, whereas, in every instance where the veto of the Executive is applied, it may be overcome by a vote of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress. The negative upon the acts of the Legislative, by the Executive authority, and that in the hands of one individual, would seem to be an incongruity in our system. Like some others of a similar character, however, it appears to be highly expedient; and if used only with the forbearance and in the spirit which was intended by its authors, it may be productive of great good, and be found one of the best safeguards to the Union.

At the period of the formation of the Constitution, the principle does not appear to have enjoyed much favor in the State Governments. It existed but in two, and in one of these there was a plural Executive. If we would search for the motives which operated upon the purely patriotic and enlightened assembly who framed the Constitution, for the adoption of a provision so apparently repugnant to the leading democratic principle, that the majority should govern, we must reject the idea that they anticipated from it any benefit to the ordinary course of legislation. They knew too well the high degree of intelligence which existed among the People, and the enlightened character of the State Legislatures, not to have the fullest confidence that the two bodies elected by them would be worthy representatives of such constituents, and, of course, that they would require no aid in conceiving and maturing the measures which the circumstances of the country might require. And it is preposterous to suppose that a thought could for a moment have been entertained that the President, placed at the capital, in the centre of the country, could better understand the wants and wishes of the People than their own immediate Representatives, who spend a part of every year among them, living with them, often laboring with them, and bound to them by the triple tie of interest, duty, and affection. To assist or control Congress, then, in its ordinary legislation, could not, I conceive, have been the motive for conferring the veto power on the President. This argument acquires additional force from the fact of its never having been thus used by the first six Presidents—and two of them were members of the Convention, one presiding over its deliberations, and the other having a larger share in consummating the labors of that august body than any other person. But if bills were never returned to Congress by either of the Presidents above referred to, upon the ground of their being inexpedient, or not as well adapted as they might be to the wants of the People, the veto was applied upon that of want of conformity to the Constitution, or because errors had been committed from too hasty enactment.

There is another ground for the adoption of the veto principle, which had probably more influence in recommending it to the convention than any other. I refer to the security which it gives to the just and equitable action of the Legislature upon all parts of the Union. It could not but have occurred to the convention that, in a country so extensive, embracing so great a variety of soil and climate, and, consequently, of products, and which, from the same causes, must ever exhibit a great difference in the amount of the population of its various sections, calling for a great diversity in the employments of the People, that the legislation of the majority might not always justly regard the rights and interests of the minority; and that acts of this character might be passed, under an express grant by the words of the Constitution, and, therefore, not within the competency of the Judiciary to declare void. That however enlightened and patriotic they might suppose, from past experience, the Members of Congress might be, and however largely partaking, in the general, of liberal feelings of the People, it was impossible to expect that bodies so constituted should not sometimes be controlled by local interests and sectional feelings. It was proper, therefore, to provide some umpire, from whose situation and mode of appointment more independence and freedom from such influences might be expected. Such a one was afforded by the Executive Department, constituted by the Constitution. A person elected to that high office, having his constituents in every section, State, and subdivision of the Union, must consider himself bound by the most solemn sanctions, to guard, protect, and defend the rights of all, and of every portion, great or small, from the injustice and oppression of the rest. I consider the veto power, therefore, given by the Constitution to the Executive of the United States, solely as a conservative power: to be used only, 1st, to protect the Constitution from violation; 2dly, the People from the effects of hasty legislation, where their will has been probably disregarded or not well understood; and, 3dly, to prevent the effects of combinations violative of the rights of minorities. In reference to the second of these objects, I may observe that I consider it the right and privilege of the People to decide disputed points of the Constitution, arising from the general grant of power to Congress to carry into effect the power expressly given. And I believe, with Mr. Madison, "that repeated recognitions under varied circumstances, in acts of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government, accompanied by indications in different modes of the concurrence of the general will of the nation, as affording to the President sufficient authority for his considering such disputed points as settled."

Upwards of half a century has elapsed since the adoption of our present form of Government. It would be an object more highly desirable than the gratification of the curiosity of speculative statesmen, if its precise situation could be ascertained, a fair exhibit made of the operations of each of its Departments, of the powers which they respectively claim and exercise, of the collisions which have occurred between them, or between the whole Government and those of the States, or either of them. We could then compare our actual condition, after fifty years' trial of our system, with what it was in the commencement of its operations, and ascertain whether the predictions of the patriots who opposed its adoption, or the confident hopes of its advocates have been best realized. The great dread of the former seems to have been, that the reserved powers of the States would be absorbed by those of the Federal Government, and a consolidated power established, leaving to the States the shadow only, of that independent action for which they had so zealously contended, and on the preservation of which they relied as the last hope of liberty. Without denying that the result to which they looked with so much apprehension is in the way of being realized, it is obvious that they did not clearly see the mode of its accomplishment. The General Government has seized upon none of the reserved rights of the States. As far as any open warfare may have gone, the State authorities have amply maintained their rights. To a casual observer, our system presents no appearance of discord between the different members which compose it. Even the addition of many new ones has produced no jarring. They move in their respective orbits in perfect harmony with the central head, and with each other. But there is still an under current at work, by which, if not seasonably checked, the worst apprehensions of our anti-federal patriots will be realized. And not only will the State authorities be overshadowed by the great increase of power in the Executive Department of the General Government, but the character of that Government, if not its designation, be essentially and radically changed. This state of things has been in part effected by causes inherent in the Constitution, and in part by the never-failing tendency of political power to increase itself.

By making the President the sole distributor of all the patronage of the Government, the framers of the Constitution do not appear to have anticipated at how short a period it would become a formidable instrument to control the free operations of the State Governments. Of trifling importance at first, it had, early in Mr. Jefferson's Administration, become so powerful as to create great alarm in the mind of that patriot, from the potent influence it might exert in controlling the freedom of the elective franchise. If such could have then been the effects of its influence, how much greater must be the danger at this time, quadrupled in amount, as it certainly is, and more completely under the control of the Executive will than their construction of their powers allowed, or the forbearing characters of all the early Presidents permitted them to make! But it is not by the extent of its patronage alone that the Executive Department has become dangerous, but by the use which it appears may be made of the appointing power, to bring under its control the whole revenues of the country. The Constitution has declared it to be the duty of the President to see that the laws are executed, and it makes him the Commander-in-Chief of the Armies and Navy of the United States. If the opinion of the most approved writers upon that species of mixed Government which, in modern Europe, is termed Monarchy, in contradistinction to Despotism, is correct, there was wanting no other addition to the powers of our Chief Magistrate to stamp a monarchical character on our Government but the control of the public finances. And to me it appears strange, indeed, that any one should doubt that the entire control which the President possesses over the officers who have the custody of the public money, by the power of removal with or without cause, does, for all mischievous purposes at least, virtually subject the treasure also to his disposal.

The first Roman Emperor, in his attempt to seize the sacred treasure, silenced the opposition of the officer to whose charge it had been committed, by a significant allusion to his sword. By a selection of political instruments for the care of the public money, a reference to their commissions by a President, would be quite as effectual an argument as that of Cæsar to the Roman Knight. I am not insensible of the great difficulty that exists in devising a proper plan for the safe-keeping and disbursement of the public revenues, and I know the importance which has been attached by men of great abilities and patriotism to the divorce, as it is called, of the Treasury from the banking institutions. It is not the divorce which is complained of, but the unallowed union of the Treasury with the Executive Department which has created such extensive alarm. To this danger to our republican institutions, and that created by the influence given to the Executive through the instrumentality of the federal officers, I propose to apply all the remedies which may be at my command. It was certainly a great error in the framers of the Constitution, not to have made the officer at the head of the Treasury Department entirely independent of the Executive. He should at least have been removable only upon the demand of the popular branch of the Legislature. I have determined never to remove a Secretary of the Treasury without communicating all the circumstances attending such removal to both Houses of Congress. The influence of the Executive in controlling the freedom of the elective franchise through the medium of the public officers can be effectually checked by renewing the prohibition published by Mr. Jefferson, forbidding their interference in elections, further than giving their own votes; and their own independence secured by an assurance of perfect immunity, in exercising this sacred privilege of freemen under the dictates of their own unbiased judgements. Never, with my consent, shall an officer of the People, compensated for his services out of their pockets, become the pliant instrument of Executive will.

There is no part of the means placed in the hands of the Executive which might be used with greater effect, for unhallowed purposes, than the control of the public press. The maxim which our ancestors derived from the mother country, that "the freedom of the press is the great bulwark of civil and religious liberty," is one of the most precious legacies which they have left us. We have learned, from our own as well as the experience of other countries, that golden shackles, by whomsoever or by whatever pretence imposed, are as fatal to it as the iron bonds of Despotism. The presses in the necessary employ of the Government should never be used 'to clear the guilty or to varnish crimes.' A decent and manly examination of the acts of the Government should be not only tolerated but encouraged.

Upon another occasion I have given my opinion, at some length, upon the impropriety of Executive interference in the legislation of Congress. That the article in the Constitution making it the duty of the President to communicate information, and authorizing him to recommend measures, was not intended to make him the source of legislation, and in particular that he should never be looked to for schemes of finance. It would be very strange, indeed, that the Constitution should have strictly forbidden one branch of the Legislature from interfering in the origination of such bill, and that it should be considered proper that an altogether different department of the Government should be permitted to do so. Some of our best political maxims and opinions have been drawn from our parent Isle.

There are others, however, which cannot be introduced in our system without singular incongruity, and the production of much mischief. And this I conceive to be one. No matter in which of the Houses of Parliament a bill may originate, nor by whom introduced, a minister, or a member or a member of the opposition, by the fiction of law, or rather of Constitutional principle, the Sovereign is supposed to have prepared it agreeably to his will, and then submitted it to Parliament for their advice and consent. Now, the very reverse is the case here, not only with regard to the principle, but the forms prescribed by the Constitution. The principle certainly assigns to the only body constituted by the Constitution, (the legislative body,) the power to make laws, and the forms even direct that the enactment should be ascribed to them. The Senate, in relation to Revenue bills, have the right to propose amendments; and so has the Executive, by the power given him to return them to the House of Representatives, with his objections. It is in his power, also, to propose amendments in the existing revenue laws, suggested by his observations upon their defective or injurious operation. But the delicate duty of devising schemes of revenue should be left where the Constitution has placed it—with the immediate representatives of the People. For similar reasons, the mode of keeping the public treasure should be prescribed by them; and the farther removed it may be from the control of the Executive, the more wholesome the arrangement, and the more in accordance with Republican principle.

Connected with this subject is the character of the currency. The idea of making it exclusively metallic, however well intended, appears to me to be fraught with more fatal consequences than any other scheme, having no relation to the personal rights of the citizen, that has ever been devised. If any single scheme could produce the effect of arresting, at once, that mutation of condition by which thousands of our most indigent fellow-citizens, by their industry and enterprise, are raised to the possession of wealth, that is the one. If there is one measure better calculated than another to produce that state of things so much decried by all true republicans, by which the rich are daily adding to their hoards, and the poor sinking deeper into penury, it is an exclusive metallic currency. Or if there is a process by which the character of the country for generosity and nobleness of feeling may be destroyed by the great increase and necessary toleration of usury, it is an exclusive metallic currency.

Amongst the other duties of a delicate character which the President is called upon to perform, is the supervision of the government of the Territories of the United States. Those of them which are destined to become members of our great political family, are compensated by their rapid progress from infancy to manhood, for the partial and temporary deprivation of their political rights. It is in this District, only, where American citizens are to be found, who, under a settled system of policy, are deprived of many important political privileges, without any inspiring hope as to the future. Their only consolation, under circumstances of such deprivation, is that of the devoted exterior guards of a camp—that their sufferings secure tranquility and safety within. Are there any of their countrymen who would subject them to greater sacrifices, to any other humiliations than those essentially necessary to the security of the object for which they were thus separated from their fellow-citizens? Are their rights alone not to be guaranteed by the application of those great principles upon which all our constitutions are founded? We are told by the greatest of British Orators and Statesmen, that, at the commencement of the war of the Revolution, the most stupid men in England spoke of "their American subjects." Are there, indeed, citizens of any of our States who have dreamed of their subjects in the District of Columbia? Such dreams can never be realized by any agency of mine.

The people of the District of Columbia are not the subjects of the people of the States, but free American citizens. Being in the latter condition when the Constitution was formed, no words used in that instrument could have been intended to deprive them of that character. If there is any thing in the great principles of unalienable rights, so emphatically insisted upon in our Declaration of Independence, they could neither make, nor the United States accept, a surrender of their liberties, and become the subjects, in other words, the slaves, of their former fellow citizens. If this be true, and it will scarcely be denied by any one who has a correct idea of his own rights as an American citizen, the grant to Congress of exclusive jurisdiction in the District of Columbia, can be interpreted, so far as respects the aggregate people of the United States, as meaning nothing more than to allow to Congress the controlling power necessary to afford a free and safe exercise of the functions assigned to the General Government by the Constitution. In all other respects, the legislation of Congress should be adapted to their peculiar positions and wants, and be conformable with their deliberate opinions of their own interests.

I have spoken of the necessity of keeping the respective Departments of the Government, as well as all the other authorities of our country, within their appropriate orbits. This is a matter of difficulty in some cases, as the powers which they respectively claim are often not defined by very distinct lines. Mischievous, however, in their tendencies, as collisions of this kind may be, those which arise between the respective communities, which for certain purposes compose one nation, are much more so; for no such nation can long exist without the careful culture of those feelings of confidence and affection which are the effective bonds of union between free and confederated States. Strong as is the ties of interest, it has been often found ineffectual. Men, blinded by their passions, have been known to adopt measures for their country in direct opposition to all the suggestions of policy. The alternative, then, is, to destroy or keep down a bad passion by creating and fostering a good one; and this seems to be the corner stone upon which our American political architects have reared the fabric of our Government. The cement which was to bind it, and perpetuate its existence, was the affectionate attachment between all its members. To insure the continuance of this feeling, produced at first by a community of dangers, of sufferings, and of interests, the advantages of each were made accessible to all.

No participation in any good, possessed by any member of an extensive confederacy, except in domestic government, was withheld from the citizen of any other member. By a process attended with no difficulty, no delay, no expense but that of removal, the citizen of one might become the citizen of any other, and successively of the whole. The lines, too, separating powers to be exercised by the citizens of one State from those of another, seem to be so distinctly drawn as to leave no room for misunderstanding. The citizens of each State unite in their persons all the privileges which that character confers, and all that they may claim as citizens of the United States; but in no case can the same person, at the same time, act as the citizen of two separate States, and he is therefore positively precluded from any interference with the reserved powers of any State but that of which he is, for the time being, a citizen. He may indeed offer to the citizens of other States his advice as to their management, and the form in which it is tendered is left to his own discretion and sense of propriety.

It may be observed, however, that organized associations of citizens, requiring compliances with their wishes, too much resemble the recommendations of Athens to her allies, supported by an armed and powerful fleet. It was, indeed, to the ambition of the leading States of Greece to control the domestic concerns of the others, that the destruction of that celebrated confederacy, and subsequently of all its members, is mainly to be attributed. And it is owing to the absence of that spirit that the Helvetic confederacy has for so many years been preserved. Never has there been seen in the institutions of the separate members of any confederacy more elements of discord. In the principles and forms of government and religion, as well as in the circumstances of the several cantons, so marked a discrepancy was observable, as to promise any thing but harmony in their intercourse or permanency in their alliance. And yet, for ages, neither has been interrupted. Content with the positive benefits which their union produced, with the independence and safety from foreign aggression which it secured, these sagacious People respected the institutions of each other, however repugnant to their own principles and prejudices.

Our Confederacy, fellow-citizens, can only be preserved by the same forbearance. Our citizens must be content with the exercise of the powers with which the Constitution clothes them. The attempt of those of one State to control the domestic institutions of another can only result in feelings of distrust and jealousy, the certain harbingers of disunion, violence, civil war, and the ultimate destruction of our free institutions. Our Confederacy is perfectly illustrated by the terms and principles governing a common co-partnership. There a fund of power is to be exercised under the direction of the joint councils of the allied members, but that which has been reserved by the individual members is intangible by the common government or the individual members composing it. To attempt it finds no support in the principles of our Constitution. It should be our constant and earnest endeavor mutually to cultivate a spirit of concord and harmony among the various parts of our Confederacy. Experience has abundantly taught us that the agitation by citizens of one part of the Union of a subject not confided to the General Government, but exclusively under the guardianship of the local authorities, is productive of no other consequences than bitterness, alienation, discord, and injury to the very cause which is intended to be advanced. Of all the great interests which appertain to our country, that of union, cordial, confiding, fraternal union, is by far the most important, since it is the only true and sure guaranty of all others.

In consequence of the embarrassed state of business and the currency, some of the States may meet with difficulty in their financial concerns. However deeply we may regret any thing imprudent or excessive in the engagements into which States have entered for purposes of their own, it does not become us to disparage the State Governments, nor to discourage them from making proper efforts for their own relief; on the contrary, it is our duty to encourage them, to the extent of our constitutional authority, to apply their best means, and cheerfully to make all necessary sacrifices and submit to all necessary burdens to fulfil their engagements and maintain their credit; for the character and credit of the several States form part of the character and credit of the whole country. The resources of the country are abundant, the enterprise and activity of our people proverbial; and we may well hope that wise legislation and prudent administration, by the respective Governments, each acting within its own sphere, will restore former prosperity.

Unpleasant and even dangerous as collisions may sometimes be, between the constituted authorities or the citizens of our country, in relation to the lines which separate their respective jurisdictions, the results can be of no vital injury to our institutions, if that ardent patriotism, that devoted attachment to liberty, that spirit of moderation and forbearance for which our countrymen were once distinguished, continue to be cherished. If this continues to be the ruling passion of our souls, the weaker feelings of the mistaken enthusiast will be corrected, the Utopian dreams of the scheming politician dissipated, and the complicated intrigues of the demagogue rendered harmless. The spirit of liberty is the sovereign balm for every injury which our institutions may receive. On the contrary, no care that can be used in the construction of our Governments, no division of powers, no distribution of checks in its several departments, will prove effectual to keep us a free People, if this spirit is suffered to decay; and decay it will without constant nurture. To the neglect of this duty, the best historians agree in attributing the ruin of all the Republics with whose existence and fall their writings have made us acquainted. The same causes will ever produce the same effects; and as long as the love of power is a dominant passion of the human bosom, and as long as the understandings of men can be warped and their affections changed by operations upon their passions and prejudices, so long will the liberty of a people depend on their own constant attention to its preservation.

The danger to all well-established free Governments arises from the unwillingness of the People to believe in its existence, or from the influence of designing men, diverting their attention from the quarter whence it approaches, to a source from which it can never come. This is the old trick of those who would usurp the Government of their country. In the name of Democracy they speak, warning the People against the influence of wealth and the danger of aristocracy. History, ancient and modern, is full of such examples. Cæsar became the master of the Roman people and the Senate, under the pretence of supporting the democratic claims of the former against the aristocracy of the latter; Cromwell, in the character of Protector of the liberties of the People, became the Dictator of England; and Bolivar possessed himself of unlimited power, with the title of his country's Liberator. There is, on the contrary, no single instance on record of an extensive and well-established republic being changed into an aristocracy. The tendencies of all such governments in their decline is to monarchy; and the antagonist principle to liberty there is the spirit of faction—a spirit which assumes the character, and in times of great excitement imposes itself upon the People as the genuine spirit of freedom, and like the false Christs whose coming was foretold by the Saviour, seeks to, and were it possible, would impose upon the true and most faithful disciples of liberty.

It is in periods like this that it behooves the People to be most watchful of those to whom they have intrusted power. And although there is at times much difficulty in distinguishing the false from the true spirit, a calm and dispassionate investigation will detect the counterfeit as well by the character of its operations, as the results that are produced. The true spirit of liberty, although devoted, persevering, bold, and uncompromising in principle, that secured, is mild, and tolerant, and scrupulous as to the means it employs; whilst the spirit of party assuming to be that of liberty, is harsh, vindictive, and intolerant, and totally reckless as to the character of the allies which it brings to the aid of its cause. When the genuine spirit of liberty animates the body of a people to a thorough examination of their affairs, it leads to the excision of every excrescence which may have fastened itself upon say of the Departments of the Government, and restores the system to its pristine health and beauty. But the reign of an intolerant spirit of party among a free people, seldom fails to result in a dangerous accession to the Executive power introduced and established amidst unusual professions of devotion to democracy.

The foregoing remarks relate almost exclusively to matters connected with our domestic concerns. It may be proper, however, that I should give some indications to my fellow-citizens of my proposed course of conduct in the management of our foreign relations. I assure them, therefore, that it is my intention to use every means in my power to preserve the friendly intercourse which now so happily subsists with every foreign nation; and that, although, of course, not well informed as to the state of any pending negotiations with any of them, I see in the personal characters of the Sovereigns, as well as in the mutual interest of our own and of the Government with which our relations are most intimate, a pleasing guaranty that the harmony so important to the interests of their subjects, as well as our citizens, will not be interrupted by the advancement of any claim, or pretension upon their part to which our honor would not permit us to yield. Long the defender of my country's rights in the field, I trust that my fellow-citizens will not see in my earnest desire to preserve peace with foreign Powers, any indication that their rights will ever be sacrificed, or the honor of the nation tarnished, by any admission on the part of their Chief Magistrate unworthy of their former glory.

In our intercourse with our Aboriginal neighbors, the same liberality and justice, which marked the course prescribed to me by two of my illustrious predecessors, when acting under their direction in the discharge of the duties of Superintendent and Commissioner, shall be strictly observed. I can conceive of no more sublime spectacle—none more likely to propitiate an impartial and common Creator, than a rigid adherence to the principles of justice on the part of a powerful nation in its transactions with a weaker and uncivilized people, whom circumstances have placed at its disposal.

Before concluding, fellow-citizens, I must say something to you on the subject of the parties at this time existing in our country. To me it appears perfectly clear, that the interest of that country requires that the violence of the spirit by which those spirits are governed, must be greatly mitigated, if not entirely extinguished, or consequences will ensue which are appalling to be thought of. If parties in a Republic are necessary to secure a degree of vigilance sufficient to keep the public functionaries within the bounds of law and duty, at that point their usefulness ends. Beyond that they become destructive of public virtue, the parents of a spirit antagonist to that of liberty, and, eventually, its inevitable conqueror.

We have examples of Republics, where the love of country and of liberty, at one time, were the dominant passions of the whole mass of citizens. And yet, with the continuance of the names and forms of free Government, not a vestige of these qualities remaining in the bosom of any one of its citizens. It was the beautiful remark of a distinguished English writer, that "in the Roman Senate, Octavius had a party, and Anthony a party, but the Commonwealth had none." Yet the Senate continued to meet in the Temple of Liberty, to talk of the sacredness and beauty of the Commonwealth, and gaze at the statue of the elder Brutus and of the Curtii and Decii. And the people assembled in the forum, not as in the days of Camillus and the Scipios, to cast their free votes for annual Magistrates, or pass upon the acts of the Senate, but to receive from the hands of the leaders of the respective parties their share of the spoils, and to shout for one, or the other, as those collected in Gaul, or Egypt, and the Lesser Asia, would furnish the larger dividend. The spirit of liberty had fled, and, avoiding the abodes of civilized man, had sought protection in the wilds of Scythia or Scandinavia; and so, under the operation of the same causes and influences, it will fly from our Capitol and our forums. A calamity so awful, not only to our country but to the world, must be deprecated by every patriot; and every tendency to a state of things likely to produce it immediately checked. Such a tendency has existed—does exist.

Always the friends of my countrymen, never their flatterer, it becomes my duty to say to them from this high place to which their partiality has exalted me, that there exists in the land a spirit hostile to their best interests—hostile to liberty itself. It is a spirit contracted in its views, selfish in its object. It looks to the aggrandisement of a few, even to the destruction of the interest of the whole. The entire remedy is with the People. Something, however, may be effected by the means which they have placed in my hands. It is union that we want, not of a party for the sake of that party, but a union of the whole country for the sake of the whole country—for the defence of its interests and its honor against foreign aggression, for the defence of those principles for which our ancestors so gloriously contended. As far as it depends upon me, it shall be accomplished. All the influence that I possess shall be exerted to prevent the formation at least of an Executive party in the halls of the Legislative body. I wish for the support of no member of that body to any measure of mine that does not satisfy his judgment and his sense of duty to those from whom he holds his appointment; nor any confidence in advance from the People, but that asked for by Mr. Jefferson, "to give firmness and effect to the legal administration of their affairs."

I deem the present occasion sufficiently important and solemn to justify me in expressing to my fellow-citizens a profound reverence for the Christian Religion, and a thorough conviction that sound morals, religious liberty, and a just sense of religious responsibility, are essentially connected with all true and lasting happiness; and to that good Being who has blessed us by the gifts of civil and religious freedom, who watched over and prospered the labors of our Fathers, and has hitherto preserved to us institutions far exceeding in excellence those of any other people, let us unite in fervently commending every interest of our beloved country in all future time.

Fellow-citizens: Being fully invested with that high office to which the partiality of my countrymen has called me, I now take an affectionate leave of you. You will bear with you to your homes the remembrance of the pledge I have this day given to discharge all the high duties of my exalted station, according to the best of my ability; and I shall enter upon their performance with entire confidence in the support of a just and generous People.

ARRIVAL OF THE PRESIDENT. SIX DAYS LATER.

The steamship President arrived on Wednesday. We give below a letter from our London Correspondent, and an interesting debate which took place in the British Parliament, with regard to the case of McLeod.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

LONDON, Tuesday, February 9, 1841.

An overland express from India was received on Saturday, bringing intelligence from Canton down to the 3d November. The intelligence is very unsatisfactory, as it leaves the negotiations between Admiral Elliot and the Chinese authorities in the same state as they were at the date of the accounts received from Canton four weeks ago. The only facts of importance contained in the despatches now received are, that the Chinese have given up Commissioner Lin to the English, and that his successor has proceeded from Peking to Canton for the purpose of proceeding with the negotiations. Sickness prevails to the extent of about forty per cent. among the English troops.

Mr. Sergeant Talfourd's copyright bill was lost in the House of Commons on the second reading, on Friday night. The majority against it was seven. The unexpected result was brought about by a most splendid speech by Mr. Macaulay, in opposition to the measure.

The severity of the weather for the last eight days has been almost unprecedented in this country. There have been various instances of able-bodied men having been frozen to death while walking in the public roads.

The Royal christening takes place to-morrow. It was currently reported a few days ago, that the ceremony was to be postponed till the 16th inst.; but it now appears the rumor was without foundation. The King and Queen of Belgium are hourly expected to arrive in this country to be present on the occasion. The ceremony, owing to the inclemency of the weather, is not to take place, as at one time intended, in the Royal Chapel, but in Buckingham Palace.

From the London Standard of February 11.
THE CASE OF McLEOD.

Lord Stanley's questions to Lord Palmerston, touching the ominous aspect of our relations with the republic of the United States "came off," as the phrase is, yesterday, in the house of commons. The result was what every one acquainted with the manoeuvres of our Foreign Secretary foresaw—a shuffling assurance that he had done his duty—that her majesty's government would do its duty—that the case was a delicate one—the old Palmerston tale of "pending negotiations," and therefore, with a view to "public interest," which often signifies nothing more than the "personal convenience" of a certain noble Viscount, it required to be treated with "great reserve both by Lord Stanley and by himself."

The noble member for North Lancashire gave the House a lucid, and at the same time a naked, narrative of the events connected with the revolting case of the Caroline—the atrocious outrages which that vessel had been employed to perpetrate; the substantial and manifest justice of the act by which she was destroyed; the remonstrances of the American government, and its demands of reparation from the government of Great Britain, which was the aggrieved one; the seeming stagnation of the subject ever since, in so far as any approach to a right understanding upon it was concerned; and the fearful nature of the recent proceedings by the state of New York, by the seizure, imprisonment, and threatened trial of Mr. McLeod, a British officer, who, if he acted at all on the occasion of the Caroline, had avowedly done so by orders of the colonial authorities of his sovereign.

Lord Stanley conducted his address to the House and to Lord Palmerston with consummate prudence and discretion. He gave the facts, and not a word more. He took care not to compromise himself, or to extricate, or in any manner to relieve the ministers, by declaring any opinion of his own. He made a case of the most glaring probability of extreme neglect of duty by Lord Palmerston, who, in three years, had not written one producible despatch in reply to the American demand of reparation, or enabled Mr. Fox to clear away the difficulties which it entailed upon the government, or the dangers in which our countrymen were thereby involved. The noble Lord then demanded from Lord Palmerston such papers as might qualify the people of England to form a judgment upon the relations subsisting between us and the United States, no less than on the conduct of the Foreign Secretary.

The answer was as we have before described it—"There are negotiations pending," and therefore inaccessible to all the world but myself; so that whether I managed them well or ill—towards a beneficial result, or one ever so disastrous, you shall not know a word about the matter until all is ended, whether for peace or war!" Now, is not this cool on the part of an English minister? The Americans allow no such latitude to their public servants. They don't beg for papers; they insist upon having them; and the only documents with which, on this occasion, Lord Palmerston deigned to indulge the house of commons were those which had already been laid before congress, and were to be found in all the newspapers.

One question might have been put, but was not—namely, "Have you, Lord Palmerston, written any instructions of any sort or kind to the British Minister at Washington since the notes which passed in the beginning of 1838?" Lord Palmerston refused flatly to produce any correspondence; but the country is not officially informed as to the fact itself, which is of vital interest, and with regard to which public opinion is strong against the Foreign Secretary, viz., whether any negotiation was carried on during all that period of three years or not?

There many circumstances attending the measures and the tone of the United States Government at this particular crisis of European politics which we shall not now enlarge upon, although we are by no means without a full sense of their importance.

According to the argument used by the Government at Washington, affirming the independence of the State of New-York in matters relating to the violation of its own territory, England would draw no more than a just and logical inference from that statement by seeking redress for an outrage upon her subject, and then alleging that she made war upon "New-York alone."

It is to be further observed, that when Lord Palmerston was asked whether any steps, and what, had been taken for the preservation of Mr. McLeod, he assured the House, in a very shuffling way, that of course Her Majesty's Government will take proper steps for the protection of Her Majesty's subjects.

The evident anxiety and alarm of Lord Palmerston and Lord J. Russell were not relieved until the subject of attention had been changed by Sir Robert Peel, who asked a question concerning our relations with the Government of Persia, which we have now the satisfaction of finding are in a condition almost as comfortable as those with the United States.

The London Standard of the same date holds the following language on the same subject:

The facts that transpired in the discussion of Mr. McLeod's case, last night, illustrate, in a remarkable manner, the danger of leaving unsettled all disputed points of international relations. It now appears that the question of the seizure of the Caroline has never yet been adjusted, though surely nothing can be imagined more capable of a simple arrangement than the case in question. The fact that the Caroline was employed in a piratical war against the British territory, and that in order to defend her Majesty's dominions and subjects, it was necessary to seize the vessel, is unquestioned, and, indeed, admits of no question. Whether it was right to seize her in the waters of the United States is the only topic of inquiry; and this, in our view, could not be a difficult topic to deal with. If the American authorities affirm, contrary to the fact, that the law and government of the States were in full vigor at the port from which the Caroline conveyed arms, provisions, ammunition, and reinforcements to the pirates at Navy Island, they acknowledge that the States prosecuted an undeclared war against Great Britain. If, on the other hand, they admit, as truth would compel them to admit, that the Caroline was sent from a port that had renounced the law and government of the States, they have no cause of quarrel, for the port in question for the time constituted de facto no part of the Union. In punishing her own enemies, Great Britain was only chastising their rebels. The neighbor who pursues a burglar into another's house, and seizes him there, surely commits no wrong to him whose house he may unceremoniously invade, but rather renders him a service.

But, however the question of strict law might be decided, there was still to be considered the necessity of the case. It was necessary to the safety of her Majesty's territory, and for the protection of her subjects, that the pirates of Navy Island should be deprived of the vessel that constantly supplied them with whatever they wanted from the New York shore. Now, in cases of necessity, it is permitted to supersede the authority of strict law, as houses are often pulled down to prevent the extension of a fire: all that can be expected in such cases is, that the party who suffers loss shall be compensated to the full amount of the injury sustained. If, therefore, the parties interested in the Caroline and the authorities of New York felt themselves guilty of wrong in the matter, they ought to have demanded compensation for the loss of the vessel, and an apology for the insult offered to their soil, and it would not have humiliated the British government in the slightest degree to render both. It appears that the American government made such a demand as we surmise—that the British government refused to concede it, doubtless upon the just ground that the subjects of the United States had by their own wrong-doing discredited themselves to either compensation or apology—and that the American government declined to press the demand, unquestionably upon this same consideration. Mr. Van Buren's part in the matter was, no doubt, a difficult one. To have openly disclaimed and denounced the abettors and auxiliaries of the pirates would have exposed him to the enmity of the anti-English faction—to have insisted upon redress for an injury rendered necessary by the crimes of the Republicans, and by the weakness of his government, would (besides the shocking imprudence of the proceeding) have involved him in a war which must, at the time, have been the reverse of popular in the States. No such difficulties, however, could have embarrassed the British Minister. He it was who ought to have demanded redress, and a reimbursement of all the expenses and losses caused by the invasion from the Republic. Nothing could be easier than for him to say—Call in an umpire; let him decide who has been the wrong-doer in the late transactions.

If it is said that England is to blame, England shall make amends in every way—if, on the other hand, the original outrage has proceeded from the States, let us have no pettiness about the incidents of an unprovoked war, caused by the perverseness of some of your people, and by the weakness of your government; but let the Republic do that which is substantially just, tota re perspecta. This was the language that became a British Minister, and this language would have settled the question one way or the other. As affairs have been left, great disgrace attaches to both governments, though undoubtedly the greater to the government of the States. The Cabinet of Washington having made a claim, suspended it as not tenable by evidence or argument, but lay two years on the watch to try if the confessed injustice might not be enforced by a cruel outrage upon the person of an unguarded and unoffending individual weak enough to trust to Republican faith and hospitality. On the other side, the British Minister, in his wish to rescue the President from a difficulty, has observed a degree of forbearance which the insolent enemies of England are willing enough to accept as an evidence of fear; and meanwhile, has left the delicate question in dispute unsettled, to remain as the germ of future mischief. He ought to have known that in dealing with governments like that of Washington, gratitude or honor must not be calculated upon, and that towards a democratical republic, there is but one safe policy to be observed—distrust. It is not, however, because under such governments all the people, or even the greater part, are necessarily bad, but because the bad portion, be they few or many, will generally be the ruling party.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

DEBATE IN THE BRITISH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT ON THE BURNING OF THE CAROLINE AND THE CASE OF McLEOD.

Arrest of Mr. McLeod.—The Earl of MOUNTCASSELL said he perceived that some correspondence had taken place between Mr. Fox, the British Minister to the United States, and Mr. Forsyth, the American Secretary of State, relative to the arrest and imprisonment of Mr. McLeod on a charge of murder and arson; but no official information had been received on the subject. It appeared from the public prints that certain members of Congress had spoken in a violent manner on the subject—in a manner not alone disrespectful to the government of this country, but in a manner exceedingly harsh and violent towards the accused individual. He therefore felt it to be his humble duty to bring the matter before their lordships, for the purpose of eliciting some information or statement from her Majesty's government. At the same time, he much feared that what transpired in that house would not arrive in America in sufficient time to save this unfortunate gentleman, who appeared to be most falsely and unjustly accused. He begged leave to state, that he had the opportunity of knowing, through the means of Capt. Drew, that Mr. McLeod was not present when the steamer Caroline was burnt, and that he was, in fact, on shore at the time, doing his duty, in obedience to the commands of his superiors. It would therefore appear, that the persons who came forward with the charge had made a false and unjust accusation. He had, in the hopes of saving the life of a British subject, brought this matter before the house. It was, in a public point of view, a matter of much more importance than some individuals might suppose. It was, in fact, very neary connected with our honor as a nation; and he did hope and trust that the government would take active and energetic steps to assert, maintain, and uphold the character of this great country. He hoped that they would not, by tamely submitting to insult and wrong, suffer the national character to sink into contempt. Looking to the hostile feelings that had been manifested in the United States, it was evident to him that if they did not take a dignified position they would be trampled on—on every occasion they would be insulted wheresoever they went. In short, there would be no safety abroad for British subjects. He hoped, therefore, that government would exert themselves for the preservation of the valuable life of this worthy individual, who was now suffering in a dungeon of the United States, and that they would fully vindicate the character of this country.

The vessel in question, the Caroline, was actively employed during the late troubles in Canada, in assisting those who were armed against British authority. A party of marauders from the United States had, at that time, taken possession of an island belonging to Great Britain; and this vessel was employed in carrying thither men, provisions, and ammunition. The vessel was originally engaged in smuggling between the Coast of the United States and Canada. She was next employed in that most illegal act which he had described. Now, he would ask, had she letters of marque, or any other authority, for acting in this manner? She had not. She was looked on as a piratical vessel, and treated as such. If an English vessel was taken on the high seas, without letters of marque or any proper authority for cruising in a hostile way, and was taken by a French man-of-war or a Russian man-of-war, would the English Government accuse the French Government or the Russian Government with having acted improperly if a force belonging to them captured such a vessel and hanged her crew at the yard arm? No; they would say that such a capture was perfectly defensible. But it would appear that the Americans had one law for themselves and another for other nations, or else they could never think of punishing a man for destroying a piratical vessel. He only wished that the Americans would act on those principles which we adopted on other occasions. When, in 1818, the Americans purchased the Floridas from Spain, and found themselves engaged in a war with the Seminole Indians, did not General Jackson, when in one of the forts that were captured two English subjects were discovered, order them to be executed? He did; and this government did not interfere, because those parties were acting in a hostile capacity without any authority whatsoever. The noble lord concluded by asking whether any information had been received from Canada of the capture and detention of a British subject in the State of New-York upon a charge of murder, and on suspicion of being one of those who had been engaged in the destruction of the Caroline steamer; and, if so, what steps her Majesty's ministers intended taking in consequence?

Viscount Melbourne said, that he would proceed to answer the question without entering into the facts and arguments with which the noble lord had prefaced it. Her Majesty's government had certainly received information that an individual of the name of McLeod had been arrested by the authorities of the state of New York, and by them committed to prison to take his trial upon a charge of murder and arson, which it was stated he had committed upon the occasion of the seizure and destruction of the Caroline steamer. Upon hearing this Mr. Fox, our Minister at Washington, demanded his liberation from the general government, and received for reply that the matter entirely rested with the authorities of the state of New York, and that it was neither in the power nor the inclination of the Federal government of America to interfere. That was the way in which the matter stood at present. What her Majesty's ministers meant to do in it, their lordships surely would not expect him then to state. (Hear, hear.) At the same time, the noble lord might be perfectly sure of this, that they would take those measures which in their estimation would be best calculated to secure the safety of her Majesty's subject, and to vindicate the honor of the British nation. (Hear, hear.) Their lordships then adjourned.

ARREST OF MR. McLEOD BY THE AUTHORITIES OF THE STATE OF NEW-YORK.

Lord Stanley said, that seeing the noble lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in his place, he rose for the purpose of putting to him the question of which he had given notice the other evening. That question was one of so important a nature, especially at a period so critical as the present, that he was compelled to preface it by such a statement of facts as he believed the laws of the house permitted him to make. He could assure the house that beyond that he did not wish to go one single step. It would be in the recollection of the house that in the latter period of 1837, at a time when by the gallantry of the troops, both of the line and the militia, rebellion had been put down in the province of Upper Canada, and not a single rebel in arms was left within that province, a band of men, consisting partly of Canadians and partly of American subjects, was organized and armed within the frontiers of the United States, possessed themselves of arms by seizing on the arsenals, the property of the United States, and in open day took possession of an island lying in the Niagara river, the property of her Majesty, to which they transported, also in open day, arms, the property of the United States, ammunition and stores, the property of the United States, and brought frequent reinforcements of men, in order to make their position strong. From that position, and with those means, they for a considerable time fired upon the inhabitants of the Canadian frontier at not more than 600 yards distance, and upon boats passing up and down the river. This band, thus posted, was supplied on more than one occasion by a schooner from the American frontier, which they had chartered for that express purpose, with arms, ammunition, and reinforcements.

On the night of the 20th of December, that schooner having been so employed during the day of the 20th, a body of men, by authority of her Majesty, and commanded, or, at least, under the orders of Mr. McNab, Speaker of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada, who at that time commanded the militia of the province, and was active on behalf of her Majesty, attacked the schooner, lying, undoubtedly, moored by the American shore, and having boarded her, and found it impossible to carry her away, in consequence of the rapidity of the current, set fire to her, and suffered her to fall down the falls of Niagara. Representations relative to that proceeding were immediately made by the authorities of the state of Niagara to the President of the United States, and a counter-statement was at the same time made by the British authorities of Canada, through the medium of Mr. Fox, our minister to the United States. In consequence of the conflicting nature of the evidence then presented, the President communicated with Mr. Fox, and furnished him with the evidence forwarded to their government by the United States authorities, in order that it might be laid before her Majesty's government, with that demand for reparation for that which they characterized as an outrage upon the neutrality of the American territory, the counter-statement of the Canadian authorities being in like manner made the subject of strong counter-representation from her Majesty's minister at Washington. The whole correspondence, in the course of the months of January and February, 1838, was transmitted for the consideration of her Majesty's government, with the demand for reparation to which he had referred. He believed that after that period they had no information furnished from the Foreign Office of any transactions on this subject.

The Colonial Office, in 1838, and at subsequent periods, had laid before the house various papers, among which were the proceedings of the House of Assembly and her Majesty's Lieutenant Governor of Upper Canada, who, in their public dispatches, strongly supported the view taken by the Canadian authorities, and spoke in terms of the highest approbation of those who had attacked and sunk the schooner. He believed that the country generally considered this question between the two countries as fairly settled, but on the 12th of November last he was given to understand a gentleman named McLeod, who belonged to the service of her Majesty, filling in Canada the situation of one of the council, who had taken an active part in repelling invasion from the province, but who, as far as he (Lord Stanley) was able to learn, had taken no part whatever in the affair of the Caroline, was seized in the state of New York by the authorities on a charge of murder and arson, was committed to jail for an act done under the sanction of the Canadian authorities, to repel the invasion of the Canadian territory, and under the immediate command of the gentleman to whom the military force of the province had at that time been intrusted. Mr. McLeod was apprehended and was about to be tried by a jury of the state of New York. He hoped he was stating facts correctly; he did so without making any comments, and if he were not correct, he hoped the noble lord would set him right. In the month of January, Congress, on its meeting, applied to the President to lay before them any communications with the British government in reference to this subject. In doing so the President, among other papers, laid before them a strong remonstrance which Mr. Fox had felt it to be his duty to make as a British Minister and the representative of his Sovereign against the apprehension of a British subject for an offence, if offence it were, which had received the sanction of the British authorities, and which at that moment was under the consideration of the two governments, and had been for three years the subject of negotiation between them.

The answer of the President, continued the noble lord, was to refuse altogether to admit the claim of Mr. Fox, on behalf of Mr. McLeod, for his liberation, partly on the ground that the Federal government in such cases had no power to interfere with the authority of the several independent states, and also on the ground that, if it possessed such power and the right to interfere, the case stated by Mr. Fox was not one in which it would exercise it, inasmuch as questions of international right between the general governments of the two countries in no degree interfered with the administration of justice by the several states of the union. Mr. Fox closed the correspondence by the strongest expressions of his regret at the views which the President had taken upon the matter. He said he was not authorized to express the views of his government; but, on his own part, he made the strongest protest in his power against these views, and without loss of time would lay the whole before her Majesty's government for its opinion. Sir, this is the position in which the matter at present stands:—A British subject was arrested in the month of November; the assizes will take place during the present month, February; and at this hour, (and this is my vindication for interfering, in any degree, in a matter on which communications have taken place between two great nations, which are now in a very critical state,) at this moment, the life of a British subject may be in jeopardy, in consequence of his having acted in defence of his native country, and under the orders, and by the authority of the military powers of this country, to whom he was compelled to give obedience in repelling invasion and rebellion. The questions I wish to put to the noble lord are, inasmuch as this negotiation commenced so early as January, 1838—I wish to ask the noble lord whether he has any objection to lay on the table of the house the correspondence between her Majesty's government and the United States, relative to the destruction of the schooner Caroline, on the night of the 20th December, 1837? Whether the noble lord has received the despatches of Mr. Fox, referred to in the recent accounts from the United States, dated the 20th of September, which Mr. Fox stated he had transmitted to the government at home, (and which I presume the noble lord has received, he having acknowledged despatches up to the 8th of February,) relative to the apprehension of Mr. McLeod? Whether her Majesty's government have taken any, and if so, what steps, for the protection of Mr. McLeod, and whether the noble lord will lay upon the table of the house the correspondence upon that subject between the government at home, and British representative at Washington, and the representative of the United States? (Hear, hear.)

Lord PALMERSTON.—I must confess the noble lord has adverted, with great discretion, to a subject of extreme interest, and which, from its great delicacy, involving considerations of a very grave nature between the two countries, I am sure the house will feel should be touched upon with great reserve, either by the noble lord or by myself in my answer. Now, as to the statement of the noble lord with respect to the occurrence which led to this matter, it is strictly, as far as my memory serves me, correct. I will first answer the questions the noble lord has put to me, and afterward say one word in explanation of the transaction. I think it is not expedient in the present state of the discussion between the two governments as to the seizure and destruction of the Caroline, to lay on the table that correspondence. Whenever it is brought to a close, of course there can be no objection to do so. Her Majesty's government having received within the last few days dispatches from Mr. Fox and his correspondence with the authorities of the United States, which correspondence has been furnished to the public in the American papers, there can be no objection to lay before parliament those papers that are already before the public. (Laughter.) But this is a departure from what I consider an important rule in regard to international affairs, (hear, hear,) and one which may operate injuriously to national interests, to lay before parliament documents relating to pending discussions; but, as I have before said, some of these having been already furnished, as respects them there can be no objection. I think it important to make, with reference to the notice of Mr. Forsyth, one observation. The noble lord said, he believed Mr. McLeod was not one of the party by whom the Caroline was attacked. My information goes precisely to the same conclusion; but with regard to the ground taken by Mr. Forsyth, in reply to Mr. Fox, I think it right to state, that the American government undoubtedly might have considered this transaction either as a transaction to be dealt with between the two governments, by demands for redress by one to be granted or refused by the other, and dealt with accordingly; or it might have been considered, as the British authorities consider proceedings between American citizens on the British side of the border, as matter to be dealt with by the local authorities. But the American government chose the former course, by treating this matter as one to be decided between the two governments, and this is the ground on which they are entitled to demand redress from the British government for the acts of its subjects, and from that ground they cannot now be permitted to recede. I assure the house that on a matter of such extreme difficulty it would be improper for me to enter into further remarks or observations, and I shall therefore content myself with answering the noble lord's questions by stating the matters of fact I have just mentioned.

Lord Stanley.—I apprehend that the noble lord has not correctly understood my question—for one of them, and that the most important, he has not answered. That question was, whether the government had taken any, and if so, what steps, for the protection and liberation of Mr. McLeod? (Hear, hear.)

Lord Palmerston.—It was my intention to have answered that question of the noble lord before I sat down, but it escaped my memory at the moment. I may state that a case somewhat similar in principle to the present was expected to take place a year and a half or two years ago, and at that time instructions were sent out to Mr. Fox, on which were founded some of the communications lately made by him to the American authorities. Of course, the house will, I trust, suppose that her Majesty's government will send—they have, indeed, sent—certain instructions; but till we get the conclusion of the correspondence it is impossible to send final instructions. I trust the house will believe the government will send further instructions as they may think it to be their duty to do, but I am not prepared now to state formally what those instructions may be. (Hear.)

Mr. Hume wished to ask a question of the noble lord, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, but as the noble lord had made a speech on the subject, he must first beg of the house to suspend their judgment until they had before them the whole of the papers on the subject. The question he wished to ask was this:—It appeared by the papers which he had in his possession, that in January, 1838, a motion was made in the House of Representatives, calling upon the government to place on the table of the house all the papers respecting the Caroline, and in consequence of that motion certain papers which had been received from Mr. Stevenson, had been laid on the table of the house on the 15th of May, together with a letter from that gentleman. In that letter the allegations as to the attack by the Caroline were denied, and he (Mr. Hume) had seen a letter from Mr. Stevenson, in which he stated that no answer had been given to his application in 1838, and he begged to be informed whether he should urge the matter on the attention of the British Government, for the American Government did not yet know whether the enterprise of the Caroline was to be considered as sanctioned by the British Government. What he wanted to know from the noble lord was, what were the instructions of Mr. Stevenson upon which he had acted as he had done? He again hoped that the house would suspend its judgment on the question until all the documents were before it.

Lord Palmerston said—I rather think that my honorable friend will find in that correspondence that instructions from the American Government were given to Mr. Stevenson to abstain from pressing the subject. (Hear.) With regard to the letter of Mr. Forsyth, I beg leave to say, that the principle stands thus:—In the case of the American citizens engaged in invading Canada, the American Government disavowed the acts of those citizens, and stated that the British authorities might deal with them as they pleased (hear), and that they were persons who were not in any degree entitled to the protection of the United States. But in the other case they treated the affair of the Caroline as one to be considered as that of the Government, and not to be left upon the responsibilities of individuals. Until, therefore, the British Government disavowed those persons, as the American Government disavowed their citizens in the other case, they would have no right to change their ground upon the question. (Hear, hear.)

Sir R. Peel wished to ask the noble lord the Secretary for the Colonies, one question as to a matter of fact; it was, whether there were not officers of her Majesty's army and navy engaged in the affair of the Caroline, and wounded in that service; and further, whether they had received the same pensions as they would have received if they had suffered such wounds in the service to which they regularly belonged?

Lord J. Russell said, he had understood that officers of her Majesty's army and navy were employed on that occasion, under the orders of the colonial authorities, and that some of them were wounded in that service; but he had not heard that they had received any pensions.

Congressional.

THURSDAY, Feb. 23.

In the SENATE but little business of a public nature was transacted, the day having been devoted to the consideration of private bills.

The General Appropriation bill was received from the House, and referred to the Committee on Finance, whence it will probably be reported in a day or two, with several amendments.

In the HOUSE the Navy Appropriation bill was taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Saltonstall, of Mass., moved to increase the appropriation from $1,425,000 to $2,000,000. A long debate arose on this motion, and on an amendment offered by Mr. Mallory, of Va., to appropriate $500,000 for the building of steam ships. At 8 o'clock the committee rose without having come to any conclusion, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, Feb. 24.

In the SENATE, as soon as the Journal was read, Mr. Roane of Va., communicated to the Chair a letter from the Chief Justice of the United States announcing the death of Judge Barbour, and enclosing a copy of the funeral ceremonies which had been determined upon.

Mr. Roane made a few remarks appropriate to the occasion; and in conclusion moved that the Senate adjourn, at two o'clock for the purpose of attending the funeral, which was agreed to.

Mr. Clay of Ky., addressed the Senate until the hour of adjournment against the pending amendment to include banks in the compulsory process; denying the constitutionality of such a law, and declaring it to be unwise and inexpedient even if the power were express.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Andrews offered a resolution to allow pay to all such Members of the House as were detained on their way to the seat of government at the commencement of the session by the weather. Several Members objected to this, but it was finally carried: Yeas 100; Nays 48.

SATURDAY, Feb. 27.

In the SENATE, the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation bill was reported by the Committee of Finance, with many amendments, mostly concerning the salaries of office holders. The amendments reported by the Committee were ordered to be printed, together with some amendments proposed by Mr. Anderson of Tenn., designed to reduce the emoluments of collectors of customs.

On motion of Mr. Clay of Ala., a resolution was adopted changing the circuits of the Judges of the Supreme Court.

In the HOUSE, the Army and Navy Appropriation bills were both passed, the latter with the amendment proposed by Mr. Saltonstall of Mass., appropriating $500,000 for the building of steam-ships. Mr. Evans of Maine, offered an amendment to the Army bill, making an increased appropriation for the Florida service, but it was rejected by the House.

MONDAY, March 1.

In Senate, Mr. Buchanan moved to discharge the Committee of Foreign Relations from the further consideration of the resolution calling for the correspondence which has passed between the British minister and the Secretary of State, on the subject of our relations with Great Britain. Mr. B. took occasion to express his belief that peace would be preserved between the two nations; and declared that the reports intimating that an angry controversy had taken place between Mr. Fox and Mr. Forsyth, were entirely unfounded.

Mr. Clay, of Ky., also made a few remarks in the same conciliatory strain. Mr. C. gave it as his decided opinion that the difference with England would not require a special minister.

Mr. Cuthbert, of Ga., said he had, on the occasion of the resignation of Mr. Webster, charged him with holding abolition principles; he would now prove the charge. Mr. C. accordingly read from some documents what he considered conclusive proofs of the matter. This led to a highly interesting debate, which lasted until the recess.

TUESDAY, March 2d.

In the SENATE, the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation bills were passed, the amendments of the committee of Finance having first been adopted. The amendments allowed the Marshals pay for Deputy Marshals, and both Marshals and District Attorneys out of the States where fees are small, to retain $1500 of their fees as a compensation; the balance to go into the National Treasury. Collectors of customs are allowed but $200 fees in addition to their salary of $4,000.

DEATH OF JUDGE BARBOUR.—The whole city was shocked, yesterday morning, by the information of the sudden demise of the Hon. Philip P. Barbour, of Virginia, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court. He was in usual health and even more than usually cheerful at the time of retiring to bed at 10 o'clock on Wednesday night, and the next morning was found in his bed a lifeless corpse!

Judge BARBOUR entered Congress, in the House of Representatives, in the year 1814, and soon signalized himself by considerable ability in debate. He remained in Congress for a number of years, during a part of which time he filled the honorable office of Speaker of the House. Since retiring from Congress, his life had been devoted with great assiduity to the judicial duties which he had been called to perform.—[National Intelligencer of Feb. 26.]

Among the distinguished strangers who have arrived at the seat of Government within the last few days, we observe ex-Governor Schuette and ex-Treasurer Clark, of Pennsylvania; Judge Burnett, of Ohio; Gen. H. A. S. Dearborn, of Massachusetts; Hon. Noyes Barber, of Connecticut; and Hon. John Holmes, of Maine.—[Nat. Intell.]

CRUSHED TO DEATH.—A man named Rogers was crushed to death on the 2d ult., at the Rosie lead mines, by the falling of a mass of ice under which he was working.

The Hon. Richard H. Menefee, formerly in Congress, and one of the candidates for U. S. Senator at the recent election in Kentucky, died at Lexington on the 20th ult.

TO OUR PATRONS IN THE COUNTRY.

Those who wish to obtain copies of the Leviathan New World, should send on their orders at an early day. Ten copies will be sent, securely packed, to any address, in return for $1, received free of postage. A limited number of copies have been retained by us expressly to supply small orders of this kind; but all applications should be made soon, or the whole edition will be exhausted by the city demand. For the manner in which this magnificent sheet has been noticed by the press, the reader is referred to a subsequent column. The Pictorial Illustrations of the Holy Scriptures are, of themselves, worth ten times the price of the paper.

Our Pamphlet edition of the commencement of Ten Thousand a Year, is nearly or quite exhausted, but we have about 50 to 100 sets of the quarto from No. 16, which contains the whole of this story. New subscribers who wish the series complete will do well to order the back Nos. from that time. We can also yet supply the numbers of volume second, which commenced Jan. 2, and each subscriber from that time will also receive a copy of the LEVIATHAN WORLD, No. 2, just issued, of which we have reserved a sufficiency for this purpose. Orders should be forwarded without delay as the edition is fast running out.

THE LEVIATHAN NEW WORLD.

We acknowledge our obligations to the several editors of this city and elsewhere for the complimentary manner in which they have spoken of our LEVIATHAN No. 2, and we present below, the substance of what has been said on the subject for the information of our readers. We are quite aware—and the public will not be long in discovering—that our Leviathans are far the best things of the sort that have ever appeared in this or any country; and we are happy to add that the success of the enterprise has equalled our most sanguine expectations.

THE NEW WORLD.—Creation in miniature—so far as typography is concerned; or a new world, so far as all previous diurnal or hebdomadal publications have tended to create a literary world, or a "Republic of letters"—came to us yesterday in the shape of a single newspaper, of the enormous dimensions of seven feet by 5, edited by Park Benjamin. We pity the editor, compositors and pressmen who are concerned in making such a world, but we congratulate the reading public that they can carry about them, an entire library and a picture gallery besides, in a compact form, at a cost less than that of a Dilworth spelling book, while its contents are equal to half a dozen volumes of Harper's Family Library.—[New-York Standard.]

The New World of March 4th, of which we have seen a copy, is an immense sheet; it appears to us far more than ever. It is crowded with literary miscellany, gemmed with a great number of very fine wood engravings. It is a wonder how so vast a sheet can be so beautifully printed.—[Evening Post.]

THE NEW WORLD.—We acknowledge the receipt of a mammoth New World, which is certainly the largest newspaper we have ever seen, and well filled with excellent matter, beside being illustrated with wood cuts. It is a literary curiosity which will doubtless be purchased by thousands for the purpose of preservation. We are pleased to perceive that the publishers of this paper continue to receive a liberal support from the public.—[Courier & Enq.]

THE DOUBLE NEW WORLD will be for sale to-morrow, we understand. We have received a copy, and recommend every body to buy it, if only for the sake of having such a curiosity. Its size is immense—it is embellished with any quantity of well executed wood cuts, and contains right good reading matter, and plenty of it.—[New-York American.]

THE NEW WORLD.—Another gigantic number of this paper will be issued to-morrow. It is huge beyond all precedent, we believe; and certainly beyond all toleration. It is a library in itself—and moreover a gallery of pictures. Its dimensions are—we do not know what, in feet and inches—but they are outrageous. For comfortable reading of it there is but one way—to hang it up against the wall and take aim at it from a considerable distance, with a pocket telescope.—[Commercial Advertiser.]

THE DOUBLE NEW WORLD.—This immense sheet is a curiosity worth having. It is embellished with a large number of wood cuts, and contains as much reading as a small library. It will be for sale to-day.—[New-York Express.]

We have received the Leviathan New World. It is beyond all cavil or question the handsomest sheet ever published. The woodcuts are numerous and select, and the reading matter is ditto. The engraving of Napoleon in his coffin is alone worth the price of the paper—ONE SHILLING! One shilling! for a dozen engravings and a week's reading! Verily some things can be done as well as others.—[Evening Times and Star.]

The double New World comes out this week larger than ever.—[Journal of Commerce.]

THE NEW WORLD.—The proprietors of this popular journal have issued a second 'Leviathan number,' which surpasses in size, in the beauty of its embellishments and typography, and in the excellence of its literary contents, any single periodical sheet ever published.—[Philadelphia Standard.]

THE NEW WORLD comes to us this week particularly interesting. It contains a number of very beautiful wood cuts, besides an immense variety of choice reading matter. We will remark that it is of an extra size.—[Baltimore Clipper.]

THE NEW WORLD.—Well may the editors of this paper say "No pent up Utica contracts our powers," for they have just published a sheet nearly as long as from here to Utica. The wood cuts are superb—especially that of Napoleon in his coffin. Altogether, this is the most splendid specimen of the mammoth we have seen. The only way to see it all at once is by looking at it through the wrong end of a telescope.—[New York Democrat.]

LEVIATHAN NEW WORLD.—We have received from Mr. Redding, 8 State street, where some tons of the same may be procured, this magnificent sheet, which richly merits the appellation given it by the publishers. It contains 44 columns of reading matter, with a numerous array of fine wood engravings, among them Napoleon in his coffin as he appeared at the disinterment. This is unquestionably the largest and best printed newspaper ever issued in the world. Price only twelve and a half cents.—[Boston Transcript.]

LEVIATHAN SHEET.—We have before us another Leviathan sheet from the office of the New World, at New-York. It is embellished with a number of very elegant engravings on various subjects, and has reading matter enough in its immense columns to entertain one for a fortnight. This splendid specimen of the typographic art may be had of the agent, Mr. Taylor, No. 4 North street.—[Baltimore American.]

LEVIATHAN NEW WORLD.—The second number of this immense print has been received by Mr. Redding, the agent in this city, at No. 8 State street. It contains a very large amount of original and selected matter, illustrated by several engravings, published in folio form, on an immense sheet, which well deserves the name given it by the publishers.—[Boston Daily Advertiser.]

Another magnificent number of the "Leviathan New World" was received yesterday by the agent in this city, Mr. G. W. Redding, No. 8 State street. It is a splendid number, and contains numerous beautiful engravings.—[Boston Atlas.]

Redding, at No. 8 State street, has the New World, Leviathan Number, containing about an acre of good reading.—[Boston Post.]

Redding, No. 8 State street, has received a Leviathan number of the New World. It is in every sense of the word a great paper—great in size, great in matter on great men, great events, great pictures, and we suppose there will be a great rush for it.—[Bay State Democrat.]

SEARS'S PICTORIAL BIBLE.—Our readers, who have been favored with a sight of the "Leviathan New World," cannot fail to have admired the beautiful gallery of "PICTORIAL ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE BIBLE, AND VIEWS IN THE HOLY LAND," presented on its fourth page. They were executed by B. J. Loosing, and are now for the first time published. They are to adorn the second volume of Mr. Sears's Pictorial Bible; we are confident that they cannot fail highly to recommend this valuable and interesting work, of which the first volume has elicited so many warm and just encomiums.

Mr. SEARS has pursued the right course to bring his popular work largely into notice. He has advertised liberally, and has presented to the public, on which to form a judgment, the unbiased opinions of the better portion of the journals of the day. These, whether religious or secular, unite in commending the book as one which ought to be in the hands of every family throughout the Union. We direct the reader's particular attention to that part of the paper where they may be found. We cordially join our recommendations with those of so many influential and respected editors.

THE COUNTRY SCHOOLMASTER.

BY WILLIAM HOWITT.

The Country Schoolmaster is one of the most marked characters of the country. Spite of the tingling remembrance of his blows, we have a real love for him, and sympathise with him in his sense of neglect. He complains, and justly too, that he has had the first moulding of the intellects of many of the greatest geniuses which this country has produced, yet what genius in his glory has looked back to his old dominion with a grateful recognition? The worthy Sir Walter Scott is almost the only one. Dominic Sampson, Reuben Butler, Jedediah Cleishbotham, schoolmaster and parish-clerk of Gauderleugh, and Peter Pattieson, are delightful proofs of the fact. But Scott saw the world of peculiar character which lies in the Country Schoolmaster, and disdained not to honor it as it deserved. Beyond this, little renown, in faith, has the village Dionysius won. Shenstone has done fitting honor to the village schoolmistress; but the master has been fain to shelter himself under the sole bush of laurel which the good-natured Oliver Goldsmith has planted to his renown in "The Deserted Village."

Poor fellow! true enough are Oliver's words, "Past is all his fame." He has had a quiet and a flattering life of it, for many a generation; the rustics have gazed and wondered

"That one small head could carry all he knew."

But the innovations of this innovating age have reached even him at last. He has built his cabin in an obscure hamlet, or, as in Ireland, set up his hedge-school under some sunny bank; he has retreated to the remotest glens, and the fastnesses of unfrequented mountains, but even there the modern spirit of reform has found him out. He sees a cloud of ruinous blackness collecting over his head, out of which are about to spring ten thousand school-masters of a new-fangled stamp; and he knows that it is all up with him for ever. The railroad of national education is about to run through his ancient patrimony, and he shakes his head as he asks himself whether he is to come in for equitable compensation. No, his fame is past, and his occupation is going too. He is to be run down by an act of parliament to set him up. He was the selector of his own location, the builder of his own fortunes. The good old honest stimulant of caring for himself led him to care for the education of his neighbor's children; he needed no subscription to buy land and build a spacious school; he opened his cottage door, and in walked all the lads of the hamlet and neighboring farms, with slates slung round their necks, books under arms, and their dinners in their bags. For fourpence a week, reading and spelling, and sixpence for those who write and cipher, he gave them hard benches and hard blows; and when he had as many stowed into his little house as were about enow to stifle him and one another, thought himself a lucky fellow, and looked round on the whole horde, with dirty faces and corduroy jackets and trousers, rough heads, and white or blue pinafores, with a pride which saw the future neighborhood filled with clever fellows, all of his own drubbing.

Poor old schoolmaster! little didst thou foresee these topsy-turvy times when I used to sit amongst such a rustic crew, and achieve pot-hooks and fish-hooks at that sorely blotted and lacerated desk; and saw thee sitting in thy glory, looking, in my eyes, the very image of mortal greatness. Little, as we stole late into school, having been delayed by the charms of birds'-nests or cockchafers, and heard thee thunder forth in lion-tones, "Eh! what's this?"

"A miller, a moller,
A ten o'clock scholar."

March this way, march this way!" little, as we ran, wild truants, through cowslip fields, and by sunny brooks, with hearts beating with mingled rapture and dread of the morrow; little, as we riotously barred thee out for a holiday; did we ever dream that so dark a day could come upon thee! But, in faith, it is just at hand, and if we are to preserve a portrait of the Country Schoolmaster, we must sketch it now or never.

Oliver Goldsmith has hit off some of his most striking features. The Country Schoolmaster, in his finest field of glory, the hamlet—where, except the clergyman, there are no higher personages than old-fashioned farmers, who received their book-learning from himself or his predecessor—is a man of importance, both in his own eyes and those of others. He yet makes the rustics stare at his "words of learned length and thundering sound;" he can yet dispute with the parson, though he looks frequently in the profound admirer of his reverence: he more upon himself as the greatest man in the parish, except the parson, whose knowledge he extols to the skies, and whose reading of the church services he pronounces the finest in the world. The villagers always link "our parson and our schoolmaster" in one breath of admiration. If the Schoolmaster can quote a sentence of Latin, wonderful is then their wonder of his powers. He is always styled "a long-headed fellow, as deep as the north star." As in Goldsmith's days, he can still often guage, and is the land-measurer of the district. In the bright, evening nook of the public house, where the farmer, and the village shopkeepers, and the blacksmith duly congregate, his voice is loud, his air is lofty, and his word is law. There he often confounds their intellects by some such puzzling query as "Whether the egg or the bird was made first?" "What man Cain expected to meet in the wilderness before there was a man there?" or, "Who was the father of Zebedee's children?"

If he be self-educated, as he generally is, he has spent the best part of his life in studying Latin; or he is deep in mathematics; or he has dived into the mysteries of astrology; has great faith in Raphael's annual prognostications, and in "Culpepper's Herbal." His literature consists of a copy of verses sent now and then to the neighboring newspaper, or solutions of mathematical problems for the learned columns of the same. Perhaps he adventures a flight so high as one of the London magazines; and if, by chance, his lucubration should appear in the "Gentleman's," his pride is unbounded, and his reputation in his neighborhood made for life. His library has been purchased at the bookstall of the next market town, or he has taken it in at the door in numbers from the walking stationer. "Rapin's History of England," "Josephus," and "Barclay's Dictionary," in large quartos on coarse paper, and the histories with coarse cuts, are sure to figure amongst them. He carries on a little trade in ink, pens, writing paper, and other stationery, himself. If he be married, his wife is almost sure to drive a still brisker trade in gingerbread, Darby-and-Joans, toffy and lollipops. As he is famous for his penmanship, he is the great letter-writer of the neighborhood, and many is the love secret that is confided to his ear. Nay, he letters signboards, and cart-boards, and coffin-plates; for who is there besides that can? He makes wills, and has, in former days, before the lawyers hedged round their monopoly with the penalty of illegality on such deeds, drawn conveyances, and was the peaceful practitioner in all such affairs for his neighborhood.

Oh! multifarious are the doings of the Country Schoolmaster, and amusing are their variety. What an air of pedagogic pomp distinguishes him; how antiquely amusing is his school costume often; how much more amusing the piebald patchwork of his language. His address has frequently no little of mine ancient Pistol in it. But how uniquely curious is the Country Schoolmaster in love! I happen to have in my possession the actual love-letter of a Country Schoolmaster, which, as a curiosity, is worth transcribing. The Dominie has now long been married to his fair one, who is as pretty a little Tartar as any in the country. He writes something in the phraseology of a Quaker, but he is, in fact, the parish-clerk. In copying the letter, I alter not a word, except the actual names of places.

NUTHURST, Nov. 1st, 1816.

"ESTEEMED FRIEND: I embrace the present opportunity of addressing these few lines unto thee, hoping they will find thee in good health, which leaves me the same, thank my God! Respected P., I have often told thee I don't much like illustrating my sentiments by correspondence, but I write with a majestic air of animation and delight when I communicate my thoughts to one that I love beyond description; yes! to one that is virtuous, innocent, and unblemishable; which has a comely behavior, a loving disposition, and a goodly principle. And thou, the person! charming fair one, which may justly boast of thy virtue, and laugh at others' aspersion. Dear P., when I reflect on all thy amiable qualities, and fond endearments, I am charmingly exalted, and amply satisfied. My senses are the more stimulated with love, and every wish gives thee a congratulation. Amiable P., I've meditated on our former accompaniments, and been wonderfully dignified at thine condescending graces. I, in particular, admire thy good temper, and thine relentful forgiveness. For when we have partook of a walk together, some trifling idea has exasperated my disposition, and rendered my behavior ungenerous and disreputable. Thou, like a benevolent friend, soothe the absurd incensement, and instantly resuscitated our respective amorousness, and doubly exaggerated our loving enamours. While, above all others, I thee regard, and whilst love is spontaneously imprinted in our hearts, let it have its unbounded course. Loving Friend, I was more than a little gratified that thou wrote to thy Mrs., which was thy duty, for she has been thy peculiar friend, and gave thee competent admonition. She is a faithful monitor, and a well-wisher to thine everlasting welfare. I was absolutely grieved when I heard of thee not being well, and completely fretted that I was aloof, and could not sympathize with thy inconsolatory moments. I candidly hope thy cough is better, and I earnestly desire that our absence may be immediately transformed into lasting presence, that we may enjoy our fond hopes and loving embraces.

"My dear, the last Sunday night that I was at Bivington, I parted with thee about four o'clock; and I stopped in the market-place looking at the soldiers parading, and harkening the band playing, till about six; then I proceeded on my nightly excursion. I called at the public house, and was spouting a little of my romantic nonsense, and I instantly received a blow from a person in the adjoining company. I never retaliated, which was very surprising, but a wisely omission. I should not have troubled thee with this tedious explanation hadst thou not been preposterously informed about the subject. Thy ingrateful relations can't help telling thee of my vain actions, which is said purposely to abolish our acquaintance. But we are so accustomed to their insinuating persuasions and ambidextrous tales, that renders them unlikely to execute their wishful designs. Our loves are too inflexible than to be separated by a set of contemptuous ors.

"My dearest dear, at this present I wish I had thee dandling between my arms. I would give that sweet mouth ten thousand kisses, for I prefer thy well-composed structure above all other secular beauties.

"Loving P—, I will positively come to fetch thee at the respective period, when we can have a consolable and delightful journey homeward, reanimate our fond and innocent delights, salute at pleasure, and every kiss will sweeten our progressive paths; they will add delightfully to our warm affections, and invigorate us to perform our journey with the greatest facility.

"I thank thee for sending thy complimentary love to me, which I conclude with ten thousand respects.

"I remain, thine ever faithful and constant lover,
"S. G.—."

But this is only the ludicrous side of the Country Schoolmaster; he has another and a noble one. Much as we may now despise him, and lightly as we may desire, by one sweeping act of parliament, to consign him and all his compeers to instant ruin and a union work-house finale, to him the country owes a large debt of gratitude. Without aid of parliament, or parish, from age to age, he has opened his little gymnasium, and tamed and civilized the Fauns and Satyrs of the rural wilderness. What little light and knowledge have radiated through our villages and fields, it is he that has kindled them. It is he who has enabled the farmer, the miller, the baker, and every little tradesman and mechanic to conduct his affairs, manage his markets, and add to the capital of the nation. It is he who has taught the rough cub of the hamlet to make his bow, to respect his superiors; in fact, to get a little glimmering of morals and manners, and a passable shape of humanity. Nay, many of these humble men have been clergymen, who have won honors at college, and have been full of the fire of genius and the kernel of wisdom, but who, having not the golden wings of this world, have sunk down into obscure Thorpes and Wicks, and in far-off fields and forest regions have gone on their way like little unnoticed books, moaning over their lot, yet scattering plenty and greenness around them. How many such are there, at this day, sitting in uncouth garbs, in uncouth places, on dreary moorlands, and amongst wild falls and mountains. Such have I seen in various parts of these kingdoms, and wondered at their patience and holy resignation. On the tops of the wildest hills, by some little chapel like that of Fribank, near Sedberg, in Yorkshire, I have opened the door of a cabin which was filled with a hum as with bees, and found a company of bare-legged boys and girls round a peat-fire on the hearth; and a young man with the air of a scholar and a clergyman, sitting as their teacher.

It is under such men that Shakspeare, Burns, Wordsworth, Newton, Crabbe, and many another noble genius, have sate in their boyish days, and received from them the elements of that knowledge with which they were afterward to do such marvels before all mankind. We will warrant that such was the man whom good-hearted Goldsmith first trembled at, and then immortalized. The Country Schoolmaster, indeed, has cause of high pride; and when we pass our act of parliament for our ten thousand new schools and spic-and-span new masters, let us remember the long reign, and the glories, and the patient and ill-paid merits of the old Country Schoolmaster, and "temper the wind to the shorn lamb." Bitter will be that day of revolution to him, but we can make it less bitter; hard will be the fall, but kindness and generous sympathy can break it,—and dismiss the picturesque, if somewhat dogmatic old man, to an old age of honorable ease.

THE CHAMBER-MAID.

Comfort is a word truly English; and we have commenced our present sketch with the phrase because the fair young woman who appears above is intimately connected with the quality which, with its outward sign or symbol, is so native to our soil.

We do not doubt that there are many persons among the readers of our paper who have been so placed as to have proved the truth of what we have asserted; who, after a day's journey, have put up at an old inn, and while there seated, forgot the existence of those cares which the slightest hearts are not free from.

How, to such a person, is enjoyment added to enjoyment, until the climax is gained by the appearance of our subject, in all the unadorned freshness which gay spirits and a country life have given her. Let us trace these developments of comfort, and then put the question, whether monarchs might not envy the feelings of men for the consummation of whose earthly bliss Chamber-maids seem to have been formed? Imagine the day dirty and hot, the companions of the traveler silent, or sulky, the time he has been outside the stage twelve hours, the only alleviation to the weariness of which have been a lukewarm breakfast and a hasty dinner; do this, and you will be able to conceive the joy with which he leaps off the stage, and the smile of affection that he vouchsafes to landlord, ostler, boots, waiters and maids.

This, however, is but the beginning of his pleasant time. No sooner is he fairly sheltered in the tavern than the vocation of our subject is made known to him; and happy must any man be to see himself thus surrounded by things that speak of our best and dearest friends!

Sometimes a sense of thankfulness is so strong (and we ourselves do not shrink from the avowal of having so felt) as to make the sojourner, while putting to their various uses he things prepared for him, soliloquize upon the absent provider, asking himself to whom he is indebted for each, and answering such queries with the name of the fair administratrix of his wants. "Who placed this cooling crystal water here?" he inquires, as the pure element is applied to his dusty and sun-tanned face and hands—"The Chamber-maid," is the reply. "Who so nicely and neatly folded this piece of figured and fringed diaper?" is the second question, and, as in the former case, "The Chamber-maid" are the responding words. Thus the gentleman goes on and on, asking and answering; and by the time he has finished, the frequent repetitions of "The Chamber-maid" bring to his recollection the burthen of Dr. Watt's renowned song of childhood.

The presence of the lady so apostrophised does not gladden the eyes and souls of those who await her coming with so great a longing until a late hour, therefore does it impart a higher gratification than would be experienced under other circumstances. Ample time is given to the gentleman who will at midnight be guided to his bed by so smiling and glad a creature as the Chamber-maid, to enjoy the things before him. A dinner at an inn such as that where he has taken up his present quarters is a meal that, from its abstract substantiality and the absence of those associating fripperies which are seen in higher places, to any man with a human appetite must be delicious. The discussion of this is varied by small talk; and when the banquet (truly so) is finished, the glasses are filled, the cigars lighted, and conversation, which has hitherto only rippled along, swells out into greater breadth and more speedy flow. Yet, whatever subjects are broached—politics, the state of the markets, or a magnificent murder—the pauses that now and then occur are devoted to grateful recollections of a certain fair servitor, and a fervent expectation of being put to bed by the same in a manner that Mahomet himself might, were he alive, envy.

When it approaches the hour of twelve, she to whom we have referred prepares to make everything snug for the visitors. With a bright brass candlestick in one hand, and a no less brilliant warming-pan in the other, is she to be seen running up stairs; after she has got over which she is busy with the white smooth sheets that are to swathe the limbs of the wayfarers below. Her action of running the copper round, up, down, and across these, is truly beautiful. Not long is she at her work, and when she finishes, there arises from the couch upon which she has been operating, an atmosphere such as to woo even the least somnolent to its warm and balmy embrace.

From floor to floor does our sweet little friend run with all the swiftness of the sylph Taglioni. At last the preliminaries of rest are concluded, and then comes the thing itself.

"This way, if you please, sir," is said in a low, gentle voice. Had we not eyes to see the speaker, we should know that it was a woman. "Mind that stair, sir," continues the Chamber-maid, as she trips on a little in advance of her companion: "this is your room, sir. Good night." She smiles, curtsies, and prepares to depart; but, ere she has passed the threshold of the bed-room door, she reminds herself of some forgotten duty. It is (blush not, our dear female readers) to adjust the bed-clothes. This operation she performs with all the nicety that characterised her previous efforts. Very gently is the top of counterpane, sheets and blankets laid over and smoothed, and surpassingly delicate is the manner in which the sides receive an extra tuck in. With the completion of these things the pretty girl repeats her "Good night, sir," and flits out of sight, the tapping of her little feet making music upon the stairs. Of him who is left behind what shall we say? Nothing, we think, is necessary to urge, further than a remark, en passant, that was it not for fatigue, his slumbers would be in a fair way of knowing a disturbance, and that even as it is he has dreams of her who has so fully administered to his wants.

The Chamber-maid is a thing within a thing—the core of that whose very name and outside are heart-cheering to the last degree. We have said that an English inn is comfortable; so too is its interior stuff: and like a boy seeking for the kernel of some sweet fruit, we can unbind the circles, concentrated in which is the pretty person of our delightful and useful subject.

Lockhart's Spanish Ballads.

THE POUNDER.

A ballad concerning another doughty knight of the same family, and most probably, considering the date, a brother of Garcí Perez de Vargas. Its story is thus alluded to in Don Quixote, in the chapter of The Windmills:—

"However, the loss of his lance was no small affliction to him; and as he was making his complaint about it to his squire, 'I have read,' said he, 'friend Sancho, that a certain Spanish knight, whose name was Diego Perez de Vargas, having broken his sword in the heat of an engagement, pulled up by the roots a huge oak-tree, or at least tore down a mazy branch, and did such wonderful execution, crushing and grinding so many Moors with it that day, that he won himself and his posterity the surname of The Pounder, or Bruiser.' I tell this, because I intend to tear up the next oak, or holm-tree, we meet; with the trunk whereof I hope to perform such wondrous deeds, that thou wilt esteem thyself particularly happy in having had the honor to behold them, and been the ocular witness of achievements which posterity will scarce be able to believe! 'Heaven grant you may,' cried Sancho: 'I believe it all, because your worship says it.'"

The Christians have beleaguere'd the famous walls of Xeres,
Among them are Don Alvar and Don Diego Perez,
And many other gentlemen, who, day succeeding day,
Give challenge to the Saracen and all his chivalry.

When rages the hot battle before the gates of Xeres,
By trace of gore ye may explore the dauntless path of Perez.
No knight like Don Diego—no sword like his is found
In all the host, to hew the boast of Paynims to the ground.

It fell one day when furiously they battled on the plain,
Diego shivered both his lance and trusty blade in twain;
The Moors that saw it shouted, for esquire none was near,
To serve Diego at his need with faulchion, mace, or spear.

Loud, loud he blew his bugle, sore troubled was his eye,
But by God's grace before his face there stood a tree full nigh,
A comely tree with branches strong, close by the wall of "Yon goodly bough will serve, I trow," quoth Don Diego Perez.

A gnarled branch he soon did wrench down from that olive strong,
Which o'er his head-piece brandishing, he spurs among the God wot! full many a Pagan must in his saddle reel!
What leech shall cure, what priest shall shrive, if once that weight ye feel?

But when Don Alvar saw him thus bruising down the foe,
Quoth he, "I've seen some flail-arm'd man belabor barley so!"
Sure mortal mould did ne'er fold such mastery of power;
Let's call Diego Perez THE POUNDER from this hour."

DON JUAN:

A SPECTRAL RESEARCH.

BY WASHINGTON IRVING, ESQ.

"I have heard of spirits walking with aerial bodies, and have been wondered at by others; but I must only wonder at myself, for, if they be not mad, I'm come to my own burial!"—(Shirley's Witty Fairies One.)

Every body has heard of the fate of Don Juan, the famous libertine of Seville, who, for his sins against the fair sex, and other minor peccadilloes, was hurried away to the infernal regions. His story has been illustrated in play, in pantomime, and farce, on every stage in Christendom, until at length it has been rendered the theme of the opera of operas, and embalmed to endless duration in the glorious music of Mozart. I well recollect the effect of this story upon my feelings in my boyish days, though represented in grotesque pantomime; the awe with which I contemplated the monumental statue on horseback of the murdered commander, gleaming by pale moonlight in the convent cemetery: how my heart quaked as he bowed his marble head, and accepted the impious invitation of Don Juan: how each foot-fall of the statue smote upon my heart, as I heard it approach, step by step, through the echoing corridor, and beheld it enter, and advance, a moving figure of stone, to the supper table! But then the convivial scene in the charnal house, where Don Juan returned the visit of the statue; was offered a banquet of skulls and bones, and on refusing to partake, was hurled into a yawning gulf, under a tremendous shower of fire! These were accumulated horrors enough to shake the nerves of the most pantomime-loving school-boy. Many have supposed the story of Don Juan a mere fable. I myself thought so once; but "seeing is believing." I have since beheld the very scene where it took place, and now to indulge any doubt on the subject would be preposterous.

I was one night perambulating the streets of Seville, in company with a Spanish friend, a curious investigator of the popular traditions and other good-for-nothing lore of the city, and who was kind enough to imagine he had met, in me, with a congenial spirit. In the course of our rambles, we were passing by a heavy, dark gate-way, opening into the courtyard of a convent, when he laid his hand upon my arm: "Stop!" said he; "this is the convent of San Francisco; there is a story connected with it, which I am sure must be known to you. You cannot but have heard of Don Juan and the marble statue?"

"Undoubtedly," replied I; "it has been familiar to me from childhood."

"Well, then, it was in the cemetery of this very convent that the events took place."

"Why, you do not mean to say that the story is founded on fact?"

"Undoubtedly it is. The circumstances of the case are said to have occurred during the reign of Alfonso XI. Don Juan was of the noble family of Tenorio, one of the most illustrious houses of Andalusia. His father, Don Diego Tenorio, was a favorite of the king, and his family ranked among the vieitecueros, or magistrates, of the city. Presuming on his high descent and powerful connections, Don Juan set no bounds to his excesses: no female, high or low, was sacred from his pursuit; and he soon became the scandal of Seville. One of his most daring outrages was, to penetrate by night into the palace of Don Gonzalo de Ulloa, commander of the order of Calatrava, and attempt to carry off his daughter. The household was alarmed; a scuffle in the dark took place; Don Juan escaped, but the unfortunate commander was found weltering in his blood, and expired without being able to name his murderer. Suspicions attached to Don Juan; he did not stop to meet the investigations of justice and the vengeance of the powerful family of Ulloa, but fled from Seville, and took refuge with his uncle, Don Pedro Tenorio, at that time ambassador at the court of Naples. Here he remained until the agitation occasioned by the murder of Don Gonzalo had time to subside; and the scandal which the affair might cause to both the families of Ulloa and Tenorio had induced them to hush it up. Don Juan, however, continued his libertine career at Naples, until at length his excesses forfeited the protection of his uncle, the ambassador, and obliged him again to flee. He had made his way back to Seville, trusting that his past misdeeds were forgotten, or rather trusting to his dare-devil spirit and the power of his family, to carry him through all difficulties.

"It was shortly after his return, and while in the height of his arrogance, that, on visiting this very convent of Francisco, he beheld on a monument the equestrian statue of the murdered commander, who had been buried within the walls of this sacred edifice, where the family of Ulloa had a chapel. It was on this occasion that Don Juan, in a moment of impious levity, invited the statue to the banquet, the awful catastrophe of which has given such celebrity to his story."

"And pray how much of this story," said I, "is believed in Seville?"

"The whole of it by the populace; with whom it has been a favorite tradition since time immemorial, and who crowd to the theatres to see it represented in dramas written long since by Tyro de Molina, and another of our popular writers. Many in our higher ranks also, accustomed from childhood to this story, would feel somewhat indignant at hearing it treated with contempt. An attempt has been made to explain the whole, by asserting that, to put an end to the extravagancies of Don Juan, and to pacify the family of Ulloa, without exposing the delinquent to the degrading penalties of justice, he was decoyed into this convent under false pretext, and either plunged into a perpetual dungeon, or privately hurried out of existence; while the story of the statue was circulated by the monks, to account for his sudden disappearance. The populace, however, are not to be cajoled out of a ghost story by any of these plausible explanations; and the marble statue still strides the stage, and Don Juan is still plunged into the infernal regions, as an awful warning to all rake-helly youngsters, in like case offending."

While my companion was relating these anecdotes, we had entered the gateway, traversed the exterior court-yard of the convent, and made our way into a great interior court, partly surrounded by cloisters and dormitories, partly by chapels, and having a large fountain in the centre. The pile had evidently once been extensive and magnificent; but it was for the greater part in ruins. By the light of the stars, and of twinkling lamps placed here and there in the corridors, I could see that many of the columns and arches were broken; the walls were rent and riven; while burnt beams and rafters showed the destructive effects of fire. The whole place had a desolate air; the night breeze rustled through grass and weeds flaunting out of the crevices of the walls, or from the shattered columns; the bat flitted about the vaulted passages, and the owl hooted from the ruined belfry. Never was any scene more completely fitted for a ghost story.

While I was indulging in picturings of the fancy, proper to such a place, the deep chaunt of the monks from the convent church came swelling upon the ear. "It is the vesper service," said my companion; "follow me."

Leading the way across the court of the cloisters, and through one or two ruined passages, he reached the distant portals of the church, and pushing open a wicket, cut in the folding doors, we found ourselves in the deep arched vestibule of the sacred edifice. To our left was the choir, forming one end of the church, and having a low vaulted ceiling, which gave it the look of a cavern. About this were ranged the monks, seated on stools, and chaunting from immense books placed on music-stands, and having the notes scored in such gigantic characters as to be legible from every part of the choir. A few lights on these music-stands dimly illuminated the choir, gleamed on the shaven heads of the monks, and threw their shadows on the walls. They were gross, blue-bearded, bullet-headed men, with bass voices, of deep metallic tone, that reverberated out of the cavernous choir.

To our right extended the great body of the church. It was spacious and lofty; some of the side chapels had gilded grates, and were decorated with images and paintings, representing the sufferings of our Saviour. Aloft was a great painting by Murillo, but too much in the dark to be distinguished. The gloom of the whole church was but faintly relieved by the reflected light from the choir, and the glimmering here and there of a votive lamp before the shrine of a saint.

As my eye roamed about the shadowy pile, it was struck with the dimly seen figure of a man on horseback, near a distant altar. I touched my companion, and pointed to it: "The spectre statue!" said I.

"No," replied he; "it is the statue of the blessed St. Iago; the statue of the commander was in the cemetery of the convent, and was destroyed at the time of the conflagration. But," added he, "as I see you take a proper interest in these kind of stories, come with me to the other end of the church, where our whisperings will not disturb these holy fathers at their devotions, and I will tell you another story, that has been current for some generations in our city, by which you will find that Don Juan is not the only libertine that has been the object of supernatural castigation in Seville."

I accordingly followed him with noiseless tread to the farther part of the church, where we took our seats on the steps of an altar, opposite to the suspicious-looking figure on horseback, and there, in a low mysterious voice, he related to me the following narrative:

"There was once in Seville a gay young fellow, Don Manuel de Manara by name, who having come to a great estate by the death of his father, gave the reins to his passions, and plunged into all kinds of dissipation. Like Don Juan, whom he seemed to have taken for a model, he became famous for his enterprises among the fair sex, and was the cause of doors being barred and windows grated with more than usual strictness. All in vain. No balcony was too high for him to scale; no bolt or bar was proof against his efforts; and his very name was a word of terror to all the jealous husbands and cautious fathers of Seville. His exploits extended to country as well as city; and in the village dependant on his castle, scarce a rural beauty was safe from his arts and enterprises.

"As he was one day ranging the streets of Seville, with several of his dissolute companions, he beheld a procession about to enter the gate of a convent. In the centre was a young female, arrayed in the dress of a bride; it was a novice, who, having accomplished her year of probation, was about to take the black veil, and consecrate herself to heaven. The companions of Don Manuel drew back, out of respect to the sacred pageant; but he pressed forward, with his usual impetuosity, to gain a near view of the novice. He almost jostled her, in passing through the portal of the church, when, on her turning round, he beheld the countenance of a beautiful village girl, who had been the object of his ardent pursuit, but who had been spirited secretly out of his reach by her relatives. She recognized him at the same moment, and fainted; but was borne within the grate of the chapel. It was supposed the agitation of the ceremony and the heat of the throng had overcome her. After some time, the curtain which hung within the grate was drawn up: there stood the novice, pale and trembling, surrounded by the abbess and the nuns. The ceremony proceeded; the crown of flowers was taken from her head: she was shorn of her silken tresses, received the black veil, and went passively through the remainder of the ceremony.

"Don Manuel de Manara, on the contrary, was roused to fury at the sight of this sacrifice. His passion, which had almost faded away in the absence of the object, now glowed with tenfold ardor, being inflamed by the difficulties placed in his way, and piqued by the measures which had been taken to defeat him. Never had the object of his pursuit appeared so lovely and desirable as when within the grate of the convent; and he swore to have her, in defiance of heaven and earth. By dint of bribing a female servant of the convent, he contrived to convey letters to her, pleading his passion in the most eloquent and seductive terms. How successful they were, is only matter of conjecture; certain it is, he undertook one night to scale the garden wall of the convent, either to carry off the nun, or gain admission to her cell. Just as he was mounting the wall, he was suddenly plucked back, and a stranger, muffled in a cloak, stood before him.

"'Rash man, forbear!' cried he: 'is it not enough to have violated all human ties? Wouldst thou steal a bride from Heaven!'

"The sword of Don Manuel had been drawn on the instant, and furious at this interruption, he passed it through the body of the stranger, who fell dead at his feet. Hearing approaching footsteps, he fled the fatal spot, and mounting his horse, which was at hand, retreated to his estate in the country, at no great distance from Seville. Here he remained throughout the next day, full of horror and remorse; dreading lest he should be known as the murderer of the deceased, and fearing each moment the arrival of the officers of justice.

"The day passed, however, without molestation; and, as the evening advanced, unable any longer to endure this state of uncertainty and apprehension, he ventured back to Seville. Irresistibly his footsteps took the direction of the convent; but he paused and hovered at a distance from the scene of blood. Several persons were gathered round the place, one of whom was busy nailing something against the convent wall. After a while they dispersed, and one passed near to Don Manuel. The latter addressed him, with hesitating voice.

"Señor," said he, "may I ask the reason of yonder throng?"

"A cavalier," replied the other, "has been murdered."

"Murdered!" echoed Don Manuel; "and can you tell me his name?"

"Don Manuel de Manara," replied the stranger, and passed on.

Don Manuel was startled at this mention of his own name; especially when applied to the murdered man. He ventured, when it was entirely deserted, to approach the fatal spot. A small cross had been nailed against the wall, as is customary in Spain, to mark the place where a murder has been committed; and just below it he read, by the twinkling light of a lamp: "Here was murdered Don Manuel de Manara. Pray to God for his soul!"

Still more confounded and perplexed by this inscription, he wandered about the streets until the night was far advanced, and all was still and lonely. As he entered the principal square, the light of torches suddenly broke on him, and he beheld a grand funeral procession moving across it. There was a great train of priests, and many persons of dignified appearance, in ancient Spanish dresses, attending as mourners, none of whom he knew. Accosting a servant who followed in the train, he demanded the name of the defunct.

"Don Manuel de Manara," was the reply; and it went cold to his heart. He looked, and indeed beheld the armorial bearings of his family emblazoned on the funeral escutcheons. Yet not one of his family was to be seen among the mourners. The mystery was more and more incomprehensible.

He followed the procession as it moved on to the cathedral. The bier was deposited before the high altar; the funeral service was commenced, and the grand organ began to peal through the vaulted aisles.

Again the youth ventured to question this awful pageant. "Father," said he, with trembling voice, to one of the priests, "who is this you are about to inter?"

"Don Manuel de Manara!" replied the priest.

"Father," cried Don Manuel, impatiently, "you are deceived. This is some imposture. Know that Don Manuel de Manara is alive and well, and now stands before you. I am Don Manuel de Manara!"

"'Avant, rash youth!" cried the priest; "know that Don Manuel de Manara is dead!—is dead!—is dead!—and we are all souls from purgatory, his deceased relatives and ancestors, and others that have been aided by masses from his family, who are permitted to come here and pray for the repose of his soul!"

"Don Manuel cast round a fearful glance upon the assemblage, in antiquated Spanish garb, and recognised in their pale and ghastly countenances the portraits of many an ancestor that hung in the family picture-gallery. He now lost all self-command, rushed up to the bier, and beheld the counterpart of himself, but in the fixed and livid lineaments of death. Just at that moment the whole choir burst forth with a 'Requiescat in pace,' that shook the vaults of the cathedral. Don Manuel sank senseless on the pavement. He was found there early the next morning by the sacristan, and conveyed to his home. When sufficiently recovered, he sent for a friar, and made a full confession of all that had happened.

"My son," said the friar, "all this is a miracle and a mystery, intended for thy conversion and salvation. The corpse thou hast seen was a token that thou hadst died to sin and the world: take warning by it, and henceforth live to righteousness and heaven!"

"Don Manuel did take warning by it. Guided by the counsils of the worthy friar, he disposed of all his temporal affairs; dedicated the greater part of his wealth to pious uses, especially to the performance of masses for souls in purgatory; and finally, entering a convent, became one of the most zealous and exemplary monks in Seville."

While my companion was relating this story, my eyes wandered, from time to time, about the dusky church. Methought the burly countenances of the monks in the distant choir assumed a pallid, ghastly hue, and their deep, metallic voices had a sepulchral sound. By the time the story was ended, they had ended their chaunt; and, extinguishing their lights, glided one by one, like shadows, through a small door in the side of the choir. A deeper gloom prevailed over the church; the figure opposite me on horseback grew more and more spectral; and I almost expected to see it bow its head.

"It is time to be off," said my companion, "unless we intend to sup with the statue."

"I have no relish for such fare or such company," replied I; and, following my companion, we groped our way through the mouldering cloisters. As we passed by the ruined cemetery, keeping up a casual conversation, by way of dispelling the loneliness of the scene, I called to mind the words of the poet:

— "The tombs
And monumental caves of death look cold
And shoot a chilliness to my trembling heart!
Give me thy hand, and let me hear thy voice;
Nay, speak—and let me hear thy voice;
Mine own affrights me with its echoes."

There wanted nothing but the marble statue of the commander, striding along the echoing cloisters, to complete the haunted scene.

Since that time, I never fail to attend the theatre whenever the story of Don Juan is represented, whether in pantomime or opera. In the sepulchral scene, I feel myself quite at home; and when the statue makes his appearance, I greet him as an old acquaintance. When the audience applaud, I look round upon them with a degree of compassion: "Poor souls!" I say to myself, "they think they are pleased; they think they enjoy this piece, and yet they consider the whole as a fiction! How much more would they enjoy it, if like me they knew it to be true—and had seen the very place!"

BEDS AND BEDROOMS.

By LEIGH HUNT.

We have written elsewhere of "Sleep," and of "Getting up on Cold Mornings," and divers other matters connected with bed; but, unless we had written volumes on that one subject, it would be hard indeed if we could not find fresh matter to speak of, connected with the bed itself, and the room which it inhabits; especially during the month of January. We involuntarily use a verb with a human sense—"inhabits"; for of all goods and chattels, this surely contracts a kind of humanity from the warmth so often given to it by the comfortable soul within. Its pillows—as a philosophic punster would observe—have something in them "next to the human cheek." A blow given in anger to the body of it would seem almost an affront to a sentiment. And we have sometimes a difficulty in believing, that its very posts are the mere staid and indifferent personages they pretend to be.

"Home is home," says the good proverb, "however homely." Equally certain are we, that bed is bed, however beddy. (We have a regard for this bit of parody on the old saying, because we made Charles Lamb laugh one night with it, when we were coming away with him out of a friend's house.) Bed is the home of home; the innermost part of the content. It is sweet within sweet; a nut in the nut; within the suggest nest, a snugger nest; my retreat from the publicity of my privacy: my room within my room, walled (if we please) with curtains; a box, a separation, a snug corner, such as children love when they play at "house;" the place where I draw a direct line between me and my cares; where I enter upon a new existence, free, yet well invested, reposing, but full of power; where the act of lying down, and pulling the clothes over one's head, seems to exclude matters that have to do with us when dressed and on our legs; where, though in repose, one is never more conscious of one's activity, divested of those hampering weeds; where a leg is not a lump of boot and stocking, but a real leg, clear, natural, fleshy, delighting to thrust itself hither and thither; and lo! so recreating itself, it comes in contact with another; to wit, one's own. One should hardly guess as much, did it remain eternally divorced from its companion—alienated and altered into leather and prunella. Of more legs we speak not. The bed we are at this moment presenting to our imagination, is a bachelor's; for we must be cautious how we touch upon others. They are either still better or much the reverse; but they are not the plain, real, unsophisticated bed for bed's sake, that a bachelor's [and a bachelor's only be; that is to say, one in which only one person can rest at a time; for bachelor, as every body knows, is a term relative, and does not barely signify a man that is unmarried. Your married man is sometimes your bachelor temporary. And, for a like reason, we except an unmarried lady's bed, if there is such a thing—Bachelora's; but we dare not think of it. The more we approximate it to our own, the less we discern of a similarity. The other beds are far above, or equally as far below, the real beddy character; heavens for two, or hells for one and one; Miltonian Paradises, or horrible consolidated alienations; sweet amalgamators of more than friendship, or—nay, perhaps good and reasonable in their way, but at all events they are not to our purpose. A bed divided, in our present understanding of the word, whether for better, or worse, or neither, is but half a bed; and we are speaking of whole ones. A married man may, to be sure, condescend, if he pleases, for the trifle's sake, to taste of the poor bachelor's satisfaction. He has only to go to bed an hour before his wife. Or the lady may do as much vice versa. And herein we can fancy one gratification, even of the bachelor or spinster order, beyond what a bachelor or spinster can often be presumed to realize; which is, the pleasure of being in bed at your ease, united with the highest kind of advantage over the person that is up. Let us not be misunderstood. The sense of this advantage is not of the malignant kind. You do not enjoy yourself, because others are in misery; but, because your pleasure at the moment being very much in your bed, and it not being the other's pleasure to come to bed so soon (which you rather wonder at), you are at liberty to make what conclusions you please as to the superior nature of your condition. And there is this consideration besides; namely, that you being in bed, and others up, all cares and attentions naturally fall to their side of duty; so that you are at once the master of your repose, and of their activity. A bachelor, we confess, may enjoy a good deal of this. He may have kindred in the house, or servants, or the man and woman that keep the lodging; and from all or either of these considerations he may derive a considerable satisfaction. It is a lordly thing to reflect, that others are sitting up, and nobly doing some duty or other with sleepy eyes, while ourselves are exquisitely shutting ours; they being also ready to answer one's bell, bring us our white wine whey, or a lamp, or a clean shirt, or even to go out in spite of the rain, for some fruit, should we fancy it, or for a doctor in case we should be ill, or to answer some question for the mere pleasure of answering it.

"Who's there?"

"Me, sir;—Mrs. Jones."

"Oh, I beg your pardon, Mrs. Jones; I merely rang to know if you were up."

"Dear me, yes, sir, and likely to be this hour."

(Aside and happy)—"Poor soul."

"It's Mr. Jones's club-night."

("Poor Jones! Capital pillow this!")

"And it's a full hour's walk from the Dog and Falcon."

("Poor Jones! Very easy mattress.") Aloud—Bless me, that's a bad business; and it rains, does n't it, Mrs. Jones?"

"A vile rain, sir, with an east wind."
 "(Poor Jones! Delicious curtains these!) Could n't the servant sit up, and let Mr. Jones in?"

"Lord, sir, we're both of us sitting up, for I'm frightened out of my wits, sitting alone; and Mr. Jones would n't be pleased if I did n't see him in myself."

"(Poor Jones!) Good night, Mrs. Jones, pray do n't stand any longer at that cold door."

"Do you want any thing, sir?"

"Nothing, I thank you. I am very comfortable. What o'clock is it?"

"Just going one, sir."

"(Poor woman!—Poor Susan!—Poor Jones!) Where goes the wind; patter go the windows; rumble goes a coach; past one! goes the watchman; to sleep go I.

This is pretty; but a wife, instead of the woman of the house—a wife up, and going about like one's guardian angel; we also loving her well, and having entreated her to come to bed, only she can't come for this half hour—either we know nothing of bliss itself—but the variety—merely as a variety—the having a whole bed for half an hour, merely as a change from that other super-human elysian state; the seeing even a little pain borne so beautifully by the partner of one's existence, whom we love the better for it, and cannot but rejoice in seeing gifted with such an opportunity of showing herself to advantage; all this, if we mistake not (owing to our present bachelor hallucination,) must be a sublimation of satisfaction unknown to us sojourners at large, who are but too often accused, with justice, of having more room than we know what to do with.

A bed, to be perfectly comfortable, should be warm, clean, well made, and of a reasonable softness. The general opinion seems to be in favor of feather-beds. To ourselves (if the fact must be publicly torn out of us by a candor trying to our sense of our nothingness) a feather-bed is a Slough of Despond. When we are in the depths of it, we long to be on the heights. When we get on the heights, down they go with us, and turn into depths. The feathers hamper us, obstruct, irritate, suffocate. It is not lying upon a bed, but in it. We lose the sense of repose and independence, and feel ourselves in the hands of a soft lubberly giant. The pleasure of being "tucked up," we can better understand; but it likes us not. What we require is, that the body should be as free as possible from every obstruction. We desire to go counter to all that we endure when up and about. We must have nothing constrained about us, and must be able to thrust arms and legs whithersoever we please. That the bed should be well and delicately tucked up, pleaseth us; but only that we may have the greater satisfaction in disengaging the clothes on each side with a turn of the foot, and so giving freedom to our borders.

Upon my resting body,
 Lie gently, gentle clothes.

Warmth, cleanliness and ease being secured, it is of minor importance what sort of bed we lie in, whether it has curtains, or a canopy, or even legs. We can lie on the floor for that matter, the palliase being of a decent thickness. The floor itself then becomes a part of the great field of rest, in which we expatiate. There is nothing to bound our right of incumbency; we can gather the clothes about us, and roll over the floor if we please. Much greater philosophy does it take, on the other hand, to make us go up half-a-dozen steps to our bed—to climb up to such lofty absurdities as are shown in old houses for the beds of James's and Charles's time; thrones rather, and canopies for Prester John; edifices of beds, where we make a show of the privatest and humblest of our pleasures; contrivances for the magnificent breaking of our necks; or, if we are not to die that way, three-piled hyperboles of beds to engulf us, like a slough on the top of a mountain. Fine curtains disgust us by the same uneasy contradiction. We do not mean handsome ones of a reasonable kind, but velvet and such like cumbrous clouds, lording it over the sweet idea of rest, and forcing us to think of the most fantastic pretensions. And we hate gilding, and coronets, and imperial eagles, and fleurs de lis, and all other conspiracies to put out the natural man in us, and deprive the poor great human being of the sweet privilege of being on a level with his reposing fellow-creatures. We are not sure that we could patronise Cupids, gilt torches, doves and garlands, &c. Flowery curtains we like; but the Cupids and gilt torches are particular. We are not the fonder of them, for being the taste in France. Curtains, paperings, plates and dishes, every thing in that country, babbles, not of green fields as with us, which is pretty, but of gallantry and la belle passion. The French (when they are not afraid of being thought afraid) are a good-natured people; and they are much wiser in this good nature, than if they took to "heavy wet," and being sulky. But in these amatory matters we can never find the proper case made out. There is something ever too cold, or too meretricious. And these extremes, like others, are too apt to meet. Our Cupids and torches would be well, provided we could be secure that none but eyes of good taste would see them; but how are they or we to look, when every idle servant, or the glazier, or the landlord, or the man that comes to look at the house when it is to be let, is to gaze about him, and makes an impertinence of our loves and graces? There is one way. Methinks, improving upon the hints afforded by Roman Catholic usages, we could make a pretty compromise enough with our likings and non-likings in this matter. Imitating the oriel or little chapels which they keep locked up in the wall of their bed rooms, we might collect our symbolical paintings and sculptures in the same way, all full of such sentiment as well as beauty, as should do honor to the affections: and so, throwing open our wall at night, and lighting up the silver lamp on our pretty Pagan altar (not without a better religion in it,) repose in the keeping of those half-earthly and half-seraphical arms, till they were withdrawn (like others) with the common light of day. Yet this might be too premeditated, and seem monstrously to attempt joining an impulse with a form.

But we forget our solitary condition. We should almost equally dislike the most gorgeous and the most sorry bedroom, did not the former stand the greater chance of cleanliness. The Duke of Buckingham, "gallant and gay," in one of the state beds of Cliefden's "proud alcove," and reckless and drunk in "the worst inn's worst room," behind his

"Tape-tied curtains never meant to draw,"

(which, by the way, was not true) is, to our mind, in no such difference of condition as the poet makes him out. And his company were much like one another in both cases. Nay, that is not true neither; for it would have been difficult to pick up such an abomination from a village alehouse, as the Countess of Shrewsbury—a woman, ugly and loathsome all over, with a hard heart. Commend us (for a climate like ours) to a bed-chamber of the middle order, such as it was set out about a hundred years back, and may still be seen in the houses of some old families; the room of moderate size; the four-post bedstead neatly and plentifully, but not richly, draped; the chairs draped also, down to the ground; a drapery over the toilet; the carpet, a good old Turkey or Brussels, not covering the floor, and easily to be taken up and shaken; the wardrobe and drawers of old shining oak, walnut, or mahogany; a few cabinet pictures, as exquisite as you please; the windows with seats, and looking upon some green place; two or three small shelves of books; and the drawers, when they are opened, redolent of lavender and clean linen. We dislike the cut-and-dry look of modern fashions; the cane chairs, formal-patterned carpets, and flimsy rooms. Modern times (or till very lately they were so) are all for lightness, and cheap sufficiency, and what is considered a Grecian elegance; and we realize only an insipid or gaudy anatomy of things, a cold pretension, and houses that will tumble upon the heads of our grand-children. But these matters, like others, are gradually improving. If our bedroom is to be perfect, it should face the east, to rouse us pleasantly with the morning sun; and in case we should be tempted, notwithstanding, to lie too long in so sweet a nest, there should be a happy family of birds at the windows, to shower the springing heart with songs.

It is a good thing: however to reflect, that custom alone is half the secret of content. The reason why we like a hard bed is, that we were brought up at a public school, without any sort of luxuries; and, to this day, we like just such a sort of bed as we had there. We could find a satisfaction in having the identical kind of rug over our sheets; and sheets, too, of no greater fineness. And the same reason makes us prefer a coarse towel to a fine one, and a gown, of some sort, to a coat; with a pocket in the same place as the one in which we used to put our marbles and tops, and our pocket editions of Gray and Collins. We have since slept in houses of all sorts—in rich houses and in poor, in cottages, in taverns and inns, and public-houses, in palaces (what at least the Italian call such), and on board ship; yea, in bivouacs—just enough to taste the extremest hardness of the bed military; and for the only contrivance utterly to vitiate our night's rest, commend us to the bed of down. That, and the wooden bed of the guard-house, disputed the palm. Habit does the same with kings and popes. Frederick the Second, probably injured to it by his father, preferred lying in a little tent-bed; such a one as Voltaire found him in at their first interview, shivering with an ague; and we learn from Horace Walpole's Letters, that the good Pope, Benedict the Fourteenth, lay upon one no better—the palliase, most probably, of his convent,—by the side of the gorgeous canopy prepared for his rank. In truth, luxuriate as we may in this our at-different-times-written article (wherein the indulgences and speculations, though true at the moment, are of many years chance preservation on paper, and therefore may crave excuse if they look a little ultra nice and fanciful, beyond the warrant of experience), we should be heartily ashamed of ourselves, at our present time of life, if we could not sleep happily in any bed (down and mud always excepted), provided only it had enough clothes to keep us warm, and were as clean and decent as honest poverty could make it. We talk of fine chambers, and luxurious contrasts of sitters up; but our secret passion is for a very cheerful, little, homely room in a cottage, with perfect quiet, and a book or two, and a sprig of rosemary in the window; not the book or two for the purpose of reading in bed—(having once received a startling lesson that way, and not choosing to burn down the village,)—but in order that we may see them in the window the first thing in the morning, together with the trees of which they discourse. Add to this, a watch-dog at a distance, and a moaning wind, no matter how "melancholy," provided it does not blow a tempest (for though nature does nothing but for good, the particular suffering sometimes presses upon those who have been at sea,) and we drop to sleep in a transport of comfort. Compare such a bed as this with one that we have seen during a storm of fifty-six hours' duration at sea, the occupant (the mate of the vessel) with his hands wet, black, and blistered, and smarting with the cold, and the very bed (a hole in a corner) as wet as his hands! And the common sailors had worse! And yet the worst of all, shut out from wet and cold as they were, but not having work like the seamen to occupy the mind, were the cribs of a parcel of children tossing about in all this tempest, and the bed of their parents on the cabin floor. With these recollections (as the whole vessel got safe) we sometimes think we could find it in our hearts to relish even a feather-bed.

A very large bed-room in an old country-house is not pleasant, where the candle shows you the darkness at the other end of it, and you begin to think it possible for houses to be haunted. And as little comfortable is the bed with a great dusty canopy, such as they say the Highland Laird mistook for the bed itself, and mounted at top of, while he put his servant into the sheets, thinking that the loftier stratum was the place of grandeur. Sometimes these canopies are domed, and adorned with plumes, which gives them a funeral look; and a nervous gentleman, who, while getting into bed, is hardly sure that a hand will not thrust itself out beneath the valence, and catch him by the ankle, does not feel quite so bold in it as the French general, who, when threatened by a few sheeted ghosts, told them to make the best of their way off, or he would give them a sound thrashing. On the other hand, unless warranted by necessity and good humor, which can reconcile anything, it is very disagreeable to see sofa-bedsteads and press-bedsteads in "stived-up" little rooms, half sitting-room and half chamber. They look as if they never could be well aired. For a similar reason, an Englishman cannot well like the French beds, that shut up into alcoves in the wall. We do not like to object to a custom merely because it is foreign; nor is it unreasonable, or indeed otherwise than agreeable, that a bed-room of good dimensions should include a partial bit of a sitting-room, or boudoir; but in that case, and indeed in all cases, it should be kept scrupulously neat and clean. Order in a house first manifests itself in the room which the house-wife inhabits; and every sentiment of the heart, as well as of the external graces, demands that a very reverence and religion of neatness should be there exhibited; not formality—not a want of snugness: every thing the reverse;—but all with evidences that the esteem of a life is preferred to the slatternliness of the moment, and that two hearts are always reigning together in that apartment, though one person alone should be present.

It is very proper that bed-rooms, which can afford it, should be adorned with agreeable pictures, with flowers by day-time, (they are not wholesome at night,) and, if possible, with sculpture. We are among those who believe, with the old romance of Heliodorus, that objects of beauty or otherwise are not without their influence upon the imagination, under circumstances that affect the earliest periods of existence. Besides, it is wholesome to live in the kindly and tranquil atmosphere of the arts; and few, even of the graceful-minded, turn to half the account they might do, the innumerable beauties which Heaven has lavished upon the world, both in art and nature. Better hang a wild rose over the toilet, than nothing. The eye that looks in the glass will see there something besides itself, and acquire something of a religious right to respect itself, in thinking by how many objects in the creation the bloom of beauty is shared.

The most sordidly ridiculous anecdote we remember of a bed-chamber, is one in the life of Elwes, the rich miser, who, asking a visitor one morning how he had rested, and being told that he could not escape from the rain which came through the roof of the apartment, till he had found out one particular corner in which to stow the trundle-bed, said, laughingly, and without any misgiving, "Ah! what, you found it out, did you? Ah! that's a nice corner, isn't it?" This, however, is surpassed in dramatic effect, by the story of two ministers of state, in the last century, who were seen one day, by a sudden visitor, furiously discussing some great question out of two separate beds in one room, by day-time, their arms and bodies thrust forward toward each other out of the clothes, and the gesticulation going on accordingly. If our memory does not deceive us, one of them was Lord Chatham. He had the gout, and his colleague coming in to see him, and the weather being very cold, and no fire in the room, the Noble Earl had persuaded his visitor to get into the other bed. The most ghastly bed-chamber story, in real life, (next to actually mortal ones,) is that of a lady who dreamt that her servant-maid was coming into the room to murder her, and who, rising in her bed with the horror of the dream in her face, encountered, in the opening door, the no less horrified face of the maid-servant, coming in with a light to do what her mistress apprehended.

To give this article the termination fittest for it, such as leaves the reader with the most comprehensive sense upon him of profound rest, and of whatsoever conduces to lull and secure it, we shall conclude with a marvellously beautiful passage of Spenser, in which, like the other greatest poets, he combines, with the most poetical fiction, that familiar truth which brings its remotest fancies home to us, and makes them live with us for ever. Morpheus, the god of sleep, has an impossible bed somewhere, on the borders of the sea—on the shore of "the world of waters wide and deep," by which its draperies are perpetually washed; but observe how this fictitious bed is made real by every collateral circumstance; and pray be considerate enough to the poet's intention, to read the stanza slowly and softly, with a relish of every word, and with especial pause after every word silence in the last line.

"And more to lull him in his slumber soft,
 A trickling stream, from high rock tumbling down,
 And ever-drizzling rains upon the loft,
 Mixt with a murmuring wind, much like the sown
 Of awning bees, did cast him in a swoon.
 No other noise, nor people's troubled cries
 As still are wont to annoy the walled towns,
 Might there be heard; but careless quiet lyes,
 Wrapt in eternal silence—farre from ennyeyes."

THE GOLDSMITH'S DAUGHTER. A LEGEND.

BY MRS. VALENTINE BARTHOLOMEW, LATE MRS. TURNBULL.

Fair maiden, let thy father make a ring of jewels rare,
 And with some curious workmanship entwine this lock of hair;
 I mean it as a gift to one whose beauty is my pride.
 So, prithee, let the ring be wrought fit for a royal bride.

The maiden's cheek turned deadly pale, as he repeated o'er
 The order for that fatal ring beneath her father's door. [blond,
 How often had that treacherous knight stood there with whispers
 Relating tales of faithful love, as he fondly pressed her hand!

But honied words and sunny smiles will lead young hearts astray,
 And looks as gentle as the lamb's sometimes the wolf betray.
 That knight's dark eyes are turned from hers, there's coldness in his tone,
 And bitterly that maiden wept in silence when alone.

The ring is wrought with sapphire stones, encircled round with pearl
 And emerald and diamond wreaths surround a raven cur;
 And tears stole down the maiden's cheek, as her trembling fingers strove

To weave the hair in some device that told of treacherous love.

One morning at the Goldsmith's gate a cavalcade was seen,
 And on a snow white charger rode a knight of graceful mien;
 "Make haste, my child!" the old man cried; "make haste, and hither bring

To the princely knight, who waiteth here, his lady's bridal ring."

With faltering steps the girl obeyed her father's hard commands,
 And in the wilderness of despair before her father's love stands;
 He gave her but one thrilling look, and then with rapture cried—
 "The ring, beloved one, is for thee, my beautiful, my bride!"

ORIENTAL PLEASURE.—The grey dawn of the morning had just streaked the eastern horizon, and was rapidly deepening into the crimson glories of day, as we stood with folded arms by the bank of the Euphrates, and listened to the heavy rush of its waters. We sat down and began to smoke a pipe by the bank of the river; and, ere long, enveloped in the light-blue clouds that rose in graceful wreaths from the silver edges of our pipes, we surrendered ourselves to that negation of thought or care which creates a dolce far niente paradise for the mind, in whose dreamy realm all, save existence itself, becomes a burden.

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

The passage and stair-case were sufficiently commodious, as were the rooms. At the back of the house was a small garden, about twenty yards in length, and about ten yards in width, with several lilacs, laburnums, and shrubs; and a considerable portion of the wall was covered with ivy. Was not this a delightful place for the children to play about in? The back parlor, a somewhat small room, certainly, looked into this garden; and that room was at once appropriated to the study of Mr. Aubrey. Within a week's time, all their luggage, furniture, &c., had arrived in town from Yatton; and they had quite sufficient to furnish their little residence out of the wreck of the furniture and equipments of the old Hall—adopted, as it was, under the tasteful superintendence of Mrs. and Miss Aubrey, with equal regard to elegance, simplicity, and economy. How busy were they all for a fortnight! Many and many an irrepressible sigh, and rebellious tear, would the sight of these old familiar objects, in their new situation, occasion there!—Some half-dozen family pictures hung upon the wall. Over the mantel piece was suspended a piece of beautiful embroidery—by poor old Mrs. Aubrey, many years before—of the arms of the family. In the dining-room was the old high-backed chair in which she had sat for twenty years and more. In the drawing-room was Miss Aubrey's favorite cabinet, and Mrs. Aubrey's piano; and in both the rooms were to be seen every where the delicate traces of dear, dear, graceful, and elegant woman—touching nothing that she adorns not! What with the silk curtains, and a carpet of simple, but tasteful pattern, and the various articles of furniture and ornament, all possessing a kind of old family air—all from Yatton, I declare there was a kind of richness about the general aspect of the room; and when Mrs. Aubrey and Miss Aubrey came to fetch Mr. Aubrey out of his study to witness the completion of their labors, he gazed round him, looked at each object, and then at the two dear fond beings standing beside him, awaiting his opinion with woman's eagerness; but he could not express his feelings. He kissed each of them very tenderly, and in silence, and then they were a little overcome. His study, also, though very small, was as snug and comfortable as a book-worm could desire. All the sides were covered with books, and in the middle was the library-table and arm-chair which he had used in Grosvenor street. That they were not incessantly and very painfully reminded of the contrast afforded by their present to their former circumstances, I do not pretend to assert; but it very, very seldom formed a topic of conversation between any of them. When, however, the little bustle and occupation of arranging their house was over, and Mrs. Aubrey and Kate were left a good deal to themselves—Mr. Aubrey being either absent from home, or in his study, engaged in matters of the last importance to them all—then they would talk together with increasing eagerness and excitement about past times, and their recent troubles and bereavements; not displaying, then—sweet souls!—quite that degree of resignation and fortitude which they strove to exhibit in the presence of Mr. Aubrey.

"Some natural tears they dropt, but wiped them soon." They passed a good deal of their time in-door in needle-work, practical family needle-work, an art in which they were not particularly accomplished, but which they quickly acquired from a sempstress whom they kept engaged constantly in the house for several weeks. Then sometimes they would sit down to the piano; at other times they would read—on all occasions, however, frequently falling into conversation on the all-engrossing topic of their expulsion from Yatton. Sometimes they could scarcely refrain from a melancholy smile, when they remarked upon their shrunken personal appearance. "Really, Agnes," said one day Miss Aubrey, "I feel just as one can fancy a few poor newly shorn sheep must feel! So light and cold! So much less than they were half an hour before! Surely they must hardly know what to make of themselves!"

"Then, I suppose, mamma," said Charles, who was sitting on a stool beside them—making believe to write on a small slate—"I am a little sheep." They both looked at the child, and frequently thought of Him who "tempers the wind to the shorn lamb."

Their proximity to the parks was delightful, and many a pleasant hour did they pass there with the children; and then returning home, would occupy themselves with writing letters—and long ones they usually were—to early and loved friends, especially to Dr. Tatham, with whom Miss Aubrey kept up a constant correspondence. I ought to have mentioned before, that Mr. Aubrey, in bringing his favorite valet up to town with him, had no other design than, with that kind thoughtfulness for which he was remarkable, to have an opportunity of securing for him a good situation; and that he succeeded in doing, after about a fortnight's interval; but the poor fellow was quite confounded when he first heard that he was to quit the service of Mr. Aubrey; and, almost falling on his knees, begged to be permitted to continue and receive no wages, and he should be a happy man. Mr. Aubrey was, however, firm; and on parting with him, which he did with no little emotion, put two guineas into his hand as a present, and wished him health and happiness. The poor fellow's deep distress at parting with the family sensibly affected them all, and reminded them vividly of one of the latest and bitterest scenes at Yatton. On his departure, their little establishment consisted but of three female servants, a cook, a housemaid, and a nurserymaid. It took them some little time to familiarise themselves with the attendance of a female servant at dinner! That was one little matter—and another was Charles' now and then complaining of being tired, and enquiring why his mamma did not drive in the carriage as she used to do, and how he liked to go with her! which brought home to them, in a lively manner, their altered circumstances—their fallen fortunes. Many, many were the anxious calculations they made together, of the probable amount of their annual expenditure—which at length, inexperienced as they were, they fixed at from £300 to £500, including every thing; Mrs. Aubrey and Miss Aubrey eagerly assuring Mr. Aubrey, and each other, that as for clothes—their wardrobe would, with care, last them for three or four years to come—so that that was an item which might be almost altogether excluded from the account; except, by the way, the children—yes, they should be always well-dressed; that all agreed upon. Then there was their education—oh, Kate would see to that! Could they, in this manner, with rigid, systematic economy, hold on their way for a year or two? was a question they often asked one another, with beating hearts. If they could, then, they said, they should be happy; for they had health—they had peace of mind; their consciences were not oppressed by a sense of misconduct—and they were able to put their trust in Providence.

Mr. Aubrey resolved to live in strict privacy; and they communicated their residence to but one or two of their numerous friends, and to them, only in confidence. To have acted otherwise, would have seriously interfered with the arrangements which, long ago contemplated, he had now fixed upon; it would be perpetually calling their attention to the contrast between former days and scenes, and the present; it would disturb their feelings, and might, moreover, subject them to kind and generous importunities and offers, which, however delicate, would be exquisitely painful and trying to an honorable pride. But it is time that I should proceed to give a more particular account of the position, the personal feelings and purposes, and prospects of Mr. Aubrey.

From the moment when Aubrey received the first intimation of the desperate assault about to be made upon his fortunes, he felt a conviction, whether arising from weakness, or superstition, or any other cause, it concerns not me here to say; that the issue would be a disastrous one for him; and, the first alarm and confusion over, with serious calmness, with deep anxiety, addressed himself to the determination of his future course of life. A man of his refined taste and feeling would inevitably appreciate exquisitely, with a most agonising intensity, the loss of all those superior enjoyments, the delicia of life, to which he had been from his birth accustomed. Semper enim delicatè ac moliter vitæ. I speak not here of the mere exterior "appliances and means" of wealth and station, but of the fastidious and sensitive condition of feeling and temper, which such a state of things is calculated to engender in a person of his description. He could part with one; but how could he divest himself of the other? Even had he been alone in the world, and not surrounded with objects of the tenderest regard, whose safety or ruin was involved in his own, one of the results of his opponent's success, namely, his claim to the meane profits, was calculated to fetter his movements, to hang like a mill-stone round his neck; and that effect, indeed, it had. Still he played the man; resolved to act promptly, and with the best consideration he could give his critical position. He had not yet reached the prime of life; had a fair share of health; had been blessed with the inestimable advantages of a thorough, a first rate education, and, above all, had followed out his early advantages by laborious and systematic study; and had not only made accurate, extensive, and valuable acquisitions, but learned how to use them, to turn them to practical account. What would, he thought, have become of him, had he, or those before him, neglected his education. Then he had acquired a considerable familiarity with business-habits, in the House of Commons; and had friends and connections, who might be of essential service to him, if he could but first succeed in acquiring a position that would enable him to avail himself of them. Surely all these were cheering considerations, subject, however, always to the dreadful drawback to which I have alluded. Had he not even advantages superior to those possessed by many in entering upon some one of the scenes of honorable struggle for a livelihood, and for even distinction? He surveyed them all with much deliberation. The army and navy were of course out of the question. There was the Church; but no, his soul recoiled from the degradation and guilt of entering that holy calling from mercenary motives, merely as a means of acquiring a livelihood; and he would rather have perished, than prefer the prayer of one whose lamentable case is left on record; who "came and crouched for a piece of silver, and a morsel of bread, saying, put me, I pray thee, into one of the priest's offices, that I may eat a piece of bread." A personage of very high distinction in the Church, of eminent piety and learning, who was aware of the misfortunes of Aubrey, and well acquainted with his pure and exemplary character, his learning and acquirements, his fitness for the ministerial office, wrote to him, offering him every facility for taking orders, and assuring him that he need not wait long before very suitable provision would be made for him. Though he assured Mr. Aubrey that he believed himself consulting the best interests, both of Mr. Aubrey and of the Church—the scruples of Mr. Aubrey were not to be overcome, and he wrote to the kind and venerable prelate, a letter declining his offers, and assigning reasons which filled him with profound respect for Mr. Aubrey. Then literature, for which—for real substantial literature—he possessed superior qualifications, was proverbially precarious. As for teaching, he felt quite unfit for it; he had not the least inclination for it; 'twas a cheerless scene of exertion; in which, as it were, he felt his energies perishing in the using. The Bar was the profession to which his tastes and inclinations, and, he hoped, his qualifications pointed him. One of the first things he did, on reaching London, was to apply for information to one consummately qualified to guide him in the matter. He wrote to the Attorney-General, soliciting an interview at his chambers upon the subject of entering the profession; and received an immediate answer, appointing ten o'clock on Saturday, on which day the Attorney-General expected to be free from public engagements. Precisely at that hour, Mr. Aubrey entered the chambers of that distinguished person, whose arrival he anticipated. Poor Aubrey felt a little nervous and depressed as the fussy clerk showed him into the room—as he fancied, and only fancied—with an air of patronizing civility, as if aware of diminished personal consequence. He stood for a minute or two very close to Mr. Aubrey, with a sort of confidence in his manner, as he rubbed his hands, and observed on the innumerable engagements of the Attorney-General, which slightly—very slightly—displeased Mr. Aubrey, suggesting the idea of undue familiarity. He answered him therefore courteously, but with an evident disinclination to prolong the conversation, and was quickly left alone. Poor Aubrey's pride had taken the alarm. Was it possible that the man had been presuming to give him a hint not to occupy much of the Attorney-General's time? Was it even possible that it had been done in consequence of an intimation from the Attorney-General himself? Oh, no—his own good sense came presently to his assistance, and banished so absurd a notion. There were three tables in the room, and each was laden with briefs, some of them of prodigious bulk. Seven or eight very recent ones were placed on the table opposite to which his vacant chair was standing; the very sight of them oppressed Aubrey: how could one man's head manage so much? He was ruminating on such matters, and especially upon the powerful, versatile, and practised intellect which was requisite to get through so much, amid all the harassing responsibilities and occupations of political office, when the Attorney-General entered. He was a tall and handsome man, about forty-five, with an extremely graceful and gentleman-like carriage; a slight dash of negligence in it; his manner fraught with cheerful composure. He looked like a man of the world; you would have thought that he could have nothing to do but lounge at his club, ride round the Park, and saunter into the House of Lords for an hour or two. There was not a trace of anxiety or exhaustion about him; yet he had been engaged during the whole of the preceding day conducting a great political cause, and not concluding his reply till nine o'clock at night! There was a playful smile about his mouth; his ample forehead seemed unfurrowed by a wrinkle; and his bright, penetrating, hazel eyes seemed never the worse for wear with all the tens of thousands of brief sheets on which they had travelled for the last twenty years.

"Ha, Aubrey, I'm a few minutes behind time, I'm afraid! How are you?" said he, with a cheerful air, grasping his saddened visitor by the hand.

"Good morning, Mr. Attorney—Cum tot sustineas, et tanta negotia, salus," commenced Aubrey, pointing to the piles of briefs.

"Pho, my dear Aubrey; nonsense! They've enough of my time, surely, without grudging me half an hour's conversation with a friend—ah, ha!" They were both quickly seated—and within a minute or two's time the Attorney-General had got to business—the business of the visit. Aubrey perceived the rapidity of the movement; but nothing could be kinder than the manner of his companion, however distinct and decisive his intimation that time was very precious. He approved entirely of Mr. Aubrey's coming to the bar, and strongly recommended him not to lose one day in entering upon the serious practical study of it; informing him, that within three years' time he would be eligible to be called to the bar. "I'll call you myself, Aubrey, if you will allow me," said he; but before that period had arrived, he had taken his seat upon the Woolsack, as Lord High Chancellor of England.

"Undoubtedly," said he, amongst other things, when pressed by Aubrey about the difficulties he should have to encounter, "the acquisition of the technical knowledge will be for some little time rather troublesome; but a twelvemonth's steady study by a man who is in earnest and accustomed to work, will make a vast inroad on it. Every thing you master, you see, helps to master much more."

"Three years serious application to the law by a man like you, will place you far ahead of the bulk of men at the bar. Besides, 'tis not the study but the practice of the law that teaches law most effectually. Always have an eye to principle, and resolve thoroughly to understand the smallest details; and it will be a wonderful assistance in fixing them for practical use in your mind, to learn as much as you can of the reasons and policy in which they originated. You'll find Reeves' History of the English Law of infinite service to you; I should read it in the evenings; 'tis full of interest in every point of view. I read every word of it, very carefully, soon after I left college; and, by the way, I'll tell you another book, by which I did the same—the State Trials: ay, by Jove, Aubrey, I read every word of them—speeches, examinations, cross-examination of witnesses, reply, and summing up. That's where I first learned how to examine and cross-examine a witness. Consider, the counsel employed were, you know, generally first-rate men. And then you learn a great deal of constitutional law. You ask how I get through so much? To be sure, one has enough to do, and I'm afraid I neglect a good deal; but the great secret is—attention, and to one thing at a time. The sun's rays scattered are comparatively powerless; condense them, they are irresistible;—but all this you know as well as I do. Certainly, law is difficult; but its difficulty is often overrated, especially by imperfectly educated and ill-disciplined, quick, sharp men. You will find it a very different matter. What is wanted is a clear head, a good memory, strong common sense, an aptitude for analysis and arrangement; before these combined, the difficulties of the law fly like the morning mist before the sun. Tact with the court and a jury is acquired by practice, to a considerable extent, in the absence even of natural endowments. And as for you, Aubrey—upon my honor, I've often listened with great satisfaction to you in the House; few ever made clearer statements of facts, or reasoned more closely and cogently than you did; with practice, you would have become a formidable debater. In your new profession you will find facts become quite different things; flexible, elastic, accommodating—you may do anything with them—twist, and turn, and combine; ha! ha! Aubrey!" [Here the Attorney-General laughed in the plenitude of his own conscious power.] "In a word, Aubrey, if you determine to get on at the bar, you will; and if you can but get a bit of start at beginning; now there's Runnington's house—one of the very first in London—why if they would push you—your fortune's made. But you must make up your mind to wait a little; you can't get into a great business by a hop, step, and a jump, believe me. Certainly I have no cause to be dissatisfied; I've done pretty well; but I can tell you that eight years passed over me before I earned enough a-year to pay my landlady! With me, accident supplied the place of connection; but only suppose how I must have worked in the meantime to be able to do business when it came to me. I know it's said that I was always an idle man; but people were a good deal mistaken about that matter, I can promise them! What idiots they were to suppose such a thing! Why, the first start I got lifted me into a business of a thousand a-year; and in the name of common sense, how could I have got through it, if I hadn't worked beforehand? Bah! Now, if Runnington will stand by you, I'll guarantee your making £500 your first year! and if they won't, why, don't despair, you'll have to wait a little longer; but it will come at last, depend on it, if you continue on the look out! Besides, you can help me a little bit, eh? It will be a sort of introduction, you know; but we've time enough to see about that. I recommend you to get at once into the chambers of some hard-working man, with a good deal of general business, particularly pleading—let me see"—Here the Attorney-General paused and stroked his chin for about a minute, in a musing manner; "Ah! yes, there's Weasel, the very man for your purpose. He's a good pleader, and a very neat draftsman; gets through his work very cleanly—ah! Weasel's a clear-headed pains-taking man—all for law; and he's got a good deal of it. He's not a very polished person, Weasel, ha! ha! but he's an honorable, right-minded man—shall I introduce you? Well, by and by, I'll walk over with you. Books? oh! why—I suppose you've looked into Blackstone? He's a fine fellow, Blackstone, and deserves all that has been said in his praise. Many think that it's only to be glanced at, at the beginning of their studies; never believe it, he's good to the end of the chapter! I've a profound respect for Blackstone; it's the only book I've read four or five times through—ay, from cover to cover; he makes law lovely! Stick to Blackstone by all means! Reeves—oh! I mentioned him, you know. Then I should go, I think, to Coke on Littleton; but we shall have several opportunities of talking over these matters. I really believe, Aubrey, that you are doing a very wise thing in coming to the bar. If you've health, and the average opportunities, (though I think you will have more,) I'll undertake to say that in a few years time you will realize an income—which you'll earn, as you did not the one you've lost; and you'll enjoy it, Aubrey, ten thousand times more! All that I can do for you, in every way, I'll command me? By the way," he added, assuming a somewhat anxious expression of countenance, and a manner very different from the free, buoyant, off-hand manner in which, for the last twenty minutes he had been speaking, (Aubrey feeling all the while the easy commanding power and simplicity of the splendid intellect with which he was communing,) "I'm almost afraid to ask; but how do you come on, about the—the Memo Profits?"

"I have heard nothing whatever about them, as yet," replied Aubrey, sighing; his face suddenly overshadowed with gloom. A moment's pause ensued; which was interrupted by the Attorney-General, saying, in a very earnest and feeling manner, "I hope to God you'll be able to get some favorable arrangement made! You've not seen any thing of Mr. Titmouse's attorneys, I suppose?"

"Oh, no! nor heard anything from them."

"I've had very little to do with them, Quirk, Gammon, and Snap; these are the people, eh?" Mr. Aubrey nodded. "Old Quirk is a stubborn old wooden-headed fellow, an old hedgehog! Egad! that man's compounded more felonies, the old scamp, than any man in England! I should like to have him in the witness-box for a couple of hours, or so! I think I'd tickle him a little," said the Attorney-General, with a bitter smile. "They say he's a confidential adviser to a sort of Thieves' Association. But there's Gammon; I've had several things to do with him. He is a superior man, that Gammon; a very superior man. A keen dog! I recollect him being principal witness in a cause when I was for the plaintiff; and he completely baffles Subtle—ah, ah, and well I recollect it!—Subtle lost his temper at last, because he couldn't make Gammon lose his! Ah, how cleverly the fellow twisted and turned with Subtle for nearly an hour! ah, ha—Subtle looked so chagrined! Have you seen Mr. Gammon?"

"No, I've had no occasion."

"He has a pleasing, gentlemanlike appearance; rather a striking face. He's the man you'll have to deal with in any negotiations on the subject I named. You must mind what you're about with him. You mustn't think me intrusive, Aubrey; but, have they sent in their bill yet?"

Mr. Aubrey involuntarily shuddered, as he answered in the negative.

"I'd give a trifle to know how the plague such people ever came to be concerned in such a case. 'Tis quite out of their way—which is in the criminal line of business! They'll make their client pay for it through the nose, I warrant him. By the way, what an inconceivable ridiculous little ass that Titmouse is—I saw him in court at York. If he'd only go on the stage, and act naturally, he'd make his fortune as a fool!" Mr. Aubrey faintly smiled at this sally; but the topics which the Attorney-General had just before touched upon, had not a little oppressed his spirits.

"As this is comparatively an idle day with me," said the Attorney-General, "and I've got ten minutes more at your service—suppose I go with you at once—nothing like the present moment—to Mr. Weasel's!"

"I am greatly obliged to you," replied Aubrey—and both rose to go. "Say I shall be back in a few minutes," said the Attorney-General, in answer to his clerk, who reminded him, as he passed the clerk's door, that Mr. Serjeant Squelch and Mr. Putty would be there in a moment or two's time. As they crossed the court—"How do you do, Mr. Putty," said the Attorney-General, with lofty civility to a grinning little confident personage who met him, exclaiming with flippant familiarity, "How do you do, Mr. Attorney? Coming to your chambers—you do n't forget? Consultation, eh?"

"I perfectly recollect it, Mr. Putty, I shall return"—replied the Attorney-General, somewhat stiffly and passed on, arm-in-arm with Mr. Aubrey.

"Now, that forward little imp's name, Aubrey, is Putty. He was a glazier by trade; but just as he finished his apprenticeship, an uncle left him a few hundred pounds, with which—would you believe it?—nothing would suit him, but coming to the Bar—ah, ha!—The fellow's creeping into a little business, positively! They say he has a cousin who is one of the officers to the Sheriff of Middlesex, and puts a good many little things in his way! He's my junior in a criminal information against a newspaper, for charging his father-in-law—a baker, who supplies some workhouse with bread—with making it of only one-third flour, one-third rye, and the remainder sawdust—ha, ha!—I dared hardly look at the judges while I moved the Rule Nisi, for fear of laughing! This is the case in which we are going to have the consultation he spoke of—but here's Mr. Weasel's." They mounted a narrow dingy-looking, well-worn staircase—and on the first floor, beheld "Mr. WEASEL," painted over the door. On the Attorney-General knocking as soon as his clear silvery voice was heard asking for Mr. Weasel, and his dignified figure had been recognised by the clerk, who had one pen in his mouth, and another behind his ear—that humble functionary suddenly bent himself almost double three or four times; and with flustered obsequiousness assured the great man that Mr. Weasel was quite at liberty. The next moment the Attorney-General and Mr. Aubrey were introduced into Mr. Weasel's room—a small dusky room, wretchedly furnished, the walls lined with bookshelves, well filled—and the table at which he was writing, and a chair on each side of him, covered with draft paper which he was covering at a prodigious rate. He was, in fact, drawing a "Declaration" in an action for a Breach of promise of Marriage; (taking a hasty pinch of fiery Welch snuff every three minutes;) and his task was rendered very difficult, by the strange conduct of the defendant—surely the most fickle of mankind—who with an extraordinary inconsistency, not knowing his own mind for a day together, had promised to marry Miss M'Squint, the heart-broken plaintiff, firstly, within a reasonable time; secondly, on a given day; thirdly, on the defendant's return from the continent; fourthly, on the death of his father, (both of which events were averred to have taken place); fifthly, when the defendant should have cut his wise teeth; (which it was averred he had,) and lastly, on "being requested" by the lady—which it was averred she had done, and in the most precise and positive manner, had been ready and willing, and then [what will the ladies say?] tendered and offered herself to marry the said defendant, who had then wholly neglected and refused "to do any such thing." One notable peculiarity of the case was, that all these promises had been made, and all these events had transpired in one particular place—and that rather an odd one, viz., in "the parish of St. Mary Le Bone, in the ward of Cheap, in the City of London." If you had been better acquainted with Mr. Weasel's associations and mode of doing business, you would have discovered that in his imagination, all the occurrences of life took place at the same spot! But to return—thus was Mr. Weasel engaged when they entered. He was a bachelor, upwards of forty; was of spare make, of low stature, had a thin, sharp, fallow face; there was an appearance about the eyes as if they were half-blinded with being incessantly directed to white paper; he had a furrowed forehead, a small pursed-up mouth—one hardly knew why, but really there was something about his look that instantly suggested to you the image of the creature whose name he bore. He was a ravenous lawyer, darting at the point and pith of every case he was concerned in, and sticking to it—just as would his blood-thirsty namesake at the neck of a rabbit. In law he lived, moved, and had his being. In his dreams he was everlastingly spinning out pleadings which he never could understand, and hunting for cases which he could not discover. In the daytime, however, he was more successful. In fact, every thing he saw, heard, or read of—wherever he was, whatever he was doing, suggested to him question of law that might arise out of it. At his sister's wedding (whither he had not gone without reluctance) he got into a wrangle with the bridegroom, on a question started by himself, whether an infant was liable for goods supplied to his wife before marriage; at his grandmother's funeral he got into an intricate discussion with a proctor about bona notabilia, with reference to a pair of horn spectacles, which the venerable deceased had left behind her in Scotland, and a poodle in the Isle of Man; and at church, the reading of the parable of the Unjust Steward, set his devout, ingenious, and fertile mind at work for the remainder of the service, as to the modes of stating the case now-a-days against the offender, and whether it would be more advisable to proceed civilly or criminally; and if the former, at law or in equity. He was a hard-headed man; very clear and acute, and accurate in his legal knowledge: every other sort of knowledge he despised, if, indeed, he had more than the faintest hearsay knowledge of its existence. He was a Cambridge man; and there had read nothing but mathematics, in which he had made a decent figure. As soon as he had taken his degree, he migrated to the Temple, where he had ever since continued engaged in the study, and then the successful practice of the law, as a special pleader under the bar. He had a very large business, which he got through ably and rapidly. He scarcely ever went into society; when (as was seldom the case) he ventured out for a walk, he went (muttering to himself) at a postman's pace, to get the greatest quantity of exercise, in the smallest space of time. He was not a bad-tempered man, but had become nervous, fidgety, and irritable. His tone of voice was feeble, his utterance hesitating, his manner hurried. What a laughable contrast between him and his visitor! The Attorney-General coming to Mr. Weasel's chamber, suggested the idea of a magnificent mastiff suddenly poking his head into the little kennel of a querulous pug-dog; and I suppose Mr. Aubrey might be likened to a greyhound accompanying the aforesaid mastiff! On seeing his visitors, Mr. Weasel instantly got up, with a blush of surprise, and a little hurry and embarrassment of manner. His clerk put out a couple of chairs, and down they sat. The Attorney-General came to the point in half a minute, and the matter was very quickly settled; and it was arranged that within a day or two's time, as soon as the forms necessary for admitting Mr. Aubrey to an Inn of Court should have been completed, he should commence his attendance at Mr. Weasel's, from ten o'clock till five, daily.

"It's a comical looking little animal, isn't it?" quoth the Attorney-General, with a laugh, as soon as they had got out of hearing.

"Certainly, I do n't feel particularly prepossessed!"

"Oh, phoo! He's the very man for you—the very man. There's no nonsense with Weasel; you may learn an infinite deal of law from him, and that is all you want. He's a very inoffensive fellow; and I've no doubt you'll soon like his chambers greatly, if you're in earnest in studying the law. You go or not, of course, as you choose; whatever you do is perfectly voluntary; pay him his hundred guineas, and then, if you like, you may get many thousand pounds' worth out of him in the twelvemonth. Now, I must bid you good morning—I've really not another moment to spare. God bless you, my dear Aubrey; and," he added, with great kindness, and a very pointed manner, "whenever you may think it worth your while to talk over your affairs with me, come without notice or ceremony—wherever I may be, I shall be delighted to see you."

Then they parted. Mr. Aubrey was not aware of a certain stroke of delicacy and generosity on the part of the Attorney-General; viz., that immediately on the Rule being discharged, he had sent for Mr. Runnington, and insisted on returning every sixpence of his fees, upwards of six hundred guineas, desiring that Mr. Aubrey should not be made acquainted with it, if by any means Messrs Runnington could conceal it from him!

A little fatigued and harassed by several important matters, which kept him engaged till a late hour in the afternoon, he reached Vivian street in a depressed and deponding mood. Just as he turned the corner, he beheld, at about twenty yards' distance, Mrs. Aubrey and Miss Aubrey slowly walking home on their return from the Park. Mrs. Aubrey held Charles by the hand, who was dancing and frisking wildly about, and Miss Aubrey's beautiful little Cato she was leading along by a slender chain. They were in half-mourning; there was such an air of elegant simplicity about them, their figures, their carriage, so easy and graceful! Aubrey, as he neared them, gazed at them with mingled feelings of pride and tenderness.

"Oh, my papa! my papa!" suddenly exclaimed Charles, who, in turning round, had caught sight of his father, and ran eagerly down to him: with what a thrill of love did he take in his arms the beautiful breathless boy, and how his heart yearned toward his wife and sister, as they also turned quickly round to meet him, after a long day's absence! How inexpressibly dear were they to him—how, that day, he enjoyed their quiet little dinner-table—the romp with his children afterward—and a long evening of eager and interesting conversation, after the little ones had gone to bed, Mrs. Aubrey and Kate busy the while with some slight matter of needlework! They had received several letters from Yorkshire, which they read to him. One was from poor Dr. Tatham, who, though he concealed a good deal that would have occasioned needless pain, yet gave them a melancholy notion of the altered state of things at the Hall.

Though it was rather late before they retired to rest on the evening of the ensuing Sunday, Mr. Aubrey was to be found seated in his study by half-past four on Monday morning, perusing, with profound attention, stimulated by the strong observation of the Attorney-General, the second volume of Blackstone's Commentaries—a work with which he had already a very tolerable familiarity. "Twas really a thing to be proud of, that Mr. Aubrey, with so many absorbing anxieties, such distracting apprehensions concerning the future, could command his attention in the way he did. To be sure, he felt that it was plainly life-and-death work with him; but he might have derived great encouragement from perceiving himself possessed of that faculty of concentrating the attention which the Attorney-General had spoken of as so essential an attribute of a lawyer. The way in which he parcelled out his time was this: From the time that he entered his study till breakfast-time, he resolved to read law—from ten o'clock till four or five, was to be spent at Mr. Weasel's chambers—and the evenings were to be devoted to the society of his children, his wife, and sister, and also to certain occasional literary efforts, from which he hoped to derive some little increase to his means. This was severe work; but it was probable the most fortunate and salutary thing in the world for Aubrey, that his energies should be thus occupied, and his mind kept from the corroding effects of constant reflection upon his misfortunes, and dismal apprehensions concerning the future. After he had spent a few days in Mr. Weasel's chambers, a good deal of prejudice against that gentleman began to wear off. Mr. Aubrey found him all that the Attorney-General had described him as being—a very acute and able lawyer, with a constant current of important, varied, and instructive business running through his chambers, and every disposition to render his utmost assistance to Mr. Aubrey, whom he quickly found out to be a man of very superior intellect, and most seriously bent upon acquiring a knowledge of the profession. Mr. Weasel was not bleated with the power of formally communicating elementary knowledge; Mr. Aubrey had, as it were, to extract from him what he wanted, with something like a painful effort. The advantages of his position were the innumerable practicable hints and suggestions as to the mode of dealing with miscellaneous business, which he derived from a watchful attention to whatever passed in chambers—to the mode in which Weasel hunted up and applied his law, and reduced the facts involved in litigation into legal shape and language, in the process of pleading. The penetrating eye of Mr. Aubrey, thus closely fixed on every thing that came under his notice, quickly began to discover and appreciate the good sense, the practical utility of most of the positive rules of law which he saw in operation; and at the end of a fortnight or three weeks, he began to feel interest in the study upon which he had so vigorously entered, and in which he felt himself making real progress. Mr. Weasel, during even that time, perceived the prodigious superiority of Mr. Aubrey over another pupil, who had nearly completed his second year in Mr. Weasel's chambers, after a twelvemonth spent in a conveyancer's; not, of course, in respect of legal knowledge, but of intellectual power and aptitude for business. He would return to Vivian street about six o'clock each day, a little fatigued with a very long day's work, (for he was never later than five o'clock in entering his study in the morning;) but quickly cheered and refreshed by the sight of the fond and lovely beings whom he there rejoined, and who had been counting the very minutes till he returned. Every day knit that little family together, if possible, in stronger bonds of love; for they clung to each other with a feeling of having been thrust out of the great gay world together, and sent, as it were, upon a pilgrimage afar, amidst scenes of increasing difficulty and danger. Every day that bore them further from their expulsion from Yatton, as it were, mellowed their recollections of past scenes, and poured upon their wounded feelings the soothing balm of pious resignation; and sometimes, also, faint and trembling beams of hope concerning the future would steal across the gloomy chambers of their hearts. Thank God, the view of the past presented to them no occasion for shame, for remorse, for self-condemnation! They trusted that in their day of wealth and distinction they had not been found wanting in the discharge of the duties imposed upon them. Therefore they had consolation from a view of the past. But the future—indeed—

"Shadows, clouds, and darkness rested on it."

Their hearts involuntarily fluttered and shrank within them, when they gazed upon the threatening gloom that hung over it. Their straitened circumstances—an honorable poverty—had been a burden, light indeed to bear. They were very happy in one another's company; their house, though small, was convenient, and even elegantly comfortable; they had health; Mr. Aubrey had constant exercise for an active and vigorous mind, in the acquisition of the learning of a noble profession, the practice of which might possibly hereafter raise all of them to even affluence and distinction—at all events, might secure them the substantial comforts of life. But Mr. Aubrey would have moments of heaviness and trepidation. When engaged in his little study, in the profound solitude and silence of the early morning, while he was straining his faculties to their utmost, on behalf of the sweet innocent beings—his wife—his children—his sister—sleeping above, he would sometimes lean back in his chair, with a very deep sigh, and sink into a reverie—oh, how sad and painful!—deepening occasionally into agony; but he would suddenly arouse himself, and resume his studies with a powerful effort at abstraction—with additional intensity of application. How could he be otherwise than momentarily paralyzed, when he surveyed his alarming and tremendous pecuniary liabilities! Bills of costs—Heaven only knows to what amount—due to Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap; to his own attorneys, Messrs. Runningtons; and to Mr. Parkinson: and then—sickening and fearful object!—the Mesne Profits—what was to become of them all? The man that, in the presence of such disturbing forces as these, could apply its energies so successfully as did that of Mr. Aubrey to the acquisition of knowledge, with any degree of calmness, must surely have been of no common order, and have undergone no slight discipline; but, alas! alas! what could all this have availed him, unless he had been vouchsafed assistance from on high? When the waters were come in unto his soul; when he was sinking in deep mire, where there was no standing; when he was come into deep waters, where the floods overflowed him—whither was he to look but to one quarter, and that above, with earnest, and faithful, and constant supplication to the Almighty?

The constant apprehension of very great evil—suspense—is a state almost as terrible and insupportable, especially to those of lively susceptibilities, as that produced by the infliction of the evil. Every morning when Aubrey left home, he dreaded to think of what might happen before his return; and when he quitted the Temple, he felt a sinking heart when he thought of what might have transpired in his absence. In fact, they all of them felt like those whom the ominous silence and repose of surrounding nature—a portentous calm and gloom overhead—fill with trembling apprehension of the coming storm. Their fears are quickened by the occasional falling of large spreading drops of rain through the sultry sky, not a breath of air stirring. Upward is oft turned the pale cheek and apprehensive eye toward the black accumulating clouds, from which may soon flame the destructive lightning—what, in such a case, is there to rely upon, but the mercy of Him around whose throne are clouds and darkness, and the whirlwind and tempest his ordering?

There were sitting one morning at their usual early and simple breakfast, and Mr. Aubrey was reading aloud, for his wife and sister's suggestions, a second article which he had commenced overnight, designed for one of the Reviews—having about a fortnight before sent off his first effort, about which, however, he had as yet heard nothing; and Kate was playfully patting his cheek, and telling him that, for all he might say to the contrary, a particular expression was not, in her opinion, elegant English.

"It is, you puss of a critic," insisted Aubrey, with a good-natured laugh; and then, turning to Mrs. Aubrey, "What do you say, Agnes?"

"Oh—why—I really like it very much as it is."

"I sha'n't alter it," said Aubrey, laughing.

"Then I'll alter it when you're gone," quoth Kate, with affected pertness, and, bringing her beautiful laughing face so near his own, with a kind of air of defiance, that he kissed her forehead, and said it should be as she chose.

Just then a knock at the door announced a visiter, who proved to be Mr. Runnington. Why it was, they hardly knew; but they all slightly changed color. He had called so early, he said, to ensure seeing Mr. Aubrey before he went to the Temple; and, though he had been shown into the study, Mr. Aubrey insisted on his joining the breakfast table.

"We've very plain fare for you, however," said he, as Mr. Runnington yielded to his wishes.

Mr. Aubrey perceived with some uneasiness, that his kind and thoughtful countenance wore rather an anxious expression. And indeed so it was. When he looked at those who sat before him—interesting, elegant, yet with a plainly forced cheerfulness—reflected on the sufferings which they had passed through, and that which was in store for them—and for the first bitter instalment of which he had come to prepare Mr. Aubrey—could he but feel very deep sympathy for them? As soon as he had retired with Mr. Aubrey to the study, in a low tone he informed Mr. Aubrey of his errand, which was to apprise him that, the evening before, Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap's MILL had come in.

"Well, show it me, if you please," said Mr. Aubrey, calmly, extending his hand.

"My dear sir, why do you suppose I have it with me?" inquired Mr. Runnington, with a concerned air. "You are not accustomed to such matters—God forbid you should! It is too bulky for me to have brought with me, and lies at our office."

"What is the amount of it, then?" inquired Mr. Aubrey, dreading to hear the answer; while Mr. Runnington took out of his pocket book a slip of paper which he handed to Mr. Aubrey, and on which the latter read: "£.3946, 14s. 6d." He gazed at it for some moments in silence, and became very pale. Mr. Runnington could hardly bear to look at him, and think of the two lovely women in the adjoining room, who were so fearfully interested in the intelligence which had so dismayed Mr. Aubrey.

"This is a very—large—amount," said he, at length, with forced calmness.

"Then there is yours—and Mr. Parkinson's."

"Oh, Mr. Aubrey—sufficient for the day is the evil thereof."

"Will you oblige me by saying, what is the probable amount of your bill?" inquired Mr. Aubrey, with a calmness which seemed lent to him by despair.

"Oh! I assure you we have thought nothing at all about it, nor shall we for some time to come, Mr. Aubrey. We have not the slightest intention of troubling ourselves, or you, with the matter till you may be in a position to attend to it without serious inconvenience."

"But do favor me with something like a notion," pressed the unhappy Aubrey.

"Why—perhaps I am hardly doing right in mentioning it; but whenever our bill is sent in, it will be less by some six hundred and fifty pounds, by the noble generosity of the Attorney-General, who has returned all his fees!"

"Returned all his fees!" echoed Mr. Aubrey, starting, while the color rushed into his cheek, and the expression of his countenance was of pride struggling with astonishment, and gratitude, and admiration. He exquisitely appreciated the conduct of his distinguished friend; and at the same time felt a totally new and very painful sense of pecuniary obligation.

"I feel, Mr. Aubrey, that I have broken my promise to the Attorney-General, who extracted from me a solemn pledge, to endeavor so to manage the matter as that you should never know it. What is it, after all—noble as it is—to the Attorney-General, with his £12,000 or £15,000 a-year?"

"Oh—do not talk so, Mr. Runnington; I am overpowered, oppressed. Never in all my life have I experienced feelings like those by which I am now agitated!" He rose, and stood opposite the window for a few minutes—neither of them speaking. Then he returned to his seat.

"How much does that leave me your debtor?"

"Why—really it is hard to say, unprepared—I should imagine that our account is reduced to some £1500 or £1600—about which?"

"Then there is Mr. Parkinson's," said Aubrey, in a low tone, but with a desperate air; presently adding—"Here are some £6000 or £7000 to start with; and then we come to the mesne profits—gracious, gracious God!" he suddenly added, with a visible shudder. He folded his arms convulsively, and gazed, for a second or two, at Mr. Runnington, with an eye whose expression was overpowering. In his face Mr. Runnington beheld no longer the mild and melancholy expression to which he had been accustomed, but a sternness and power were apparent in his features, which he had not imagined them capable of exhibiting. They told of a strong soul thoroughly roused, and excited, and in agony. At that moment a knocking was heard at the door, as of very little fingers. "Come in!" exclaimed Mr. Aubrey, with unusual quickness and sternness. The door was gently opened, and Charles' little face peeped into the room timidly, quite startled by the tone in which he had been addressed. "Come in, my child!" said Mr. Aubrey, rather tremulously, when he observed the apprehensiveness overspreading the little features of his son. Charles immediately advanced, with a serious submissive air, saying—"This letter is just come—Mamma sent me with it."

"Give it me, Charles," said Mr. Aubrey, extending his hand for it, while with the other he gently placed the child upon his lap—kissed him. "I'm not angry with you, Charles," said he tenderly.

"I've not been naughty, you know, dear papa?" said he with innocent surprise.

"No, no, my little love." The FATHER could say no more; but putting aside the child's flowing curly locks from his temples, as it were mechanically, he gazed on his little fact for a moment, and then folded him in his arms with unspeakable tenderness. Mr. Runnington rose, and stood for some moments gazing through the window, unwilling that his own emotion should be observed. When Mr. Aubrey opened the letter, it proved to be from the publisher of the Review to which he had sent his article, enclosing a cheque for forty guineas, expressing an earnest desire that he would continue his contributions, and assuring him that the editor considered the article "in every way admirable." As soon as he had glanced over the letter—"You little messenger of hope and mercy!" he thought, again kissing his son, who sat passively gazing at the agitated countenance of his FATHER—"I cannot, I will not despair! You have brought me, as it were, a ray of light from heaven, piercing the fearful gloom of my situation: 'tis a token, surely, that I am not forgotten: I feel as though an angel, momentarily brightening the night of sorrow, had come and whispered in my ear—'COURAGE!'" His features began to resume their natural serenity of expression. "Take it in to your mamma," said he, kissing little Charles, and dispatching him with the letter.

Shortly afterward, as soon as he had recovered the command of his manner sufficiently to avoid occasioning uneasiness to Mrs. and Miss Aubrey, he proposed to Mr. Runnington that they should walk toward the Temple; and bidding adieu to those whom he left behind him, without giving them an opportunity to ask him as to the nature of Mr. Runnington's errand, but leaving them in high spirits at the letter which he had sent in to them, he quitted the house arm-in-arm with Mr. Runnington. I am persuaded that if that gentleman had had no one to consult, he would have relieved Mr. Aubrey altogether from liability to him; but he had four partners; their own pecuniary outlay had been considerable; and, therefore, the thing was really out of the question. As they walked along, in the course of much anxious conversation, Mr. Runnington told Mr. Aubrey, that he considered Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap's bill to be extortionate; and that it might, on taxation—a process which he explained to Mr. Aubrey—be reduced, probably, by at least one-half. But he also reminded Mr. Aubrey of the power which they held in their hands, in respect of the mesne profits; and intimated his opinion, that in all probability they had made out their bill with an eye to such considerations, namely, that it should be discharged without rigorous scrutiny into its constituent items, before they would listen to any terms whatever for the payment of the mesne profits; and that Mr. Aubrey's position, with respect to Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap, was one which required the greatest possible deliberation and circumspection on his part, especially in the matter of the bill just delivered in by them.

"I see the whole," said Mr. Aubrey, "comes to this: they will relieve me from liability to Mr. Titmouse, for as much of what may be due to him, as they can divert into their own pockets!"

"That certainly seems very much like it," replied Mr. Runnington, shrugging his shoulders; "but you will leave all such considerations and matters to us; and rely on our honor and our discretion. At what may appear to us the exact moment for doing so with effect, depend upon our most cautious interference. We know, Mr. Aubrey, the kind of people we have to deal with. Mr. Titmouse is very likely to be merely a puppet in their hands—at least in those of Mr. Gammon, who is a very long-headed man, and with whom, I have no doubt, our negotiations will have to be carried on."

"That is just what the Attorney-General said—and he invited me, moreover, to converse with him whenever I might consider that his advice would be useful."

"Could you have a better adviser? He has a most penetrating sagacity, long exercised—in short, his qualifications are consummate; and I should not hesitate about consulting him whenever we feel at a loss."

"Why should I disguise any thing from you, Mr. Runnington?" said Mr. Aubrey—"you ought to know the exact state of my affairs. I have a little family plate, which I could not bear to part with; my books; and the remnants of the furniture at Yatton, which I have saved in order to furnish our present residence. Besides this, the outside of all that I am possessed of—and I have no expectations, nor has my wife nor my poor sister, from any quarter—is a sum of about £3000 in the funds, and and £423 at my banker's. These are my circumstances; they appal me merely in stating them:—Why, I owe double the sum I have named, for lawyers' bills only. I have not enough, without parting with my books and plate, to discharge even Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap's bill!"

"It would be cruel and absurd in me not to express at once, Mr. Aubrey, my conviction that your situation is fearfully critical; and that your sole hope is in the treatment which may be expected from Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap, and their client, Mr. Titmouse. Serious as are, at present, your other liabilities—to that one, they are but as a bucket of water to the Thames. As we are talking, Mr. Aubrey, in this candid and unrestrained manner, I will tell you my chief source of apprehension on your account, with reference to Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap; namely, that they may possibly speculate on your being able, if placed in real peril, to call around you, in your extremity, a host of wealthy and powerful friends—as security, or otherwise!"

"They will find themselves, then, utterly mistaken. If they and their client are really capable of such shocking brutality—such wanton oppression—let them do their worst: I am resigned. Providence will find out a shelter for my wife and children, and my dear, devoted, high-spirited sister; and as for myself, rather than satiate the rapacity of such wretches, by plundering good-natured and generous friends, I will end my days in a prison."

Mr. Aubrey was evidently not a little excited while he said this; but there was that in his tone of voice, and in his eye, which told Mr. Runnington that he meant what he said; and that, as soon as it should have come to the point of oppression and injustice, no man could resist more powerfully, or endure with a more dignified and inflexible resolution. But Mr. Runnington would fain hope that it would not come to such an issue. He consoled Mr. Aubrey with assurances, that as for their own demand, it might stand over for several years; and that so, he was sure, would it be with the far lesser demand of Mr. Parkinson; and that if, by a great effort, sufficient could be raised to discharge promptly the bill of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap, some much more favorable arrangement respecting the amount and mode of payment of the mesne profits might be effected, leaving Mr. Aubrey, in the mean time, leisure to apply himself vigorously to his studies for the bar, for which Mr. Runnington assured him that he considered him peculiarly qualified; and pledged himself to back him with all the influence he had, or could command.

"Gracious Heaven, Mr. Runnington!" said Aubrey, with a little excitement, "is it not very nearly intolerable that I should pass the prime of my days in thralldom to such people as these? and be encircled by the chains of such a man as this Titmouse is represented as being? I will not call myself his foe, nor his victim; but I am the one through whose sudden destitution he has obtained a splendid fortune. I did not knowingly deprive him of it—he must be bereft of all the ordinary feelings of humanity, to place me, whom he has already stripped of all, upon the rack—the rack of extortion! Oh! put me in his place, and him in mine—do you think I would not have been satisfied with what I had gained? Would I have alarmed and tortured him by calling for an account of what he had spent, with a firm, a reasonable persuasion that it was his own? Oh, no! I could not only have forgiven him all, but endeavored to secure him from future want." He sighed. "Oh, that I were at this moment a free man! pauper—sed in meo ere; that I had but five hundred pounds to keep me and mine for a year or two—with a mind at ease and fit for study! but here we are, at the Temple. When shall we meet again—or shall I hear from you?"

"Very shortly," replied Mr. Runnington, who for the last few minutes had been listening to Mr. Aubrey in respectful and sympathizing silence; and, shaking him warmly by the hand, with much cordiality and fervency of manner, he pledged himself to do all in his power to promote his interests.

When Mr. Aubrey arrived at Mr. Weasel's chambers, he looked dejected and harrassed; but with a noble effort of self-command, at once addressed himself, calmly and vigorously, to the business of the day. From time to time he peremptorily excluded the harassing thoughts and recollections arising out of his morning's interview with Mr. Runnington; and succeeded in concentrating his attention upon a case of more than usual intricacy and multifariousness of details, which Mr. Weasel, having glanced over, had laid aside for a more leisurely perusal. He handed it, however, to Mr. Aubrey, soon after his arrival, with something approaching to a secret satisfaction, in the expectation of its "proving too much for him;" but he was mistaken. Mr. Aubrey left a little earlier than usual; but not before he had sent in the voluminous "case" to Mr. Weasel's room by the clerk, together with a half-sheet of draft paper, containing a brief summary of the results at which he had arrived; and which not a little surprised Mr. Weasel. The case did not happen to involve much technical knowledge; but in respect of the imperfect manner in which it was drawn up, and the confusion worse confounded of the transactions themselves, out of which the question arose, required patient, persevering attention, strength of memory, and great clear-headedness. In short, Weasel owned to himself that poor Aubrey had taken a very masterly view of the case; and how would his estimate of his pupil's ability have been enhanced, by a knowledge of the situation in which he was placed—one so calculated to distract his attention, and prevent that hearty and complete devotion to legal studies, without which Mr. Weasel well knew how vain was the attempt to master them!

"Read Aubrey's opinion on that troublesome case—I mean the Cornish Bank?" inquired Weasel, taking a pinch of snuff, of Mr. Thoroughpace, another pupil who had just taken his seat beside Mr. Weasel, to see him "settle," [i. e., score out, interline, and alter,] a pleading drawn by the aforesaid Thoroughpace. That gentleman replied in the negative. "He's got a headpiece of his own, I can tell you. Egad, somehow or another, he always contrives to hit the nail on the head."

"I'd a sort of notion, the very first day he came, that he was a superior man," replied Thoroughpace. "He makes a very few notes—seems to trust entirely to his head."

"Ah! a man may carry that too far," interrupted Mr. Weasel, thrusting a pinch of snuff up his nose.

"Then I wish I could," replied Thoroughpace. "Is n't there such a thing as making the hand engross the business of the head?" Mr. Weasel—recollecting that in his library stood twelve thick folio volumes of manuscript "precedents," which he had been fool enough to copy out with his own hand during his pupillage, and the first year or two of his setting up in business—hemmed, and again applied to his snuff-box. "How do you get on with him in the pupil's room?" he inquired.

"Why, I did n't like him at first. Very reserved, and has a little hauteur. Even now, though very courteous, he says little, seems entirely absorbed by his studies, and yet to have something or other on his mind."

"Ah! I dare say, law's no trifle, I warrant him. I dare say it teases him."

"By Jove! but I do n't think it does. I never saw a man to whom it seemed to yield so easily. He's a particularly gentlemanlike person; and there's something very attractive in his countenance. He seems highly connected. I've seen several notes come here for him with coronets on the seals, and several well-known."

"You've heard of the great cause of Doe d. Titmouse, v. Jotter, a Yorkshire ejectment case, tried only last Spring assizes? Well, he's the defendant, and has, I hear, lost everything."

"You astonish me! By Jove, but he had need work!"

"Shall we set to work, Mr. Thoroughpace?" said Weasel suddenly, looking at his watch lying on his desk. "I've promised to let them have this plea by six o'clock—or they'll be signing judgement;" and plunging his pen into the inkstand, to work he went, more suo, as if such a man as his pupil, Mr. Aubrey, had never existed. He was not a particularly hard-hearted man; but I believe that if a capias ad satisfaciendum (i. e. process to take the body into custody) against Charles Aubrey, Esquire, had come into Mr. Weasel's chambers to settle, as requiring special accuracy, after humming and hawing a bit, and taking an extra pinch of snuff, he would have settled it, marked his seven-and-sixpence in the corner, and sent it out with the others as a matter of course.

On Mr. Aubrey's return home to dinner, he found that his sister had received another long letter from Dr. Tatham, to which was appended a postscript mentioning Mr. Gammon in such terms as suggested to Mr. Aubrey a little scheme which he resolved to carry into effect on the morrow—namely, to call himself at the office of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap, and seek an interview with Mr. Gammon, who, Dr. Tatham stated, had quitted Yatton for town only the day before the doctor had written to Miss Aubrey. After a very restless and unhappy night, during which he was tormented with all kinds of dismal dreams, Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap figuring in each as the stern and mysterious arbiters of his earthly destiny, he resolved to put an end to his present insupportable suspense—to learn at once the extent of what he had either to hope or to fear—by calling that very afternoon at Saffron Hill. For that purpose, he quitted Mr. Weasel's at the early hour of three o'clock; and straightway bent his steps through Fetter Lane to Hatton Garden, and thence inquiring his way to Saffron Hill. He was not long in finding the house of which he was in quest, his eye being soon attracted by the great, gleaming brass plate with "QUIRK, GAMMON and SNAP," as prominent and threatening as ever those names had appeared to Titmouse in the day of his agony and suspense. He had stood gazing at them with idiot longing and vulgar apprehension, as the reader has seen. How very different a person now looked at them with feelings of intense interest and overmastering anxiety, as at the names of those who had him completely in their power—his fortunes, his liberty, his livelihood, and that of the dear beings whose interests, whose all on earth, whose personal safety were bound up in his. Mr. Aubrey, with a jaded air, dressed in a buttoned black surcoat, and with an umbrella under his arm, entered the hall, where were sitting and standing two or three strange-looking people—one suffering evidently great agitation; in fact, relatives of prisoners, whose trials for capital offences were coming on the next day at Newgate—and made his way into a room, on the door of which he read "Clerk's Room."

"Now, sir, your business?" said a showily dressed Jewish-looking youth, lolling at a desk from which he did not move, and speaking in a tone of very disagreeable assurance.

"Is Mr. Gammon within?" inquired Mr. Aubrey, taking off his hat; and there was a certain something in his voice, countenance and bearing that induced the personage he adressed to slip off his stool, and exhibit as courteous an air as he could possibly assume.

"Mr. Gammon is in his room, sir, and alone. I believe he is rather busy—but I've no doubt you can see him."

The fact was, that at that moment Mr. Gammon was engaged drawing up "Instructions to prepare Declaration" in an action for mesne profits, against Mr. Aubrey! He had only the day before returned from Yatton, where circumstances had occurred which had quickened their intended proceeding against Mr. Aubrey—as the first quarter to which, at Mr. Titmouse's suggestion, they were to look for a considerable supply of ready money. That morning, in the very room into which Mr. Aubrey was to be presently shown, had taken place a long discussion between Mr. Quirk and Mr. Gammon, on the subject which had now brought to their office Mr. Aubrey. Mr. Quirk was for making short work of it—for "going straight ahead"—and getting the whole £60,000, or security for the greater portion, and £20,000 down! Gammon, however, was of opinion that that was mere madness; that by attempting to proceed to extremities against so unfortunate a sufferer as Mr. Aubrey, they could not fail of drawing down on themselves and their client universal execration; and, moreover, of driving Mr. Aubrey desperate, and forcing him either to quit the country, or accept the protection of the insolvent laws. He had, at length, satisfied Mr. Quirk that their only chance was in gentleness and moderation; and the old gentleman had, as usual, agreed to adopt the plan of operations suggested by Gammon. The latter personage had quite as keen a desire and firm determination as the former, to wring out of their wretched victim the very last farthing that there was the slightest probability of obtaining; for Titmouse had pointed to that quarter for the discharge of his ten thousand pound bond to the firm, and also their bill of costs to him, (which contained some three hundred items, slightly varied in language, that were also charged in their bill to Mr. Aubrey;) then twenty—or at least fifteen thousand pounds, were to be handed over to himself, Titmouse; and all the rest that could be got, Mr. Gammon might appropriate to his own use. His inquiries into Mr. Aubrey's circumstances, had completely convinced him that it would be impossible to extract any considerable sum from that unfortunate gentleman; and that if they could contrive to get their bill paid, perhaps substantial security for four or five thousand of the mesne profits, and his own personal security for any portion of the remainder, hereafter—they had better rest satisfied—and look for liquidation of their own heavy claim to a mortgage upon the Yatton estates. Mr. Gammon had also proposed to himself certain other objects, in dealing with Mr. Aubrey, than the mere extraction of money from him; and, in short, prompted by considerations, such as those above intimated, he had come to the determination, an hour or so before Mr. Aubrey's most unexpected visit, to be at once prepared with the necessary means for setting in motion legal proceedings for the recovery of the arrear of mesne profits.

"Have I the honor to address Mr. Gammon?" commenced Mr. Aubrey, courteously, on being shown into the room—not announced by name, where Gammon sat busily engaged writing out the "Instructions" for framing the rack on which it was designed to extend the as yet unconscious Aubrey.

"Sir, my name is Gammon," he replied, coloring a little—rising from his chair, with an expression of very great surprise—"I believe I have the honor of seeing Mr. Aubrey! I beg you will allow me to offer you a chair," he continued, placing one as far as he could from the table, and then, getting another, he sat down between Mr. Aubrey and the table; expecting to hear his visitor at once open the subject of their bill, which they had so recently sent in.

"Will you suffer me, Mr. Aubrey," commenced Gammon, with a bland and subdued air, not fulsome, but extremely deferential, "before entering on any business which may have brought you here, to express deep and sincere sympathy with your sufferings, and my personal regret at the share we have had in the proceedings which have ended so adversely for your interests? But our duty as professional men, Mr. Aubrey, is often as plain as painful!"

"I feel obliged for your kind expressions of sympathy—but I cannot for a moment conceive any apology necessary. Neither I nor my advisers have had cause to complain of harsh or unprofessional treatment on your part. Your proceedings certainly came upon me—upon all of us—like a thunderstroke," said Mr. Aubrey, with a subdued sigh. "I trust that you have given me credit, Mr. Gammon, for offering no vexatious or unconscientious obstacles."

"Oh, Mr. Aubrey, on the contrary, I am at a loss for words to express my sense of your straight-forward and high-minded conduct; and have often expressed my sentiments on that subject to Messrs. Runningsons," Mr. Aubrey bowed—"and again anxiously beg that you will give me credit for feeling the profoundest sympathy"—he paused, as if from emotion; and such might well have been excited, by the appearance of Mr. Aubrey—calm, and melancholy—his face full of anxiety, and his figure, naturally slender, evidently somewhat emaciated. ["I wonder," thought Gammon, "whether he has any insurances on his life. He certainly has rather a consumptive look: how could one ascertain whether he has insured? And where?"] "I trust, most sincerely, Mr. Aubrey, that the mental sufferings you must have undergone have not affected your health?" inquired Gammon, with an air of infinite concern.

"A little, but thank God, not materially; I never was very robust," he replied, with a faint, sad smile.

"[How like his sister!]" thought Gammon, watching his companion's countenance with real interest.

"I am not quite sure, Mr. Gammon," continued Aubrey, "that I am observing etiquette in thus coming to you, on a matter which you may consider ought to have been left to my attorneys, who know nothing of my present visit—but—"

"An honorable mind like yours, Mr. Aubrey, may surely act according to its own impulses, with safety! As for etiquette, I know of no professional rule which I break, in entering into a discussion with you of any topic connected with the action which has recently been determined," said Gammon, cautiously, and particularly on his guard, as soon as his penetrating eye had detected the acuteness which was mingled with the sincerity and simplicity of character beaming in the countenance of Mr. Aubrey.

"I dare say you can guess the occasion of my visit, Mr. Gammon?"

"[There goes our bill—whew! What now?]" thought Gammon.

Mr. Gammon bowed, with an anxious, expectant air.

"I allude to the question yet remaining between your client, Mr. Titmouse, and me—the mesne profits!"

"I feared—I expected as much! It gave me infinite anxiety, as soon as I found you were approaching the subject!"

"To me it is really a matter of life and death, Mr. Gammon. It is one pressing me on almost to the very verge of madness!"

"My dear Mr. Aubrey," said Gammon, in a tone and with a look which touched the heart of his agitated companion, "do n't magnify the mischief. Do n't—I beg—imagine your position one so hopeless! What is there to stand in the way of an amicable adjustment of these claims? If I had my way, Mr. Aubrey—and if I thought I should not be acting the part of the unjust steward in Scripture—I would write sixty thousand farthings for sixty thousand pounds!"

"You have named the sum for which I believe I am legally liable to Mr. Titmouse," said Mr. Aubrey, with forced composure; "It is a sum as completely out of my power to pay, or secure—or even a quarter of it—as to give him one of the stars."

"I am aware, Mr. Aubrey, that you must have had many calls upon you, which must have temporarily crippled your resources."

"Temporarily!" echoed Mr. Aubrey, with a sickening smile.

"I devoutly trust that it is only temporary! For your own and family's sake," he added quickly, observing the watchfulness with which his every look and word was regarded by his companion. "Any proposal, Mr. Aubrey," he continued, with the same apparent kindness of manner, but with serious deliberation, "which you may think proper to make, I am ready—eager—to receive and consider in a liberal spirit. I repeat—if you had me only to deal with—you would leave this room with a lightened heart; but, to be plain and candid, our client, Mr. Titmouse, is a very difficult person to deal with. I pledge my word of honor to you—[Oh Gammon! Gammon! Gammon!]<sup>1</sup>—that I have repeatedly urged upon Mr. Titmouse to release you from all the rents received by you previously to your receiving legal notice of the late proceedings." I suppose Gammon felt this declaration was not received by Mr. Aubrey as implicitly as the former desired and expected; for with a slight stiffness, he added, "I assure you, sir, that it is a fact. I have always been of opinion that the law is harsh, and even faulty in principle, which, in such a case as yours where the possessor of an estate, to which he believed himself born, is ousted by a title of which he had no previous knowledge, nor means of knowledge"—Gammon uttered this very pointedly, and with his eyes fixed searchingly upon that of Mr. Aubrey—"requires the ousted party to make good the rents he had so innocently appropriated to his own use. That is my opinion, though it may be wrong. I am bound to say, however, that as the law now stands—if Mr. Titmouse should, contrary to my advice—determine to stand upon his strict rights"—Gammon paused, shook his head, shrugged his shoulders, and looked with melancholy significance at Mr. Aubrey.

"I am entirely at his mercy! I understand. I do trust, however, that in the name of our common humanity, he will have some consideration for the helpless—the miserable situation in which I am so unexpectedly placed," said Aubrey, with mournful energy. "Never having imagined it necessary to save money—"

"Oh no—not with such an income as yours was, to resort, I fear, to any of the ordinary modes—insurance, and so forth," interposed Gammon, with an easy air.

"No—not nothing of the sort"—[Ah! the device you have not!]" thought Gammon—"and I confess it was improvident of me. My situation is so deplorable and desperate, that disguise would be absurd, even could I stoop to it; and I declare, in the presence of Heaven, Mr. Gammon, that without parting with the little remnant of plate I have preserved, and my books, I am unable to make up even the amount of your bill sent in the day before yesterday"—Gammon gazed at Aubrey, earnestly, but in silence—"and if my miserable remnant of means be so appropriated, we are literally beggars"—he paused, and his voice faltered.

"Indeed—indeed, you distress me beyond measure, Mr. Aubrey," said Gammon, in a low tone.

"If you can but secure me a merciful interval, to prepare myself for the profession which I have entered—the Bar—whatever earnings I might obtain, after saving a bare maintenance for myself and family, shall be devoted faithfully to liquidate the heavy claims upon me! For myself, Mr. Gammon, I do not care about living upon bread and water for the next ten years; but there are others"—his voice trembled. "Sir, by every consideration which a gentleman may be influenced by, I conjure you to interfere between me and utter, immediate ruin!" This was the real, thrilling language of the heart; but it failed to produce the least impression upon Gammon, exciting only intense chagrin and disappointment. "Oh that it were but in my power," said he, with great energy, "to send you out of this room a free man! If I alone were to be consulted, I would instantly absolve you from all demands—or at least give you your own time, and take no other security than your honor."

"Oh! what a happy—happy man! what a happy family should we be if only"—he could not finish the sentence, for he was greatly moved.

"[Here's a kettle of fish,]" thought Gammon to himself, and bending down his head, he covered his eyes with his hands;—"worse far worse than I had suspected. I would take five pounds for all my residuary interest in the sixty thousand pounds! I've not the least doubt that he's speaking the truth. But the bill part of the business is highly unsatisfactory! I should like old Quirk to be here just now! Surely he must be able to get security! Such friends and connections as his. If one could only get them to join him in security for ten thousand pounds—stay—that won't exactly do, either; I must have my thumb upon him,"]

"I am so profoundly affected by the situation in which you are placed, Mr. Aubrey," said Gammon, at length appearing to have subdued his emotion, and feeling it necessary to say something, "that I think I may take upon myself to say the instructions which we have received shall not be acted upon, come what may. Those must be really monsters, not men, who could press upon one in your position; and that such should be attempted by one who has succeeded to your former advantages, is inconceivably shocking. Mr. Aubrey, you shall not be crushed—indeed you shall not, so long as I am a member—perhaps not the least influential one—in this firm, and have any influence with your formidable creditor, Mr. Titmouse. I cannot do justice to my desire to shelter you and yours, Mr. Aubrey, from the storm you dread so justly." There was a warmth, an energy in Gammon's manner, while saying all this, which cheered the drooping heart of poor Mr. Aubrey. "What I am about to say, Mr. Aubrey, is in complete confidence," continued Gammon, in a low tone. Mr. Aubrey bowed, with a little anxious excitement in his manner. "May I rely on your honor and secrecy?"

"Most implicitly Sir. What you desire me to keep within my own breast, no one on earth shall know from me."

"There are serious difficulties in the way of serving you. Mr. Titmouse is a weak and inexperienced young man, naturally excited to a great pitch by his present elevation, and already embarrassed for want of ready money. You may imagine, sir, that his liabilities to us are of considerable magnitude. You would hardly credit, Mr. Aubrey, the amount of mere money out of pocket for which he stands indebted to us; our outlay during the last two years, having considerably crippled our pecuniary resources, in an extensive practice like ours, and driven us to incur liabilities, which are beginning to occasion my partners and myself considerable anxiety. Of course, Mr. Aubrey, we must look to Mr. Titmouse to be speedily reimbursed; he insists upon our immediately calling upon you; and I have reason to suspect that he has at his elbow one or two very heartless advisers, who have suggested this to him; for he follows it most pertinaciously. That he cannot meet the liabilities I have alluded to, out of his annual income, without swallowing it up entirely for eighteen months or two years, is certain. I regret to say that Mr. Quirk and Mr. Snap encourage his disposition to press you;—do not be alarmed, my dear sir!" he continued, observing the deadly paleness of Mr. Aubrey, whose eye was riveted upon that of Gammon, "for I declare that I will stand between you and them, and it is enough for me to say that I have the power of doing so. I am the only person living who happens to possess the means of influencing Mr. Titmouse; and I am determined to avail myself of them. Now, bearing in mind that I have no legal authority from him, and am, at the same time, only one of a firm, and assuring you that I am entailing a serious responsibility upon myself in what I am doing, let me throw out for your consideration my general notion of what I think ought to be done—merely my off-hand notion."

"I perfectly understand; I listen with inexpressible anxiety," said Mr. Aubrey.

"Had I been consulted, we should have proposed to you, with reference to our bill (which I candidly acknowledge contains a much more liberal entry than would be allowed on taxation, and which is none of my doing.)—Gammon knew the credit for candor which this acknowledgement of a fact of which Messrs. Runningtons would quickly apprise him on looking at the bill, was likely to obtain for him with Mr. Aubrey—"I say, I should have proposed to you, in the first instance, the payment of our bill by instalments, during the next three or four years, provided you could have obtained partial security. But I am only one of three, and I know the determination of Mr. Quirk and Mr. Snap, not to listen to any proposal with reference to the mere profits, which is not based upon—in short, they say, the bill must be paid without being looked into—I mean," he added quickly, "without its being subjected to the harassing and protracted scrutiny which a distrustful, an ungrateful client, has it too frequently in his power to inflict. Oh, let me disguise nothing from you, my dear sir, in a conversation of this kind between two gentlemen," continued Gammon with an admirable air of frankness, for he perceived that Mr. Aubrey looked slightly staggered. "I am ashamed to acknowledge that that bill does contain exorbitant entries—entries which have led to very frequent and fierce disputes between me and my partners. But what is to be done? Mr. Quirk is the monied man of the firm; and if you were to glance at the articles of our partnership"—Gammon shrugged his shoulders and sighed,—"you would see the tyrannical extent of power over his partners which, in virtue of that circumstance, he has secured! You observe how candid I am—perhaps foolishly so."

"I've not quite mastered him—I can tell it by his eye,"—thought Gammon—"is this a game of chess between us? I wonder whether, after all, Messrs. Runningtons are aware of his being here—knowing his ability—and have put him thoroughly on his guard? He is checking strong feelings incessantly, and evidently weighing every word I utter. Misery has sharpened faculties naturally acute."]

"Pray do not say so, Mr. Gammon; I fully appreciate your motives. I am devoured with anxiety for an intimation of the nature of the terms which you were about, so kindly to specify."

"Specify is perhaps rather too strong a term; but to proceed. Supposing, Mr. Aubrey, the preliminary matter which I have alluded to, satisfactorily arranged, I am disposed to say that if you could find security for the payment of the sum of ten thousand pounds, within a year, or a year and a-half,—[Mr. Aubrey's teeth almost chattered at the mention of it.]—"I—I—that is, my impression is—but it is only mine"—added Gammon, earnestly—"that the rest should be left to your own honor, giving at the same time a personal undertaking to pay at a future—a very distant day—in the manner most convenient to yourself—the sum of ten thousand pounds more—making in all only one-third of the sum due from you; and receiving an absolute release from Mr. Titmouse in respect of the remaining two-thirds, namely, forty thousand pounds."

Mr. Aubrey listened to all this with his feelings and faculties strung to the utmost pitch of intensity; and when Gammon had ceased, experienced a transient sense, as of the fearful mountain that had pressed so long on his heart, moving.

"Have I made myself intelligible, Mr. Aubrey?" inquired Gammon, with a kind but serious air.

"Perfectly—but I feel so oppressed and overwhelmed with the magnitude of the topics we are discussing, that I scarcely at present appreciate the position in which you would place me. I must throw myself, Mr. Gammon, entirely on your indulgence!"

Gammon looked a little disappointed.

"I can imagine your feelings, sir." He took a sheet of paper and a pencil; and while he made a few memoranda of the arrangement which he had been mentioning—"You see,—the great result of what I have been hastily sketching off is—to give you ample time to pay the sums which I have named, and to relieve you, at once, absolutely from no less a sum than FORTY THOUSAND POUNDS," said he, with emphasis and deliberation, "for which—and with interest—you would otherwise remain liable to the day of your death—there could be no escape—except, perhaps, into banishment, which with your feelings would be worse than death—for it would be a dishonorable exile—to avoid just liabilities—and those who bear your name."

"Pay sir, be silent!" exclaimed Mr. Aubrey, in a tone that electrified Gammon—starting from his chair. His face was whitened; his eye glanced lightning at his companion. Dagon-like, Gammon had put forth his hand, and touched the ark of Aubrey's honor. Gammon lost his color, and for the first time quailed before the majesty of man; 't was also the majesty of suffering; he had been torturing a noble nature. Neither of them spoke for some time—Mr. Aubrey continuing highly excited—Gammon gazing at him with unfeigned amazement. The paper which he held in his hand trembled; he was obliged to lay it down on his lap, lest Mr. Aubrey should perceive his agitation.

"I am guilty of great weakness, sir," said at length Mr. Aubrey—his excitement only a little abated. He stood erect, and spoke with stern precision; "but you, perhaps unconsciously, provoked the display of it. Sir, I am ruined; I am a beggar; we are all ruined; we are all beggars; it is the ordering of God, and I bow to it. Do you, sir, presume to think that at last my honor is in danger? and consider it necessary, as if you were warning one whom you saw about to become a criminal, to expatiate on the nature of the meditated act by which I am to disgrace myself and my family?" Here they seemed suddenly standing around him; his lip quivered, his eyes filled, and he trembled with excessive emotion.

"This is a sally equally unexpected, Mr. Aubrey, and permit me to add unwarrantable," said Gammon calmly, having recovered his self-possession. "You have entirely misunderstood me; or I have ill explained myself. Your evident excitement and distress touch my very soul, Mr. Aubrey." Gammon's voice trembled. "Suffer me to tell you that I feel an inexpressible respect and admiration for you; and am miserable at the thought of one word of mine having occasioned you an instant's uneasiness." When a generous nature is thus treated, it is apt to feel an excessive contrition for any fault or extravagance which it may have committed—an excessive appreciation of the pain it may have inflicted on another. Thus it was, that by the time Gammon had done speaking, Mr. Aubrey felt ashamed and mortified at himself, and conceived an admiration of the dignified forbearance of Gammon, which quickly heightened into respect for his general character, and fervent gratitude for the disposition which he had evinced, from first to last, so disinterestedly to serve a ruined man. He seemed now to view all that Gammon had proposed in quite a new light—through quite another medium; and his excitable feelings were in some danger of disturbing his judgement.

"As I am a man of business, Mr. Aubrey," said Gammon, with a very captivating smile—how frank and forgiving seemed his temper to Aubrey!—"and this is a place for business, shall we resume our conversation? With reference to the first ten thousand pounds, it can be a matter of future arrangement, as to the instruments by which its payment is to be secured, and as to the remaining ten thousand, if I were not afraid of rendering myself liable to Mr. Titmouse for neglecting his interests, I should be content with your verbal promise—your mere word of honor, to pay it, as and when you conveniently could. But, in justice to myself, I really must take a show of security from you. Say, for instance, two promissory notes, for £5000 each, payable to Mr. Titmouse. You may really regard them as matters of mere form; for when you shall have given them to me they shall be deposited there," (pointing to an iron safe,) "and not again be heard of, until you may inquire for them. The influence which I happen to have obtained over Mr. Titmouse, you may rely upon my exercising with some energy, if ever he should be disposed to press you for payment of either of the instruments I have mentioned. I tell you candidly that they must be negotiable in point of form; and I assure you, as sincerely, that I will not permit them to be negotiated. Now, may I venture to hope that we understand each other," added Gammon, with a cheerful air: "and that if this be an arrangement which I shall be able to carry into effect, it is a sufficient evidence of my desire to serve you, and have the effect of relieving you from an immense load of anxiety and liability."

"An immense—a crushing load, indeed, sir, if you have but power to carry your views into effect," replied Mr. Aubrey, with a sigh of anxiety, and a look of gratitude.

"Leave that to me, my dear sir; I will undertake to do it; I will move heaven and earth to do it—and the more eagerly and anxiously, for that I may thereby hope to establish a kind of set-off against the misery and loss which my professional exertions have contributed to occasion you!"

"I feel very deeply sensible of your very great—your unexpected kindness, Mr. Gammon; but still, the arrangement suggested is one which occasions me dreadful anxiety as to my being able to carry out my part of it."

"Never, never despair Mr. Aubrey! Heaven helps those who help themselves; and I really imagine I see your powerful energies already beginning to surmount your prodigious difficulties! When you have slept over the matter you will feel the full relief which this arrangement is so calculated to afford your spirits. Of course, too, you will lose no time in communicating to Messrs. Runningtons the nature of the arrangement which I have proposed. I can predict that they will be not a little disposed to urge you to complete it. I cannot, however, help once more reminding you, in justice to myself, Mr. Aubrey, that it is but a proposition, in making which, I hope it will not prove that I have been carried away by my feelings much farther than my duty to my client or his interests!"

Mr. Aubrey was afraid to hear him finish the sentence, lest the faint dawn of hope should disappear from the dark and troubled surface. "I will consult, as you suggest, sir, my professional advisers; and feel confident that they will feel as you predict. I feel bound to consult them!"

"Oh, certainly! certainly! I am very strict in the observance of professional etiquette, Mr. Aubrey, I assure you; and should not think of going on with this arrangement, except with them, acting on your behalf. One thing I have got to beg, Mr. Aubrey, that either you or they will communicate the result of your deliberations to me, personally. I am very desirous that the suggested arrangement should be broken to them by me. By the way, if you would favor me with your address, I would make a point of calling at your house either late in the evening or early in the morning."

[As if Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap had not kept eagle eyes upon his every movement since quitting Yatton, with a view to any sudden application for a writ of Ne Exeat, which a suspicious movement of his toward the seacoast might render necessary.]

"I am infinitely obliged to you sir—but it would be far more convenient for both of us, if you could drop me a line, or favor me with a call at Mr. Weasel's, in Pomegranate Court in the Temple."

Gammon blushed scarlet; but for this accidental mention of the name of Mr. Weasel, who was one of the pleaders occasionally employed by Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap in heavy matters—in all probability Mr. Aubrey might have had to exercise his faculties, if so disposed, upon a declaration of trespass for mere profits, in a cause of "Titmouse v. Aubrey!"

"As you like—as you like, Mr. Aubrey," replied Gammon, with difficulty concealing his feelings of pique and disappointment at losing the opportunity of a personal introduction to Mr. Aubrey's family. After a few words of general conversation, Gammon inquiring how Mr. Aubrey liked his new profession, and assuring him in an emphatic manner, that he might rely upon being supported, from the moment of his being called to the bar; by almost all the common-law business of the firm of "Quirk, Gammon and Snap"—they parted. It had been to Mr. Aubrey a memorable interview—and to Gammon a somewhat arduous affair; taxing to an unusual extent his power of self-command and of dissimulation. As soon as he was left alone, his thoughts instantly recurred to Aubrey's singular burst of hauteur and indignation; Gammon had a stinging sense of submission to superior energy—and felt indignant with himself for not having resented it. Setting aside this source of exquisite irritation to the feelings of a proud man, Gammon felt a depressing consciousness that he had not met with his usual success, in his recent encounter with Mr. Aubrey, who had been throughout cautious, watchful, and courteously distrustful. He had afforded occasional glimpses of the unapproachable pride of his nature—and Gammon had crouched! Was there any thing in their interview—thought Gammon, walking thoughtfully to and fro in his room—which, when Aubrey came to reflect upon—for instance—had Gammon disclosed too much about the extent of his influence over Titmouse? His cheek slightly flushed; a sigh of fatigue and excitement escaped him; and gathering together his papers, he began to prepare for quitting the office for the day.

Mr. Aubrey quitted Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap's office with feelings of mingled exhaustion and despondency. As he walked down Saffron Hill—a dismal, deplorable neighborhood! what scenes did he witness? Poverty and profligacy reveling on all hands in their wild and filthy excesses! Here was a Irishman, half-stupified with liquor and bathed in blood, having just been rescued from a dreadful fight in a low, underground, public-house cellar, by his squalid wife, with dishevelled hair and a filthy infant in her arms—who walked beside him cursing, pinching, and striking him—reproaching him with the knowledge that she and her seven children were lying starving at home; presently he fell down into the gutter, and she with her infant fell down over him!

There was a woman—as it were a bloated mass of filth steeped in gin—standing with a drunken smile, at an old clothes-stall, pawing for a glass of gin a dirty little shirt, which she had a few minutes before stripped from the back of one of her then half-naked children!

A little further on was a noisy crowd round two men carrying a shutter, on which was strapped the bleeding body (a handkerchief spread over the face,) of a poor bricklayer, fallen a few minutes before from the top of some scaffolding, and then in the agonies of death—leaving behind him a wife and twelve children, for whom he had slaved from morning to night, who were ignorant of what had befallen him, and that they were left entirely destitute.

There was a skinny little terrified urchin, about eight years old, with nothing to conceal his dirty, half-starved body, but a tattered man's coat, pinned round him; dying with hunger, he had stolen a villainous-looking bare bone—scarce a halfpenny worth of meat upon it; and a brawny constable, his knuckles fiercely dug into the poor little offender's neck, with his tight grasp, was leading him off to the police office, followed by his shrieking mother; from the police office he would be committed to Newgate, and thence, after two or three months' imprisonment, he would be flogged—miserable little wretch!—by the common hangman, (who had hanged the child's father some six months before,) and discharged—to return several times and undergo a similar process; then to be transported; and finally be hanged, as had been his father before him.

These startling scenes passed before Mr. Aubrey, in the course of a five minutes' walk down Saffron Hill—during which period he now and then paused, and gazed around him with feelings of pity, of astonishment, of disgust, which presently blended and deepened into one feeling of horror. These scenes, to some so fatally familiar—fatally, I mean, on account of the indifference which their familiarity is apt to induce—to Mr. Aubrey, had on them all the frightful glare of novelty. He had never witnessed any thing of the sort before; and had no notion of its existence. The people on each side of the Hill, however, seemed perfectly familiar with such scenes, which they seemed to view with the same stupid indifference with which a lamb to the slaughter is beheld by one that has spent his life next door to the slaughter-house. The Jew clothes-man, before whose door he stood for a second or two, arrested by the horrifying spectacle of the bleeding wretch borne along to the hospital—took the opportunity to assail him with insolent importunity. A fat baker, and a greasy eating-house keeper, stood each at his door. Oh, how utterly insensible to the ravenous want that flitted incessantly past them! The pallid spectres haunting the gin-palace at the corner, gazed with sunken, lack-lustre eye and drunken apathy at the man borne by. What scenes were these! And what other hidden scenes did they not indicate the existence of! "Gracious mercy!" thought Aubrey, "what a world have I been living in! And this dismal aspect of it exposed to me just when I have lost all power of relieving its wretchedness!"—here a thrill of anguish passed through his heart—"but woe, woe is me! if at this moment I had a thousand times ten thousand a-year, how far would it go amidst the scenes similar to this, which abound in this one city! Oh, God! what unutterable horror must be in store for those who, entrusted by Thee with an overflowing abundance, disregard the misery around them in guilty selfishness and indolence, or"—he shuddered—"expend it in sensuality and profligacy! Will Dives become sensible of his misconduct, only when he shall have entered upon his next scene of existence and punishment! Oh, merciful Creator! how is my heart wrung by the sight of such scenes as these! Awful and mysterious Author of existence, Father of the spirits of all flesh, are these states of being which Thou hast ordained? Are these thy children? Are these my fellow creatures? Oh, help me! help me! my weak heart faints; my clouded understanding is confounded! I cannot—insect that I am!—discern the scope and end of thy economy, of thy dread government of the world; yet I know that thou reignest! though clouds and darkness are around thee! Righteousness and judgement are the habitation of thy throne! with righteousness shalt thou judge the world, AND THE PEOPLE WITH EQUITY!"

Like as the lesser light is lost in the greater, so, in Aubrey's case, was the lesser misery he suffered, merged in his sense of the greater misery he witnessed. What, after all, was his position, in comparison with that of those now before and around him? What cause of thankfulness had he not, for the merciful mildness of the dispensation of Providence towards him and his? Such were his thoughts and feelings, as he stood gazing at the scenes which had called them forth, when his eye lit on the figure of Mr. Gammon approaching him. He was threading his way, apparently lost in thought, through the scenes which had so powerfully affected Mr. Aubrey, who stood eyeing him with a sort of unconscious intensity, as if secure from his observation, till he was actually addressed by him.

"Mr. Aubrey!" exclaimed Gammon, courteously saluting him. Each took off his hat to the other. Though Aubrey hardly intended it, he found himself engaged in conversation with Gammon, who, in a remarkably feeling tone, and with a happy flattering deference of manner, intimated that he could guess the subject of Mr. Aubrey's thoughts, namely, the absorbing matters which they had been discussing together.

"No, I was not," said Aubrey with a sigh as he walked on—Gammon keeping easily beside him—"I have been profoundly affected by scenes which I have witnessed in the immediate neighborhood of your office, since quitting it; what misery! what horror!"

"Ah, Mr. Aubrey!"—exclaimed Gammon, with a sigh, as they very slowly ascended Holborn Hill, separate, but side by side—"what a checkered scene is life! Guilt and innocence—happiness and misery—wealth and poverty—disease and health—wisdom and folly—sensuality and refinement—piety and irreligion—how strangely intermingled we behold them, wherever we look on life—how difficult to the philosopher to detect the principle!"

"Difficult?—Impossible! Impossible!"—exclaimed Mr. Aubrey, thoughtfully.

"Comparison, I have often thought," said Gammon, after a pause—"comparison of one's own misfortunes with the greater misfortunes endured by others, is beneficial or prejudicial—consolatory or disheartening—according as the mind of him who makes the comparison is well or ill regulated—possessed or destitute of moral and religious principle!"

"It is so, indeed," said Mr. Aubrey; though not particularly inclined to enter into conversation, he was pleased with the tone of his companion's remark.

"As for me"—proceeded Gammon, with a slight sigh—"the absorbing anxieties of professional life; and, too, a branch of professional life which, infinitely to my distaste, brings me constantly into scenes such as you have been observing, have contributed to render me less sensible of their real character; yet can I vividly conceive the effect they must, when first seen, produce upon the mind and heart of a compassionate, an observant, a reflecting man, Mr. Aubrey!"

Gammon looked a gentleman; his address was easy and insinuating, full of delicate deference, without the slightest tendency to cant or sycophancy; his countenance was an intellectual and expressive one; his conversation that of an educated and thinking man. He was striving his utmost to produce a favorable impression on Mr. Aubrey; and, as is very little to be surprised at, he succeeded. By the time that they had got about twenty yards beyond Fetter Lane, they might have been seen walking together arm-in-arm. As they approached Oxford street, they suddenly stumbled on Mr. Runnington.

"God bless me, Mr. Aubrey!" said he, surprisedly—"and Mr. Gammon? How do you do, Mr. Gammon?" he continued, taking off his hat with a little formality, and speaking in a corresponding tone; but he was encountered by Gammon with greatly superior ease and distance, and was not a little nettled at it; for he was so palpably foiled with his own weapons.

"Well, I shall now resign you to your legitimate adviser, Mr. Aubrey," said Gammon, with a smile; then addressing Mr. Runnington, in whose countenance pique and pride were abundantly visible,—"Mr. Aubrey has favored me with a call to-day, and we have had some little discussion on a matter which he will explain to you. As for me, Mr. Aubrey, I ought to have turned off two streets ago—so I wish you a good evening."

Mr. Aubrey and he shook hands as they exchanged adieus. Mr. Runnington and he simply raised each his hat, and bowed to the other with cold politeness. As Mr. Runnington and Mr. Aubrey walked westward together, the former, who was a very cautious man did not think fit to express the uneasiness he felt at Mr. Aubrey's having entered into anything like confidential intercourse with one whom he believed to be so subtle and dangerous a person as Mr. Gammon. He was, however, very greatly surprised when he came to hear of the proposal which had been made up by Mr. Gammon, concerning the meagre profits, which, he said, was so unaccountably reasonable and liberal, considering the parties by whom it was made, that he feared Mr. Aubrey must be lying under some mistake. He would, however, turn it anxiously over in his mind, and consult with his partners; and, in short, do whatever they conceived best for Mr. Aubrey—that he might depend upon. "And, in the mean time, my dear air," added Mr. Runnington, with a smile designed to disguise considerable anxiety, "it may be as well for you not to have any further personal communication with these parties whom you do not know as well as we do; but to let us negotiate with them in everything!" Thus they parted, and Mr. Aubrey entered Vivian street with a considerably lighter heart than he had ever before carried into it. A vivid recollection of the scenes which he had witnessed at Saffron Hill, caused him exquisitely to appreciate the comforts of his little home, and to return the welcomes and caresses he received with a kind of trembling tenderness and energy. As he folded his still blooming but somewhat anxious wife fondly to his bosom, kissed his high-spirited and lovely sister, and fondled the prattling innocents that came clambering up upon his lap, he forgot the difficulties, but remembered the lesson of the day.

But I must return to Yatton, where same matters had transpired which are worth noticing. Though Mr. Yahoo paid rather anxious court to Mr. Gammon, who was very far too much for him in every way, 't was plain that he dreaded and disliked, as much as he was despised by that gentleman. Mr. Gammon easily extracted from Titmouse that Yahoo was endeavoring, from time to time, artfully to set him against his protector, Mr. Gammon. This was something; but more than this—Yahoo, a bold, dashing scoundrel, was obtaining a growing ascendancy over Titmouse, whom he was rapidly initiating into all manner of vile habits and practices; and, in short, completely corrupting. But, above all, Gammon ascertained that Yahoo had already commenced, with great success, his experiments upon the purse of Titmouse. Before they had been a week at Yatton, down came a splendid billiard table with its appendages from London, accompanied by a man to fix it—as he did—in the library, which he quickly denuded of all traces of its former character; and here Yahoo, Titmouse, and Fitz-Snooks would pass a good deal of their time. Then they would have tables and chairs, and cards, cigars, and brandy and water, out upon the beautiful "soft, smooth-shaven lawn," and sit there playing ecarté, at once pleasantly soothed and stimulated by their cigars and brandy and water, for half a day together. Then Yahoo got up frequent excursions to Grilston, and even to York; where, together with his two companions, he had "great sport," as the newspapers began to intimate with growing frequency and distinctness. Actuated by that execrable licentiousness with reference to the female sex, by which he was peculiarly distinguished, and of which he boasted, he had got into several curious adventures with farmers' girls, and others in the vicinity of Yatton, and even among the female members of the establishment at the Hall; in which latter quarter Fitz-Snooks and Titmouse began to imitate his example. Mr. Gammon conceived a fearful, a shuddering loathing and disgust for the miscreant leader into these enormities; and, but for certain consequences, would have despatched him with as much indifference as he would have laid arsenic in the way of a bold voracious rat, or killed a snake. As it was, he secretly caused him to experience, on one or two occasions, the effects of his good-will toward him. Yahoo had offered certain atrocious indignities to the sweetheart of a strapping young farmer; whose furious complaints coming to Mr. Gammon's ears, that gentleman, under a pledge of secrecy, gave him two guineas to be on the look-out for Yahoo, and give him the best taste he knew how, of a pair of Yorkshire fists. A day or two afterward, the Satyr fell in with his unsuspected enemy. Yahoo was a strongly-built man, and an excellent bruiser; but was at first disposed to shirk the fight, on glancing at the prodigious proportions of Hazel, and the fury flaming in his eyes. The instant, however, that he saw the attitude into which poor Hazel threw himself, Yahoo smiled, stripped, and set to. I am sorry to say that it was a good while before Hazel could get one single blow at his accomplished opponent; whom, however, he at length began to wear out. Then he gave him a miserable pomeling, to be sure; and finished by knocking out five of his front teeth, viz., three in the upper and two in the under jaw—beautifully white and regular teeth they certainly were; and the loss of them caused him great affliction on the score of his appearance, and also not a little interfered with the process of cigar-smoking; and would, besides, have debarred him from enlisting as a soldier, inasmuch as he could not bite off the end of his cartridge: wherefore it would seem that Hazel had committed the offence of Mayhem. Mr. Gammon condescended heartily with Mr. Yahoo, on hearing of the brutal attack which had been made upon him, and, as the assault had not been committed in the presence of a third party, strongly recommended him to bring an action of trespass vi et armis against Hazel, which Gammon undertook to conduct for him to—a nonsuit. While they were conversing in this friendly way together, it suddenly occurred to Gammon that there was another service he could render Mr. Yahoo, and with equally strict observance of the injunction, not to let his left hand know what his right hand did; for he loved the character of a secret benefactor. So he wrote up a letter to Snap, (whom he knew to have been treated very insolently by Yahoo,) desiring him to go to two or three flash bill-brokers and money-lenders, and ascertain whether they had any paper by them with the name of "Yahoo" on it; and in the event of such being discovered, he was to act in the manner pointed out by Gammon. Off went Snap like a shot, on receiving this letter; and the very first gentleman he applied to, viz., Suck'em Dax, Esq., proved to be possessed of an acceptance of Yahoo's for £200, for which Dry had given only five pounds on speculation. He readily yielded to Snap's representation, that he would give him—Dry—a shilling at Mr. Yahoo, gratis—and put the document into the hands of Snap; who forthwith delivered it confidentially, to Swindle Shark, gent., &c., a little Jew attorney in Chancery Lane, into whose office the dirty work of Quirk, Gammon and Snap was swept—in cases where they did not choose to appear.

I wish the mutilated Yahoo could have seen the mouthful of glittering teeth that were displayed by the hungry Jew, on receiving the above commission. His duties, though of a painful, were of a brief and simple description. 'T was a plain case of Indorse v. Acceptor. The affidavit of debt was sworn the same afternoon; and within an hour's time afterward, a thin slip of paper was delivered into the hands of the Under-sheriff of Yorkshire, commanding him to take the body of Pimp Yahoo, if he should be found in his bailiwick, and him safely keep—out of harm's way—to enable him to pay £200 debt to Suck'em Dry, and £24. 6s. 10d. costs to Swindle Shark. Down went that little "infernal machine" to Yorkshire by that night's post. Nothing could exceed the astonishment and concern with which Mr. Gammon, the evening but one afterward, on returning to the Hall from a ride to Grilston, heard Titmouse and Fitz-Snooks—deserted beings!—tell him how an hour before, two big vulgar fellows, one of them with a long slip of paper in his hands, had called at the Hall, asked for the innocent, unsuspecting Yahoo, just as he was putting his last ball into the pocket of the billiard-table—an admirable coup—and insisted on his accompanying them to the house of one of them, and then on to York Castle. They had brought a tax-cart with them for his convenience; and into it, between his two new friends, was forced to get the astonished Yahoo—smoking, as well as he could, a cigar, with which he had filled all his pockets, and swearing oaths enough to last the whole neighborhood for a fortnight at least.

THE DISINTERMENT OF NAPOLEON.

(HIS FEATURES SAID TO BE PERFECTLY PRESERVED.)

Gather around his grave,
Ye who his features knew!
Who saw him 'mid the ranks of war
When his peerless Eagle flew!

Look on what is—of him
The loftiest of his kind—
Whose word was law to millions,
Whose gaze made monarchs blind.

Now lift the coffin lid—
Heavens! Death has lost his power!
Why this is he, as when he stood
In triumph's loftiest hour!

The same pale ample brow—
The lip compressed, and thin—
The deathless spirit's majesty!
The impress from within!

Soldiers!—your leader claim!
Once more your arms advance!
Up with the Eagles! charge for fame!
For Liberty! for France!

Where are the foes of France
That triumph in her shame?
March with the dead Napoleon!
Cry—Vengeance!—in his name!

Recall the glorious past!
To Ansterlitz return—
To Jena, Eckmühl and Arcole,
Marengo and Asperne!

We have a leader now,
We'll give no price for peace:
Let Phillipist chicanery
And Guizot truckling cease!

He comes! the Conqueror comes!
Pale Europe owns her lord
Who made her monarchs tremble,
When he looked upon his sword!

He comes!—the Peasant-King—
What though beneath a pall?
The people's love hath circled him,
And his grandeur cannot fall.

He comes!—a Spirit-King,
And his eye is fixed and dim;
But where 's the rigid rebel's knee
That doth not bend to him?

Earth! search thy scanty history!
It hath no page like this!
He smileth in his coffin,
Throne, camp and church are his!

His reign in life was brief,
But his reign is hence for ever!
And fickle France henceforth will be False to Napoleon—never.

HAPPINESS LOST AND FOUND.

BY FRANCES S. OSGOOD.

I.
Our cot was in a forest glade,
Where sunbeams stole to mock the shade,
And wild-flowers round the lattice played,
By beam and breeze caressed:
And in our Mary's form and face,
Was all the blossom's glowing grace;
A lovely human flower, was she,
Nay! more, a bird, in tireless glee,
The darling of the nest!
She came, an orphan, to our wild;
But fondly on her kinsman's child,
My mother, her true welcome, smiled,
And so our home was blest.

II.
Yet I, alas! unconscious then,
How rich, within our woodland glen,
Were we, afar from world-worn men,
For gaudier pleasures pined:
For I had seen, in dreams at night,
A being, lovely as the light,
With eyes like Heaven, of changeable blue,
And hair, that gleamed of gold stole through,
And lips in dimples shrined.
Her name was Happiness, she said;
And soon, by blind Ambition led,
I left our lowly, love-warmed shed,
To seek this maiden kind.

III.
I sought her far—I sought her wide,
I sought her in the halls of pride,
Her angel smile was still denied,
Where gems less lovely shone.
I asked of Fame her fairest crown:—
With mocking laugh she cast it down.
No spell was in the wreath, tho' fair,
To win the maid with golden hair;
And I was all alone.
I asked of Wealth his coffer's key:
He smiled, and flung them wide to me,
The glittering treasure, fair and free,
I lavished.—Soon 't was flown.

IV.
It bought me rank;—it bought me power;
It bought me Pleasure's fleeting flower,
And many a plaything of an hour:
Ah, me! 't was little worth!
It could not buy that being fair,
The vision with the shining hair;
No! far from me, her low, sweet lay,
Young Joy was warbling all the day,
While I, o'er half the earth
Went wandering for her looks of light.
At length, I wearied of the sight,
Of palace-halls. I dreamed one night
Of her, who gave me birth.

V.
And coldly, on the morrow-morn,
With sorrow in my soul and scorn,
I sought the glen where I was born,
How holy seemed the air!
The wild-flower, with its early glow,
Still lightly laced the lattice low;
Still sang the rill;—the forest trees
Bent, as of old, beneath the breeze,
And all was free and fair.
The Zephyr, with its breath of balm,
The sunshine smiling, soft and calm,
Wrought, in my very heart a charm,
And made it Summer there.

VI.
Some dreamy moments passed, before
My trembling hand unlatched the door,
And I, beneath that roof once more,
Stood silent with delight.
My mother welcomed back her boy;
My bashful Mary blushed her joy;
And folding to my heart the prize,
That now seemed dearest in mine eyes,
And loveliest and most bright,
I saw again the vision fair,
The maiden with the radiant hair;
For Joy and I had parted there,
As there we met that night!

VII.
Ah! many a youth will search like me,
Will roam the land and cross the sea,
In quest of Happiness, while she Sits all the while unseen,
Beside the very hearth he leaves,
And there her golden web she weaves,
Perchance arrayed in lowly guise,
But still with Heaven-illumined eyes,
And frank and smiling mien.
We fondlest prize the gem we miss;
We prize for absent friendship's kiss;
We know not, 'till we lose the bliss
That dwells at home serene.

RESERVE PASTE FOR DYEING SHAWLS.—Klein recommends for this purpose, to mix chalk into a paste with albumen; a solution of gum arabic is then to be added, about equal to half the volume of albumen. The desired consistence is then to be obtained by adding water. This reserve is applied by means of a brush to the borders and ornaments to be reserved. In a few minutes it becomes dry. To procure its complete effect, it must be applied on both sides—the shawls rather to be immersed in the dyeing vat. The reserve paste is to be removed by washing the shawl afterward in water, and pressing it between the hands.

THE BLUE STOCKING.

"A beautiful, a very beautiful work. The incidents are natural in themselves, and their continuity is most artistically managed. The language is flowing, and the sentiments advanced are imbued with the color of original thought. To night you shall see the author. He is an angelic being, my most particular friend, and I have sent him an invitation, which, dear creature, he has graciously accepted."

These few words are uttered by a lady of whom we must give a description. In stature she is short, and rather fat, though any flesh she may possess does not prevent her action being very quick. Of a pale hue is her complexion; her eyes are grey; and her hair dark and curling. About her forehead there is a peculiar look, the fair dame, believing in the truth of phrenology and in her own possession of intellect, having caused some portion of her ringlets to be cut away, the effect of which is a dark shade over her brows. Equally singular with the appearance of the head is the voice of the blue stocking. It is in tones very shrill and loud, in manner so quick as, did not the force of utterance prevent such, would make it difficult for a listener to recognise the several words.

The apartment in which this female Solon is now conversing with a friend who, as yet, wears only socks of a light azure, harmonizes very strictly with the idea of the possessor. It is well furnished; there are several busts standing upon pedestals against the walls, while on a table that is placed in the centre of the room there are scattered newspapers, novels, and reviews. There rests the Morning Post with its fashionable columns upward; close by it is one of the Messrs. Colburn and Bentley's new fictions; and but a small distance further is the volume of strictures upon the literature and music that the present quarter has produced.

The little which has already been put down will be a sufficient specimen of our subject's tone of conversation. She scarcely ever opens her mouth without recording the praises of some idol, though we must say that we cannot subscribe to her opinions. Like some people's taste in dress, the blue stocking's estimate of genius is dependant upon its delicacy or glitter. She supposes Lytton Bulwer to be the finest romancist that the world ever produced, and that before the greater glory of the wreath which encircles the brows of Harrison Ainsworth the chaplets of both Shakspeare and Milton must look pale. She has a regard, too, for the author of "Nicholas Nickleby," but this has been greatly increased since last September. Until that month came, her estimate had been but so-so; but the long fingers, the wristbands, the languid eye, and the hair brought about a revolution. Yes, for the last nine months has our dear friend confessed the genius of "Boz." It is this individual, indeed, whom she has spoken of on the present occasion as an "angelic being." It is most assuredly very laughable to see how we, poor human creatures, can even deceive our own minds. Miss Sappho Green thinks that her idolatry springs from an intuitive love of talent, but she is mistaken; it is not the highly gifted author whom she bows to, but the nice, the very nice, and gentlemanly looking young man.

Before we have done with our sweet subject we will show her amongst those literary luminaries that occasionally shine in her apartments. Till we come to that part of our duties let us take a slight view of the blue-stocking's attainments—those mighty powers that some people suppose have an existence in the brain of Miss Sappho Green.

Well, the lady can talk; and her education has been such as to make her have the names of things at her fingers' ends. She is well aware of the existence of art and science; further, she knows that these include such things as painting, music, geography, mathematics, hydraulics, ethica, pneumatics, zoology, and the like. Each of these is, in its turn, the subject of her discourse, and she goes on and on in a manner to astonish any person save one who has not had a practical acquaintance with the fact that most very talkative people are the same as the empty bottles that make the greatest noise. Miss S. G.'s purpose is served. She deals in big words, and so nicely strings them together as to create an impression of vast intellectuality. Of light and shade she speaks, then come the technicalities of other pursuits—tones, semi-tones, strata, fossils, angles, squares, lines; and the effect of this is, on her side, self-gratulation; on that of her listen, crwonder, admiration, and sometimes profound awe.

Her best suite of rooms is thrown open, and she, with others, is already in the place of action. Vastly poetical is the receiving dress of the delectable Sappho. There, indeed, have been mingled two of the things she has lately been conversing about—light and shade, for she has, with artificial aids, increased the white hue of her flesh and the raven one of her locks. Her gown is sky blue silk; over her brow is a band of gold; and on her bosom is an amulet looking thing, which, on a closer survey, will be discovered to be the likeness of some great creature, either living or defunct.

We could detect the knock of the author of "Pelham" were we to hear it among a thousand. It is so very gentlemanly, so truly white-kid-glove like, as to put doubt to the flight. That knock have we just heard, and here comes the giver. A very long and thin face graced on the sides by bushy whiskers, and on the under lip by what is called a tip, luxuriant and rather curling hair, peculiarly bright eyes, and a voice whose tone is rather affected than otherwise, make up Sir Lytton Bulwer's claims to fascination.

"Dear Sir Edward, I am so happy to see you!" exclaims the lady entertainer. She runs to the gentleman spoken to, and he returns the salutation in a manner that would do honor to St. James's itself. Then from the pocket of the dress-coat is the magnificent handkerchief extracted, and the air becomes ambrosial.

There is another knock. That, though it is not so individual as the former, we think we can tell whose hand it proceeds from. We are right again—it is the editor of "Bentley's Miscellany." A fine fellow, truly, though, notwithstanding the good offices of the tailor and jeweller, to leave out of our account Dame Nature's handiwork in the way of an ample bust, well-carved features, and shining curls, having insomuch of Jack Sheppard about him.

Presently comes a third knock! When it has been answered there is announced a name—a very common one, indeed, but that it is not the designation of a very common person is proved by the eager look which is directed to the room-door. He—the celebrated one—makes his appearance, about which there is little that to the common speaks of what exists within. It is a very attractive visage, that on which we are looking. At least the ladies have said so, and we suppose that they are in the right.

But what with our fair subject's friends, we have lost sight of her for a few minutes or so. We will make amends by more narrowly noticing her. There she is, all alive and in her own element, saying pretty little things to her literary guests, as well as receiving from their lips a due return. Happy, but deceived creature, in thus being able to take one character for another! Thou art not the vain, flippant, foolish, or ostentatious woman—in thine own opinion, let add. No; viewed through the glass of thine own estimation, thou art the spiritual, the good, the gay—in short, the BLUE STOCKING!

RETIRING FROM BUSINESS.

TRANSLATED FROM THE CHARIVARI.

It is the nature of man to be doing; whatever may be his age and his position, he must have an occupation of some sort, whether physical or intellectual; I do not believe in the possibility of absolute idleness, not even in the dependants on the charity of the l'Etat-civil.

I have not chosen this theme in order to discuss it at length: heaven preserve me from it, and you also, reader! That which you may have mistaken for the grave introduction to a learned dissertation, was nothing more than a reflection into which I was led while contemplating from my window an excellent and worthy neighbor of mine, M. Fromageot.

This respectable pater familias, of whom I will not say that age had whitened his venerable locks, seeing that for the last ten years his head had cast off that ornament as a superfluity which hairdressers and bear's grease had rendered too expensive, not long since exercised the profession of haberdasher, in the Rue St. Denis, the favored quarter of this useful class. His ledgers were well filled, and kept with scrupulous exactitude; but he had a clerk to whom these delicate functions were exclusively consigned. From morn to dewy eve his shop was crowded with purchasers; but here, again, he kept apprentices, whose duty it was to unfold, exhibit, and refold his wares. M. Fromageot had reserved for himself no special task but that, as he expressed himself, of keeping an eye on every thing, meaning that he spent the whole day in circulating, with his hands in his breeches-pockets, from the shop to the counter, from the counter to the shop, stimulating with a word or a look, the activity of his men, who, notwithstanding, performed their duties neither better nor worse. Nevertheless, Madame Fromageot, a lady who, from time to time, does me the honor to exchange remarks on the state of the temperature, or the demand for night-caps, does not remember a single instance, during the last twenty years, of her husband going to bed without exclaiming, "What a weary life! When shall I be able to retire from business and repose myself?" But this is the accustomed exclamation of all who labor to gain a living or save a competency; and I have further observed, that the moment this retirement has arrived, they all look on the repose so long the object of their wishes in about the same light as M. Fromageot.

Would you know how my neighbor enjoys his repose now that he is shut up in a charming little country-house, where all the comforts of existence are to be found? This is what I have witnessed from the first day of the year to the last.

At four in the morning in summer, at seven in winter, M. Fromageot throws himself from a bed of thrice-driven down; he puts on a blouse, steps into an enormous pair of sabots, defends his head with a nightcap striped blue and white, heaps upon his shoulder a spade, a pickaxe, a rake, a pitchfork, and a dibber, takes up a large basket, wherein are methodically arranged his cabbage, salad, and strawberry plants, and away he trudges to his garden. There he sticks for twelve or fifteen hours, his spine continually bent, making holes in the ground, tracing furrows, planting endive and lettuce, weeding beans, digging potatoes, with all the ardor of the most inveterate market-gardener. Think not that he allows himself the least cessation to his labors. Yesterday he was picking caterpillars from his plum-trees; to-day he is renewing a border of thyme, which is not more than 600 feet in length; to-morrow he will have to drive 2,000 nails to trail his vines and peach-trees. Though the wind blow with all its fury, though the rain pour down in torrent, though the sun dart his vertical rays on him, though the hairs of his beard stiffen with the sleet of January, he is staunch to his post, staunch as a brave soldier on the field of glory; a visit from his dearest friend could not induce him to forego one stroke of his spade; and if, peradventure, the temptation of satisfying his vanity should lead him for a few moments from his work, in order to display with pride his gigantic pumpkin to an admiring amateur, or to recount the history of some marvellous graft, he would take care, on going to bed, to advance his alarm one hour, that he might, as he would say, recover lost time. He often forgets his breakfast hour, and the same thing would happen with his dinner, were it not that his wife, after having in vain called him two or three times, tears him almost by force from his well-beloved plantations.

When a violent storm, or a hard frost, renders all gardening operations impracticable, and condemns M. Fromageot to keep within doors, the poor man really looks like a perturbed spirit; he wanders fretfully from one room to another, descends into the cellar, goes up into the garret, quarrels with his wife, scolds his servant, until he is struck, as with lightning, with the brilliant idea of splitting wood, or making a new railing for his rabbit-hutch.

For such repose has M. Fromageot amassed franc on franc for the last twenty years, until he has realized a capital of 200,000f., and he reckons on enjoying this sweet repose for the next thirty years, unless it procure him some inflammation of the chest to carry him off prematurely.

Thus M. Fromageot, after reposing all the while he fancied he was working, works all the while he is reposing. It is the history of many of his fellow-men.

Never despise a man because his employment is mean, or his clothing is bad. The bee is an insect that is not very pleasing to the sight, yet its hive affords an abundance of honey.

The World of Science &amp; Art.

HENRI MONDEUX, THE CALCULATING BOY.—M. Cauchy lately presented to the French Academy a report on this remarkable mental calculator. It appears from the report, that when he is required to multiply the one by the other of two given numbers, he often divides these numbers into sets of two figures; having observed that in those cases where the factors are equal, the operation becomes more simple. The rules which he employs to form the product, or rather the power required, are precisely those which the formula known under the name of the binomial theorem of Newton would give. Guided by these rules, he can state, at the same instant, when required, the squares and cubes of a variety of numbers. As he knows nearly by heart all the squares of all the whole numbers under 100, the division of the larger numbers into sets of two figures, enables him to obtain their squares more easily. He has thus been enabled, in presence of the Academy, to state almost instantaneously the square of 756. Mondeux has of himself discovered the well known method, which gives the sum of a progression. Several of the rules which he has contrived for resolving different problems, are those which are deducible from certain algebraical formulas; as examples may be cited the rules by which he calculates the sums of squares, cubes, fourth, and even the fifth powers of natural numbers. To resolve two simultaneous equations of the first degree, Mondeux employs a method which ought to be made known. He seeks first the difference of the unknown quantities; and in order to arrive at this object, he subtracts the one equation from the other after having multiplied the first by the proportion which exists between the sums formed successively to each other with the co-efficients of the two unknown quantities. This process may be simplified, as Mondeux has observed, viz., by subtracting the one equation from the other, after having divided each of them by the sum of the co-efficients which affect, in the first place, the two unknown quantities: then the resulting equation immediately would furnish the difference between the two unknown quantities, from which the unknown quantities themselves can be easily deduced. If required to resolve a single equation of a degree higher than the first, Mondeux employs a method which may be illustrated by an example: he was asked to find a number, such that its cube increased by 84, affords a sum equal to the product of this number by 37. Mondeux gave the numbers 3 and 4 as an answer. To obtain them, he began by transforming the equation required to be resolved, and dividing the two numbers by that sought; then the proposed equation was reduced to the following:—to find a number such that its square increased by the quotient obtained by dividing 84 by the number will produce 37. By means of the transformation pointed out, Mondeux immediately perceived that the required number was inferior to the square root of 36, viz. 6; a few trials would soon enable him to arrive at the numbers already mentioned. Mondeux also resolves questions of indeterminate analysis. He was required to give two squares, the difference of which should be 123; he immediately gave 66 and 67; and being asked for a more simple solution, he answered 13 and 6. He reasoned thus: the difference between the squares of the numbers sought exceeds the square of their difference by a quantity which is equal to the double of this difference multiplied by the smallest. The question proposed may therefore be stated thus:—"To subtract from 133 a square such that the remainder may be divisible by the double of the root." If we try the following squares in succession, 1, 4, 9, 16, 25, 36, 49, we find that 1 and 49 will alone answer. By subtracting 133 and dividing the remainders, 132 and 84, by the roots doubled, that is by 2 and 12, we obtain 66 and 67; the numbers given by Mondeux. Mondeux has no memory for the names of persons, places, and objects. Even the names of geometrical figures and the construction of squares or cubes make less impression on him than the study of the properties of the numbers by which they are represented. Mondeux is the son of a shepherd; M. Jacobi, of Tours, hearing of his fondness for figures, took him and educated him. An application has been made to the French government to enable Jacobi to continue the education of the boy.

ACROGRAPHY; OR ETCHING IN RELIEF.—This is a new art, which well deserves the attention of designers and publishers, though as yet in its infancy, and by no means so perfect as is desirable in its results. The defects in the cuts are want of sharpness and clearness in the lines, and a monotony of tint; but what share of these faults belong to the transferring process, we have not the means of determining; we incline to the opinion, however, that the feeble effect is partly attributable to the artist, the broken and coarse lines to the process itself, and the heavy and dirty impression to the printer. When we call to mind the first rude efforts in lithography, and compare them with the beautiful productions now issuing from the lithographic press, there is reason to expect a proportionate improvement in acrography—which resembles lithography in this, that the artist's own work yields the impression: it is to lithography what wood-block printing is to copperplate.

The peculiar advantage of acrography over lithography is that the impressions are printed with type by a common letter-press: its superiority to wood engraving consists in the blocks being the designer's own work; thus saving the time, expense, and loss of spirit consequent on the process of cutting. We must not be misunderstood to say that the acrographic impressions are equal in power and effect to highly-finished wood engravings; or that the relief-etchings are as firm, bright and delicate as copper-plate, or as pen-and-ink drawing on stone: acrography, probably, may never realize such brilliant results, as regards execution; but in point of freedom and purpose in the design, it bids fair to be successful enough to invite artists of superior talent to make trial of it.

The ordinary mode of drawing with an etching-point on a black ground is adopted, but a lithographic stone is preferable to a copper-plate. From the incised lines a cast is taken in metal, by a process invented by a Mr. Louis Schonberg, of Hatton Garden, and known only to him; and from this metal block, having the lines in relief, the impressions are printed, in the same manner as from a wood-block. The nicety required in the operation of taking a cast from so delicate a mould as that formed by the scratches of a needle through a thin coating of wax and lamb-black, makes the difficulty and ingenuity of Mr. Schonberg's process obvious at first sight: how far it is susceptible of being improved upon remains to be ascertained. Meanwhile, we may observe that the most extraordinary example of acrography is a medallion of Addison, engraved in a similar style to that of Collas's patent, and not distinguishable from its productions except by the lines being imperfect.

We should think the electrotype process might be employed with advantage in producing casts in relief from etchings, by means of a ground chemically prepared.—[London Spectator.

METHOD OF ZINCING COPPER AND BRASS.—M. Boettger has succeeded in covering plates and wires of copper, brass, pins, &c., with a brilliant coating of zinc. His method is as follows: granulated zinc is prepared by pouring the fused metal into a mortar of heated iron, and stirring it rapidly with the pestle until it is solidified. The metal thus granulated is placed in a porcelain capsule, or in some other non-metallic vessel. A saturated solution of sal-ammoniac is poured over it; the mixture is boiled; the objects to be rendered white are now placed in it, previously dipped in dilute hydrochloric acid: in a few minutes they are covered with a brilliant coating of zinc, which it is very difficult to remove by friction. The galvanic action is thus explained: the double chloride of zinc and ammonium formed is decomposed by the zinc and the plate of copper; the chlorine disengaged from the sal-ammoniac goes to the zinc; the ammonium is disengaged in the form of gas, and the undecomposed sal-ammoniac combines with the chloride of zinc to form the double chloride, a very soluble and easily decomposed salt. If then an excess of zinc exists in the solution in contact with the electro-negative copper, the salt is decomposed into its elements, and the reduced zinc is deposited on the negative copper.

A TWELVE MONTHS' CLOCK.—At the rooms of the United States Society of Science and Mechanism, No. 67 Liberty street, there is now exhibiting a newly invented clock, which must of necessity be more accurate as a time-keeper than any pendulum clock, and which possesses the remarkable power of running twelve months, without being wound up during that long period. It would seem, therefore, that the same principle, scientifically multiplied, would very nearly approximate to perpetual motion.

Indeed, the principle of this clock can be adapted to any period of running, from two days to two hundred years—and the price of the article is proportioned to the time the clock is made to run without winding. We copy the following particulars from the Newark Daily Advertiser:—

The clock contains only six wheels of from 60 to 96 teeth, and 5 pinions of 6, 8, 10, 12 and 16 leaves, 4 wheels and 4 pinions in the striking part, and 2 wheels and 1 pinion in the time part. The whole is driven and kept in motion by once winding for 376 days, by a spring of a strength when wound up equal to only 12 pounds weight.

The improvement in the striking part consists principally in the application of a rotary hammer: is very simple and requires 52 times less maintaining power than other clocks. The time part is driven by the striking part by means of a small spring, which forms a complete retaining power while winding, and, like the striking part, requires 52 times less maintaining power.

The great improvement in the time part consists principally in the regulating motion, and may be called a rotary or torsion pendulum, the ball is of a globular form and hollow, and suspended by a small spring; near the upper end of this spring is fastened an arm in the form of a crank: the ball being turned, twists the spring and causes the arm to perform an arch, acting upon and receiving the impulse from the swing wheel by means of a lever connected with the arm; which impulse is carried through the spring to the ball and keeps it in motion. The spring in a quiescent state is longest: by its being twisted either way from that state it is shortened, and the ball made to rise—returning by the reaction of the spring and the force of gravity, receiving the impulse from the maintaining power at each return. There is an irregularity existing in the common pendulum, by a loss of power arising from an increase of friction, thereby lessening the impulse given to it and shortening the arc of its vibrations. If it measures true time in an arc of 4 degrees, it will gain 10 seconds a day by vibrating in an arc of 3 degrees, so that by an increase of friction and loss of power, which is always the case, it will gain time.

Any difference of friction or maintaining power in this clock will not affect the time given by this pendulum: its revolutions or vibrations are rendered perfectly isochronal, by the influence that the torsion of the spring has (when made of a certain width to its thickness) in its reaction, upon the force of gravity of the ball.

The different degrees of temperature do not affect the time given by this pendulum: the time it would lose by the expansion of the spring in length, is accurately counteracted by the time it gains by its expansion in width and thickness. Let the expansibility of the metal of which the ball is made be what it may, the time it would lose by its expansion outward from its axis of motion is compensated for at the same time, by the time it gains, by the regulator rising on the spring and shortening the active part of it, by the expansion of the ball upward from the nut on which it rests.

IMPROVED MICROSCOPE.—M. Donne, who has delivered lectures on microscopical anatomy, has made a small addition to the instrument which is very useful in a class room. "My microscope," he says, "carry their light with them; a small lamp is placed in a kind of dark lantern, which is adapted to the microscope so as to throw light upon the reflecting mirror: all the other parts of the instrument are fixed; for example, the object is retained upon the platform by a small compressor, so that when the focus is ascertained, the microscope may be passed from one person to another without any other preparation being required than to direct the eye to the object." This arrangement will be exceedingly advantageous for clinical inquiries.

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 13, 1841.

BARNABY RUDGE,

A NEW WORK BY CHARLES DICKENS, Esq., (Box,) another of the "The old Curiosity Shop," "The Pickwick Papers," "Oliver Twist," "Nicholas Nickleby," &c.

In the next number of the New World or in the number succeeding, we shall begin the publication of the above story, said, by those who have seen the commencement of it in England, to be the very best production of its popular author. [It will be remembered that this work was announced more than a year since; public expectation, then universally excited, will now be gratified. In consequence of the frequency of the arrivals from England, we probably shall be able to give a chapter each week, till the whole romance is concluded. Are we asking too much of the Editors, with whom we exchange, when we beg that they will announce the above work as forthcoming in the New World?]

We expect that the first demand will be very great; and for that reason we are induced to solicit new subscribers to forward their orders immediately. We are quite willing to receive "Red Back" bills, in spite of the machinations of the New York Brokers, from every man who will send us $3 for a year's subscription. We shall signify to each new subscriber, our receipt of his commands, by forwarding to him a copy of our just issued Leviathan New World.

Address J. WINCHESTER,

30 Ann street, New York.

"RED BACKS."—We again have occasion to say to our country friends that they must not be alarmed at the Wall street bulletin which discredits the notes of the new banks. There is no sound reason whatever for the panic recently "got up," but it is the result, doubtless, of a combination of certain Wall street worthies who do not hesitate to frighten the people into parting with their hard earnings at a sacrifice of twenty per cent., if they can put the difference in their own pockets.

The nominal cause of the recent decline in the market value of these bank notes, is the depreciation in value of certain State stocks of the same kind as these banks have previously lodged with the Comptroller to secure the redemption of the notes they received from him. But the fact is kept studiously out of sight that the stocks were pledged not at par, but at the then current market rates, which rates probably do not very greatly differ from the present rates: besides, if these banks have managed their affairs properly, (and in general there is no imputation to the contrary,) their notes are good without recourse to the security, inasmuch as they are issued by the banks for value, in exchange for good promissory notes, or other satisfactory securities. So that in fact, these notes are better than the notes of other banks, because they are doubly secured.

As to the State stocks, it is true that there has recently been a considerable decline in their market value—but we see no reason on earth for supposing that their intrinsic value has decreased. On the contrary, Indiana and Illinois have both, by Legislative enactment, provided for the payment of their interest; and as for Mississippi—although some action was proposed by the Governor of that State opposing the payment of interest, the Legislature very promptly rebuked and overruled his disgraceful proposal. Besides, Mississippi bonds, we imagine, have not been pledged by our new banks to the Comptroller—or at least to a very moderate extent.

As regard the red-back notes, they are passing here currently enough—despite the Wall street combination to depreciate them. Many trades people and others have today advertised to receive them at par; and we hereby notify our subscribers that we will take them as heretofore.

§§ We are inclined highly to applaud the sentiment in President Harrison's Inaugural Address concerning his intention to do all in his power to allay the force of party spirit. These sentiments are perfectly in accordance with those expressed by President Washington, in his Farewell Address. The question now arises, how it is that President Harrison can best carry into effect his determination of exerting his influence in this regard for the whole country. The obvious answer is, by not removing the present incumbents from office, except for good and sufficient reasons.

Mr. Clay would have none removed, except those who have made their situations subservient to the uses of party. We are afraid that this exception would be rather too comprehensive. Under the system which has prevailed for twelve years past, office holders have been compelled, as it were, under "the enticement of a handspike," to tug like galley-slaves at the political oars, which have been forced into their hands. Having thus acted under compulsion, they cannot, with strict justice, be held responsible for the practices, of which they are truly accused. Extend pardon to these people, and more is done in a moment to quench party spirit than could by other means be effected in years. Not a man of them but would be a Whig, before one with moderate haste might count a hundred; and he would change his politics on such good grounds that it would be quite impossible for his old coadjutors to quarrel with him.

Nothing can be more anti-democratic than the slavery of party. On this point President Harrison has declared himself an abolitionist. This is a pledge as direct and as forcible, and one which ought to be as binding, as any that he has made. In accordance with this pledge, he surely cannot turn men out of offices, because they are members of an antagonist party, and install others in their places, because they are adherents to what is called "the Whig cause." No! If the President be really sincere in his expressed resolution to "emancipate the office holders," and to put to sleep this raging spirit of party, he will not eject a competent man from office, the duties of which he has faithfully and ably performed, only to put in his place some bold and forward claimant, who urges his services to the party, as his sole qualifications.

To prove to those, who did not attentively read President Harrison's Inaugural Address, that the above remarks are fully authorized by his views, we quote three admirable sentences:

The true spirit of liberty, although devoted, persevering, bold, and uncompromising in principle, that secured, is mild, and tolerant, and scrupulous as to the means it employs; whilst the spirit of party, assuming to be that of liberty, is harsh, vindictive, and intolerant, and totally reckless as to the character of the allies which it brings to the aid of its cause. When the genuine spirit of liberty animates the body of a people to a thorough examination of their affairs, it leads to the excision of every excrescence which may have fastened itself upon any of the Departments of the Government, and restores the system to its pristine health and beauty. But the reign of an intolerant spirit of party amongst a free people, seldom fails to result in a dangerous accession to the Executive power introduced and established amidst unusual professions of devotion to democracy.

JAMES FENIMORE COOPER.—The Courier and Enquirer of Tuesday morning contains a letter addressed to its editor by Andrew M. Barber, Esq. late editor of the Otsego Republican, in which are recited certain facts concerning a libel suit brought against Mr. Barber by the most distinguished and estimable man in the United States.

It appears that Mr. Cooper prosecuted Mr. Barber for libel in the Supreme Court, and obtained a judgement, under which the types and press of Mr. Barber were levied on and sold in July last—the consequence of which procedure was, of course, the breaking up of the newspaper in question. The sale of these effects, however, did not produce the amount of the judgement, so that a balance still remained due from Mr. Barber to Mr. Cooper; for the recovery of which balance, the latter distinguished and estimable gentleman, as it seems from Mr. Barber's statement, recently despatched the sheriff to the lodgings of Mr. B. This officer obtained access to Mr. B's trunks, and took therefrom a sum of money—but still not enough to satisfy the claim. Under what process of law this seizure was made, we do not precisely understand; but we suppose it was authorized by the law in some way, or it would not have been made. At any rate, law or no law, the seizure had the sanction of the aforesaid distinguished, and amiable, and philanthropic, and charitable, and never-sufficiently-to-be-respected, Mr. Cooper, author of Home as found—and that fact puts civil and criticism at rest. What he did, or ordered to be done, or sanctioned after it was done, is beyond all peradventure right.

The letter of Mr. Barber, in reply to Col. Webb, also introduces a letter by the same writer to Mr. Cooper which occupies the greater part of a column in the Courier, and which sets forth pretty distinctly Mr. Barber's views of Mr. Cooper's proceedings.

Under ordinary circumstances, this letter to Mr. Cooper might be considered as an expression of honest indignation, excited by a most cruel and arbitrary persecution; but the outrage of thinking or speaking harshly of Mr. Cooper, and the honor of being held to answer for it, do not come within the range of the aforesaid ordinary circumstances; therefore, being unequal to the task, we abstain from comment, and recommend all our readers to abstain from looking into the columns of the Courier and Enquirer for the present.

§3—When the bill empowering married women to make bequests of property belonging to them was before the House of Representatives in Massachusetts, Mr. Bradburn, of Nantucket, raised a question of order by inquiring of the Speaker, if, under the rule which forbids members directly interested in any subject to vote thereon, all married men were not disabled from voting on this question! The Chair said that if Mr. B. would put the case of any individual member whose wife held property, the point of order should be decided. Mr. Bradburn said he could furnish a list of fifty of the gentlemen so situated, but to save time he would leave the matter to their own consciences.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

WASHINGTON, March 6, 1841

The immense crowds congregated here have begun to disperse. To-day it commenced snowing—then it hailed—and now it is raining violently, and an occasional peal of thunder gives cheering token of the approach of spring.

I have no news of any interest to communicate. The office-seekers are still kept in doubt. My own opinion, founded on that of those who know Harrison best, is, that the new administration will be extremely cautious and forbearing in making removals.

Gen. Harrison is finally comfortably installed in the White House. His daughter-in-law, Mrs. Harrison, presides over his domestic arrangements. She is a lady of very uncommon personal attractions, dignified though gentle and courteous in her manners, with a noble figure and a face of much sweetness and intelligence. I cannot imagine one better fitted to do the honors of the President's House. Mrs. Harrison is a widow with two or three children; though she is not apparently more than thirty. She has with her a niece, Miss Ramsay, who, in personal charms, found few compeers even at a time when representations of the beauty of the whole Union were assembled in Washington.

Gen. Harrison has made a most agreeable impression upon all who have had any intercourse with him. His conversational powers are certainly extraordinary. He speaks with fluency, and his thoughts fall naturally into a mould of the choicest and most beautiful language. I could detect nothing like affectation or effort in his conversation. He has one of the most suggestive minds I ever encountered; and having passed through a career full of incident and variety, his retentive memory seems to be constantly on the alert for illustrations drawn from his own experience of any points that may occur.

The ball on the evening of the inauguration passed off in excellent style. Some twelve hundred persons were present; and a gayer and more enlivening scene has rarely been witnessed, even in this city of extraordinary scenes. The members of the Cabinet, of the Senate and the House, were nearly all present; and about ten o'clock the President elect, with Mrs. Seaton on his arm, and attended by his suite, entered the hall. A line was formed for him, fenced on both sides by a row of beauties eager to catch a glance of the new Chief Magistrate, who repaid their welcoming smiles with his accustomed gallantry of demeanor. He staid but a few moments, and visited, I believe, the other balls given in his honor. The foreign ministers and secretaries, with their court dresses, and some officers of our navy in their uniforms, added much, by their appearance, to the brilliancy of the scene.

WASHINGTON Tuesday Evening.

A scene of unusual excitement, which led to the preliminaries to a duel between two members of Congress, took place in the Senate to-day during the prolonged debate relative to taking away the printing of that body from Blair and Rives. For the last six years, as is well known, the Globe has assailed Mr. Clay with a bitterness and asperity, which have rarely been paralleled; and yesterday the distinguished Senator from Kentucky took occasion to pay off the long arrears of vengeance and punishment with compound interest. His descent upon the editor of the Globe was withering and crushing. The scorn, contempt and vehemence of his denunciation were overwhelming. It was a process of pulverization, which excited the resentment of some and the hearty acquiescence of others. He denounced Blair as the infamous conductor of an infamous sheet—as a daily libeller, and a mass of reeking putridity, offensive to the very air.

Mr. King, of Alabama, who from his lady-like manners has long been known by the soubriquet of Miss Nancy, took up the cudgels this morning in behalf of his friend Blair, and remarked, substantially, that the editor of the Globe was no more infamous than Mr. Clay, and that his private character would rise in comparison with that of the Kentucky Senator. Mr. Clay rose under strong excitement, and, after alluding to the indignities to which he and others had been subjected for a series of years by the press which he had denounced, he ended by declaring the remarks of Mr. King "entirely untrue, unjust and cowardly."

Hereupon the Senator from Alabama rose and remarked, in a very significant manner, that he had nothing to say in that place. He then, with some ostentation, drew forth a sheet, went through the pantomime of penning a challenge—called to Dr. Linn, of Missouri, and, in a very mysterious manner, withdrew arm in arm with him from the hall. Every one understood of course that the impression meant to be conveyed was, that a challenge was in the wind. In about ten minutes Dr. Linn returned, looking quite grave, and as soon as the Senate adjourned, Mr. Clay formally received a challenge and as formally accepted it.

But if Mr. King was really anxious for a fight, why the deuce did he proclaim it to the world, when he must have known that the consequence must necessarily be the arrest of the parties? So it turned out. Mr. King was arrested quite as speedily as he could have desired, and obliged to give bonds that he would keep the peace. Mr. Clay was also confronted by the Marshall, as he was coming down the avenue with Mr. Preston, and released on his parole.

A thousand rumors touching this affair are afloat, so that it is rather difficult to arrive at the true state of the case. There will be no fight—thanks to the prudence and forethought of Mr. King, in allowing the public to get wind of his intentions.

Nothing farther is known in regard to the Collectorship of New-York. The friends of Mess. Wetmore and Curtis are still active in behalf of each, and it is feared by some that a third candidate will step in to reap the advantages of the contest.

The office-seekers still hang on. They waylay the poor President in his sunrise walks—hedge him at every turning, and make interest with his barber to allow them to approach him while undergoing the operation of shaving. Is it not too bad?

The Supreme Court gave their opinion to-day in the Amistad case. It was in favor of the liberation of the slaves.

POWHATAN—A metrical Romance in Seven Cantos. By SEBA SMITH.—This is the title of a new and original work by an American author, who already stands so high in the estimation of the public, that we have but to mention his name to insure a favorable attention. His new work is in the press of Harper & Brothers, and will be published in the course of the present month. The language is at once simple and poetical; the versification, in its various measures is extremely musical; and the story is conducted in a manner to give to the work the interest of a skilfully constructed romance.

We shall indeed despair of poetry's ever being profitable to its cultivators, if "Powhatan" does not find numerous admirers who are willing to exchange their dross of money for its fine gold of thought. The notes to the poem indicate much research into the history and habits of the aborigines of our country, and give a sterling historical value to the work, which ought alone to establish its claims to a high rank in our American literature.

The reader will call to mind, that Mr. Seba Smith was the originator of those famous specimens of humor and talent known as the Jack Downing Letters; the present production proves that he, like the celebrated English author, Thomas Hood, has a fancy quite as express and remarkable as his wit.

§3—The Courier and Enquirer does not approve of our article entitled "A Bomb-Shell for the Capitol," and is of opinion that "the vision of the writer who does not see the wide difference in the two cases, (namely, those of General Jackson and General Harrison, in the appointment of members of Congress to office,) must be obstructed by some member of Congress standing between him and office." Now, as we are not among those editors who are applicants for office, and are not influenced in the slightest degree in our editorial course by the hope of reward, we deny the soft impeachment. When a man has his back turned on office, he cares very little how many aspirants "stand between;" though if his face be that way, intervening objects, in the shape of members of Congress, are apt to "obstruct his vision."

§3—A writer in the Evening Post suggests that all legal actions in cases of debt to a small amount—say under two hundred dollars—should be abolished.

Indeed, he would abolish all actions on simple contract debts, excepting perhaps claims for wages, and what are held in law as executory contracts. From the present, he confines the question only to debts of small amount. What would be the effect of such a measure?

Its benefits would soon make themselves felt by creditors, debtors and the community.

As to the former, it would teach them to rely upon their own sagacity and prudence, rather than upon courts of justice and penalties. They would look about them before they trusted any man, to ascertain the extent of his property, his habits of business, and the worth of his character. No indolent or vicious person, no profligate spendthrift, no rogue, in short, no one whose reputation for honesty did not vouch for his responsibility, would be permitted to share their favors. They would first make sure of their man, before they would allow him accumulate indebtedness upon their books. They would have substantial pledges of security, either in the known value of his possessions, or in the prosperity of his business and his industry and thrift,—or not grant him credit. In this way all their debts would be good debts, and exhibit of their accounts would be nearly equivalent to an exhibit of ready money.

§3—THE KNICKERBOCKER for March is another capital number of this popular Magazine, containing twenty-eight original papers, besides literary notices, etc. We are glad to learn that the Knickerbocker is steadily and rapidly increasing in its circulation.

THE INAUGURATION.

Disappointed in receiving a letter from a correspondent at Washington, who had positively engaged to furnish us with a full account of President Harrison's Inauguration, we lay before our readers the account of the National Intelligencer, shorn of its superfluities.

The consummation of the great political contest which terminated in the election of General Harrison as President of the United States, took place on the fourth of March, by the inauguration of the President at the Capitol, preceded by the installation of the Vice-President, in the presence of an immense multitude of citizens, who had travelled from all parts of the Union to witness the imposing and interesting solemnities of the occasion.

Early in the morning, long before sun-rise, the shrill whistle of the Cars, and the tramping of feet along Pennsylvania avenue toward the hotels and boarding-houses, gave notice that our number of visitors was greatly increasing, and that the auspicious day of the Inauguration had arrived. The morning broke somewhat cloudily, and the horizon seemed rather to betoken snow or rain. At sunrise a salute of twenty-six guns was fired from the Mall. Soon after the firing of these guns, the entire body, apparently, of our citizens and numerous visitors, roused from their slumbers, thronged the Pennsylvania avenue and our principal streets, and gave to them a very animated and lively appearance; the throng continuing to increase until eight o'clock, when the various delegations, military companies, Tippecanoe clubs, associations, and citizens assembled at their respective posts.

Soon after ten o'clock the procession moved from the head of Four-and-a-half street; when a salute of three guns announced their march toward the quarters of the President elect. Having there received Gen. HARRISON, attended by his personal friends, the procession moved on from the quarters of the President elect, to the south gate of the eastern yard of the capitol, exactly as laid down in the programme.

The scene was highly interesting and imposing. The ladies every where, from the windows on each side the avenue, waved their handkerchiefs or hands in token of their kind feelings, and Gen. HARRISON returned their smiles and greetings with repeated bows.

The enthusiastic cheers of the citizens who moved in the procession were, with equal enthusiasm, responded to by thousands of citizen spectators, who lined Pennsylvania avenue, or appeared at the side windows, in the numerous balconies, on the tops of houses, or on other elevated stands. At the head of the procession was the chief marshal, who was mounted on a fine horse, suitably caparisoned; as also were his two aids.

After the officers and soldiers who fought under General Harrison came mounted on a white charger, and accompanied by his suite of personal friends.

On his right were seven citizen marshals; on his left were the Marshals of the District of Columbia and his four Aids.

The approaches to the Capitol presented a scene to gratify the eye of a painter. The thronging crowds, the groups, the solitary foot-passenger—and then the stately coach, with its freight of fashion and beauty—all eager, all animated, all in conversation, and some in song—all pressing onward toward one central point. Here might be seen a little fellow of seven or eight, his chubby cheeks rosy with joy, his bright eye sparkling with the bustle and gladness of so novel a scene. There was a group of black laborers, tricked out in all their Sunday finery, with saucer eyes, staring at the bright figures which passed them, or gazing at the horse of some young apprentice, carolling along the Avenue, at once to the glory and manifest danger of his rider. There hurried along a marshal of the day, with his rose of purple, and his yellow scarf, conscious, apparently, of the dignity of his station. Here strode on some military officers, glittering in blue and gold. The Ladies, too, (God bless them!) the ladies shared, fully, in the excitement of the hour; their eyes glancing, their cheeks glowing, and their tongues (for ladies have such things) were in rapid and harmonious motion. Every thing was in its best bib and tucker.

In the Senate Chamber, though reserved for the privileged persons, there was a crowd at an early hour. Long, long before any thing official was to be seen or heard, the Ladies' Circular Gallery on the one hand, and the Gentleman's Gallery on the other, were filled to overflowing. What eager looks, what rich and lustrous shawls, what waving handkerchiefs, what fluttering fans were there to be seen! Nods of recognition, smiles of pleasure, peering looks of eager curiosity every where met the eye. When some full-uniformed officer of the Army or Navy entered the Hall, with his straw-colored plumes and his massive epaulettes, what a craning out of snowy necks, what an exchange of inquiries, what looks of awakened interest pervaded the circle! Scott and Gaines, Macomb, and Jones, and Wool, presented a brilliant group, while on the opposite side might be seen the nominated members of the new Cabinet.

The Senate (convened by the President in Extra Session) having been called to order by the Secretary, the oath of office was, by order of the Senate, administered by Mr. Clay to Mr. King, of Alabama, (on his re-election for a new term,) who was then unanimously re-elected President pro tempore of that body.

Mr. King thereupon took the Chair of the Senate.

The Diplomatic Corps now entered the Hall, and assumed the seats provided for them in front and on the left of the Chair. A most brilliant appearance they made, decorated, as they were, not only with the insignia of their various orders, but half covered with the richest embroidery in silver and in gold.

On the opposite side of the Chair appeared, soon after, in the strongest contrast, the array of the Judges of the Supreme Court, in their black robes, with their grave, intellectual, reflecting countenances.

The late Vice President and the Vice President elect became the next objects of notice. They advanced together to the steps of the President's chair, when Mr. Tyler, having been presented to the Presiding Officer, took the oath of office, and then ascending to the chair, which had been vacated for his reception by Mr. King, delivered an address to the Senate of moderate length.

The new Senators were then successively sworn in, and took their seats.

At twenty minutes past 12 o'clock, the warning note was heard from the table of the Vice President, when General Harrison entered and took the seat prepared for him in front of the Secretary's table. He looked cheerful but composed: his bodily health was manifestly perfect: there was an alertness in his movement which is quite astonishing, considering his advanced age, the multiplied hardships through which his frame has passed, and the fatigues he has lately undergone.

After he had retained his seat for a few minutes, preparations were made for forming the line of procession to the platform prepared for the ceremony of the Inauguration, erected over the front steps of the portico of the east front of the Capitol.

On the platform, seats had been provided for the President and the Chief Justice, who were placed immediately in front. On their right, seats were assigned to the Diplomatic Corps. Behind sat Members of both Houses of Congress, officers of the Army and Navy, and many distinguished characters now assembled in the city, intermingled with a great company of ladies, who occupied not only the steps in the rear of the platform, but both the broad abutments of stone which support the steps on either side.

But the sight which attracted and arrested and filled the eye of all those who were fortunate enough to get a favorable post of observation from which to witness the scene was THE PEOPLE. There they stood, and had stood for hours, in a solid, dense mass, variously estimated to contain (in the space before the Capitol and extending back some distance into the open square) from thirty to fifty, and even sixty thousand.

While patiently waiting for the arrival of the President, this mass of heads resembled some placid lake, not in a perfect calm, but gently rippled by a passing breeze, its waters in perpetual but gentle motion; but the instant he was seen advancing from the Capitol, it suddenly resembled that same lake when a blast from the mountain has descended upon it, and thrown it into tumultuous agitation.

When the uproar had subsided, it was succeeded by the deep stillness of expectation, and the new President forthwith proceeded to read, in accents loud and clear, his Address to the Nation. In its delivery the voice of General Harrison never flagged, but to the end retained its full and commanding tone.

Previous to delivering the closing sentences of the Address, the oath of office, tendered by the Chief Justice, was taken by the President, in tones loud, distinct and solemn, manifesting a deep and deep impression of the importance of the act; after which the President pronounced the remaining passage of his Address.

The pealing cannon then announced to the country that it had a new Chief Magistrate. The procession was again formed, and, setting out from the Capitol, proceeded along Pennsylvania Avenue to the mansion of the President.

Nearly the whole throng of visitors accompanied the President to his new abode, and as many as possible entered and paid their personal respects to him. The whole building, however, could hardly contain a fortieth part of them; so that very many were unable to obtain admission at all.

In the evening the several ball-rooms and places of amusement were filled with crowds of gentlemen and ladies attracted to this city by the novelty and interest of the great occasion. In the course of the evening the President of the United States paid a short visit to each of the Assemblies held in honor of the Inauguration.

The end of the day was marked, as its progress from the early morning hour had been, by quiet and order.

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

TUESDAY, March 4, 1841.

The Senate convened in pursuance of notice from the President of the United States.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, having been sworn in upon his appearing upon re-election to a new term, was then elected President pro tem. of the Senate.

Several other of the old members of the Senate were sworn in upon re-election.

The following entirely new members attended, were qualified, and took their seats, viz.

From Maine, the Hon. GEORGE EVANS.
From Illinois, the Hon. SAMUEL McROBERTS.
From Rhode Island, the Hon. JAMES F. SIMMONS.
From Michigan, the Hon. WILLIAM WOODBRIDGE.
From New Jersey, the Hon. JACOB W. MILLER.
From Louisiana, the Hon. ALEXANDER BARROW.
From New Hampshire, the Hon. LEVI WOODBURY.
From Georgia, the Hon. JOHN McPHERSON BERRIEN.
From Kentucky, the Hon. JAMES T. MOREHEAD.

The VICE PRESIDENT having taken the oath of office, and assumed his place as President of the Senate, delivered the following address:

SENATORS: Called by the People of the United States to preside over your deliberations, I cannot withhold the expression of the high estimate I place on the honor which they have conferred on me. To occupy the seat which has been filled and adorned—to say nothing of my more immediate predecessors—by an ADAMS, a JEFFERSON, a GERRY, a CLINTON, and a TOMPKINS, names that, although belonging to the dead, still live in the recollection of a grateful country, is an honor of which any man would have just cause to be proud. But this honor is greatly augmented by the consideration of the true character of this body—by the high order of moral and intellectual power which has distinguished it in all past time, and which still distinguishes it—by the dignity which has, for the most part, marked its proceedings, and, above all, by the important duties which have devolved upon it under the constitution. Here are to be found the immediate representatives of the States, by whose sovereign will the Government has been spoken into existence. Here exists that perfect equality among the members of this Confederacy, which gives to the smallest State in the Union a voice as potential as that of the largest. To this body is committed, in an eminent degree, the trust of guarding and protecting the institutions handed down to us from our fathers, as well against the waves of popular and rash impulses on the one hand, as against attempts at Executive encroachment on the other.

It may properly be regarded as holding the balance in which are weighed the powers conceded to this Government and the rights reserved to the States and to the People. It is its province to concede what has been granted—to withhold what has been denied, thus in all its features exhibiting a true type of the glorious Confederacy under which it is our happiness to live. Should the spirit of Faction—that destructive spirit which recklessly walks over prostrate rights, and tramples laws and constitutions in the dust—ever find an abiding place within this Hall, then indeed will a sentence of condemnation be issued against the peace and happiness of this people, and their political institutions be made to topple to their foundations. But while this body shall continue to be what by its framers it was designed to be, deliberative in its character, unbiased in its course, and independent in its action, then may Liberty be regarded as entrenched in safety behind the sacred ramparts of the Constitution.

While I occupy this chair, Senators, I shall have frequent occasion to invoke your indulgence for my defects, and your charity for my errors. I am but little skilled in Parliamentary law, and have been unused to preside over deliberative assemblies. All that I can urge in excuse of my defects is, that I bring with me to this chair an earnest wish to discharge properly its duties, and a fixed determination to preside over your deliberations with entire impartiality.

PRESENTATION OF FOREIGN MINISTERS.

The members of the Diplomatic Body, now in Washington, and accredited to the Government of the United States, were, as we learn from the National Intelligencer, received by the President on Tuesday at 2 o'clock. Mr. Fox, the British Minister, on being presented by the Secretary of State, made to the President the following address:

SIR: I have the honor to address you in the name of the Diplomatic Body accredited to the United States of America. We hasten, sir, to congratulate you upon your accession to the high office of President of this Republic, which the confidence of your fellow-citizens has conferred upon you. We speak the true sentiments of our respective Governments and countries, in offering this testimony of regard and respect for your person and for your station. We rejoice, sir, to have heard from your own lips, in your Inaugural Address, the declaration of a virtuous desire to promote the relations of national friendship and peace between the United States and Foreign Powers; and we are happy to recognize, in your personal character and qualities, the strongest assurance that the efforts of your Government will be faithfully directed to accomplish so wise and noble a purpose.

To this address the President of the United States made the following reply:

SIR: I receive with great pleasure the congratulations you have been pleased to offer me in the name of the distinguished Diplomatic Body now present, the Representatives of the most powerful and polished nations with whom the Republic which has honored me with the office of its Chief Magistrate, has the most intimate relations—relations which I trust no sinister event will, for ages, interrupt.

The sentiments contained in my late address to my Fellow-Citizens, and to which you have been pleased to advert, are those which will continue to govern my conduct through the whole course of my administration. Lately one of the People, the undisputed sovereigns of the country, and coming immediately from amongst them, I am enabled, with confidence, to say that in thus acting I shall be sustained by their undivided approbation.

I beg leave to add, sir, that both from duty and inclination I shall omit nothing in my power to contribute to your own personal happiness and that of the friends whom, on this occasion, you represent, as long as you may continue amongst us.

The other Ministers, with their Secretaries, and the persons attached to their respective Missions, were then successively presented to the President. The Minister of Russia, we learn, was prevented from being present, by indisposition, which, we are happy to be able to say, is not serious.

Among other questions which failed of being decided in Congress at the last Session, was the great fundamental question of the expediency of establishing a uniform System of Bankruptcy, such as was in the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution. It failed for want of time to mature a bill for the purpose. Whether it would not have failed, under any circumstances, (as the Senate was then constituted,) is, thinks the National Intelligencer, a matter of great doubt.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.—Mr. Legrand's bill to abolish imprisonment for debt, which passed the Maryland House of Delegates by a handsome majority, has been put to death in the Senate; and this barbarous, unjust, inhuman, and impolitic practice still stains the character of our state, and opposes its baleful influence against the business interests of Baltimore, says the Sun.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.—We are highly gratified in witnessing the steadiness with which the general government keep pace with the liberal and philanthropic course of most of the states with regard to abolishing of imprisonment for debt.

It is to be hoped, that all will join in sweeping this relic of barbarism from the land. It is now in the power of each state, not only to put an end to imprisonment for debt, within its own sole jurisdiction; but also in all cases where the Federal courts have concurrent or sole jurisdiction within its limits.—[Louisville Public Advertiser.]

A woman's courage is always the courage of the mind—the highest description of valor of which the human soul is capable.

AWFUL CATASTROPHE.

THE STEAMBOAT CREOLE BURNED—LOSS OF MANY LIVES, AND GREAT DESTRUCTION OF PROPERTY.

The steamboat Creole, Captain Dalman, one of the Red River packets, on her passage from Natchitoches to New Orleans, with a cargo of upwards of 1000 bales of cotton, boxes of specie, bundles of bank notes, merchandize, &c., came out of Red River at the grey of dawn on Monday morning. When about twelve miles below, she was discovered to be on fire, and a general alarm was given. The passengers, more than sixty in number, and consisting of men, women, and children, were all in their berths at the time. The fire commenced at the after part of the boat, the tiller ropes were immediately severed, and the confusion, consternation and panic which ensued defies description. Amid the raging of the flames, the engine continued working, and drove the boat directly against the shore. Here four persons leaped off and escaped. Rebounding, as it appeared, she altered her course, and running near a mile and a half, brought up against the bank on the opposite side of the river.

In the mean time, and while the Creole was crossing the river, many of the passengers, and some of the crew, threw over bales of cotton on which they embarked. Some, missing their aim in jumping, or their balance afterwards, were precipitated into the stream and drowned. Many remained on board till she reached the opposite shore, when they leaped off. A few were fortunate enough to reach the land, but the greater part plunged into the water, and it is believed of these nearly all were rescued. The present estimate is that about TWELVE human beings lost their lives by the catastrophe. Of the 20 or 30 unaccounted for it is hoped most of them floated off on cotton bales and may have been picked up by steamboats and other crafts. There was scarcely an article saved. The passengers, male and female, with scarcely an exception, escaped with barely what they slept in. The proverbial hospitality and kindness of the inhabitants of the neighborhood relieved their pressing necessities, and enabled them to reach the city.

The New Orleans Commercial Bulletin, in giving place to the above, remarks, among other things—

The present calamity should be a warning to the public. Cotton boats, from the nature of their cargo, are extremely liable to accidents of the kind. The only safety of passengers is in the unceasing watchfulness and wise precaution of those who have the management of the vessel. We do not know that blame attaches to any particular officer in the present instance, but where accidents so fearful and devastating in their character occur, public opinion is prone to ascribe the disaster to the negligence of those having the vessel in charge.

For our own part, we have little desire to comment on this disaster at all: partly because we have formerly said all that can be said on similar occasions, and partly because such comments are wasted words in the public ear. The occurrence—or we should rather say the constant recurrence, of steam boat disasters on the Mississippi has ceased to attract much attention, unless the damage to life and property exceeds a certain average: some fifteen to twenty lives lost and a few hundred thousand dollars of property destroyed do not amount to a "dreadful catastrophe" by any means: it is a thing of every-day occurrence. The heart sickens, the hand trembles and the cheek grows pale at the contemplation of such facts.

We certainly do wonder that experience is of no value to steamboat navigators and passengers. We wonder that the engine of a burning boat is not always stopped. We wonder that passengers are not provided with life-preservers. But we forbear. This disaster has occurred, and, so far as the sufferers are concerned, suggestions as to what might have been, are in vain—and our daily experience goes to prove, that they are equally vain for the government of those who are still destined to suffer from similar catastrophes in future.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT.

Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, to be Secretary of State.

Thomas Ewing, of Ohio, to be Secretary of the Treasury.

John Bell, of Tennessee, to be Secretary of War.

George E. Badger, of North Carolina, to be Secretary of the Navy.

John J. Crittenden, of Kentucky, to be Attorney General.

Francis Granger, of New-York, to be Postmaster General.

SUDDEN DEATH.—At the large Ball, given in Portland in the Exchange Hall, before the dancing had begun, Mr William Parker having led his partner to the floor for the purpose of taking part in the first dance, fell suddenly to the floor, and was carried out of the room. A surgeon was immediately called, and he was found lifeless. His death was occasioned by an organic disease of the heart. The appalling event was not generally known in the hall, and the entertainments of the evening were not interrupted.

RESIGNATION OF SENATOR TOMPKINS.—The Hon. Minthorne Tompkins, Senator from this District, has forwarded his resignation to Albany. The reason that has urged him to this course, was his entire inability to attend to his official duties, in consequence of private business, which required his time and attention.

ILLINOIS.—About twenty million bushels of Corn were produced in Illinois last year. There were also produced 385,963 lbs. of tobacco, 28,121 lbs. rice, 194,191 lbs. cotton, and 323,296 lbs. sugar.

THE FARTH OF INDIANA.—The Legislature of Indian has levied a direct tax to meet the interest on their State Debt.

Patchwork.

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

The days of old were days of might,
In forms of greatness moulded;
And flowers of Heaven grew on the earth,
Within the Church unfolded;
For grace fell fast as summer dew,
And Saints to giant stature grew.

But, one by one, the gifts are gone
That in the Church resided,
And gone the Spirit's living light
That on her walls abided,
When by our shrines He came to dwell
In power and presence visible.

A blight hath past upon the Church,
Her summer hath departed,
The chill of age is on her sons,
The cold, and fearful-hearted;
And sad, amid neglect and scorn,
Our Mother sits and weeps forlorn.

Narrow and narrower still each year
The holy circle groweth;
And what the end of all shall be
Nor man nor angel knoweth:
And so we wait and watch in fear;—
It may be that the Lord is near!

Q.—The following capital jeu d'esprit is taken from the Post. It is reported that Brower and Homan never ride in their own omnibuses, through fear of breaking their necks. "No blame whatever is attached to the drivers."

THE RACES.—Mr. Editor: Will you please announce to your readers, that in consequence of the storm, the racing between the omnibuses in Broadway, is suspended until further notice. Thus far it is thought that Brower's line will take the cup, but Homan comes hard upon him. On Thursday last the latter succeeded in three out of five trials.

P. S.—The gentleman whose neck was broken on Monday is recovering as fast as can be expected. His gig, which was dashed to pieces, continues in the same state.

Q.—The life of every man, great or humble, happy or miserable, has its Night and its Morning. The meanest creature that crawls the earth, provided the soul of a man is not altogether extinguished in him, is still seen groping toward some light out of whatever darkness may surround him.

CANADA STEAM FRIGATE.—The Sackett's Harbor Journal states that a steam frigate of one thousand tons burthen is under contract to be built for the Colonial Government, at Kingston, Canada. The construction of such a vessel on Lake Ontario, should excite the immediate attention of our government, either to inquire the cause for such a movement, on the part of our frontier neighbors, or to build a ship of similar tonnage.

Q.—The Attorney General of Louisiana has instituted proceedings against the parties concerned in the late fatal duel at New Orleans. A few convictions for murder, and this relic of barbarous jurisprudence which fashion, set by a few silly actions of royalty, afterwards made the text of honor, will follow the age of chivalry, as it should have done centuries ago.

Q.—WILLIAM S. ARCHER, Whig, has been elected a Senator of the United States from the State of Virginia, for six years from last Thursday, to succeed Mr. Roane, whose term has expired.

Q.—At the Charter Election in Rochester, which took place on the 2d inst. the Whigs elected their Mayor by a majority of 224, and the Democrats elected supervisors in three wards out of five. The Whigs have elected Aldermen in three of the five wards.

Q.—At the recent Charter Election in Ithica the entire Whig ticket was elected. Last year the result was exactly the reverse of this.

BUFFALO CHARTER ELECTION.—Isaac R. Harrington is elected Mayor, and John D. Harty, Justice. The election was not contested on political grounds, both candidates for Mayor being Whigs, though the Democrats generally supported Harrington. The Council is divided as during the past year—7 Whigs, 3 Democrats.

COMMON SCHOOLS.—A Bill reported from the Committee on Colleges, Common Schools, &c. to the Assembly of this State which has been read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole, and made the special order for last Friday, contains a section to this purport: That a school for colored children may be established in any city or town in the State, with the approbation of the commissioners, and such school is put upon the same footing with the other common schools, as to public money, teachers, &c.

PROSPECTIVE IMPEACHMENT.—The Pottsville (Pa.) Miner's Journal says, numerous petitions are in circulation in various parts of the State, to have the Governor impeached for his gross prostitution of the pardoning power; and it is possible that action may be taken upon it at the present session of the Legislature.

Q.—The Whig Editorial Dinner, of which notice was given a few days ago, took place on Friday evening of last week. Thirty-seven gentlemen sat down. W. W. Seaton, Esq., of the National Intelligencer, and Wm. L. Stone, Esq. of the New York Commercial Advertiser, acted as Presidents. A number of spirited toasts were given, and many eloquent speeches made. The dinner and wines were of the first order; and the whole affair passed off in the most delightful manner.

SMALL BILLS.—The bill to repeal so much of the law of last session of the Ohio Legislature as prohibits the banks from issuing notes of less denomination than five dollars, passed the House of Representatives of that State on Monday, by a vote of 38 to 17.

Q.—The Rev. George Cookman, chaplain to the Senate of the United States, has been appointed a delegate from the American Bible Society, to represent that body at the next anniversary of the British and Foreign Bible Society, in May next.

Q.—A bill to preserve the purity of elections has passed the Senate of Ohio, by an almost unanimous vote, both parties cordially uniting upon it.

Capt. Tatnall has been appointed to the command of the Fairfield sloop of war, now at the navy yard.

EMIGRANTS.—A report made to Congress by the State Department, shows, from returns not entirely complete, that 115,206 persons came into the United States by sea during the year 1840.

This number, however, includes such of our own citizens as returned during the year from abroad.

Q.—The Officers of the NAVY and MARINE CORPS now in Washington waited upon the Secretary of the Navy Department on Monday, at 11 o'clock, to pay their respects to him, and were then, by appointment, presented to the President of the United States.

Q.—We learn from the Providence Journal that it is in contemplation to run a day line from New-York to Boston, the boat from New-York to land passengers at Stonington, and then proceed to Newport. The whole trip will be accomplished by daylight.

Q.—Numerous Temperance Societies are forming in Wisconsin Territory, and the papers suggest that the present year will witness a vast improvement among its inhabitants.

Q.—The government express, with the Inaugural Address of the President, which left Washington on the 4th, at seventeen minutes past 12 M. arrived at the New York City post office, at 45 minutes past 10 P. M.—making precisely 10 hours and 28 minutes, from city to city; the shortest period it is believed that it has ever been performed in—the average running being rather more than 22 miles an hour.

Q.—"Is Jonathan Dumpy here?" asked a raw country fellow, bolting into a city printing office. "I don't know such a man," replied the foreman. "Don't you know him?" exclaimed Jonathan, "why he courted my sister!"

DEATH OF MYRON HOLLEY.—We learn from the Rochester Daily Advertiser that Myron Holley died in that city on Thursday, in the 62d year of his age.

Q.—The cataract of Niagara is still falling—so is United States Bank stock; both will probably go into liquidation.

LOSS OF THE SCHOONER COL. CROCKETT.

CAPTAIN ORLANDO M. AUSTIN.

THE NEWBURGH JOURNAL of the 6th inst. gives an interesting narrative of the loss of this schooner. It seems that the vessel sailed from Newburgh on the 29th of June, 1839, on a trading voyage to the coast of Africa and the neighboring islands. In May last she entered Delago river and sailed up that stream nearly 100 miles, where the Captain opened a trade with the natives, and having succeeded in completing a valuable cargo of ivory, gold dust, ostrich feathers, shells, ebony wood, &c., was returning to the Bay with the intention of coming immediately home, when the vessel unfortunately grounded on a bar at the mouth of the river. On her way down the river, most of the crew were taken sick with the fever of the country, and the remainder were unable to haul off the vessel. The Captain and a part of the crew then attempted to proceed in a boat for assistance to the Portuguese settlement at English River, sixty miles from the place of the disaster, but they could not pass the surf. Mr. Reed, the second mate, then volunteered to accompany the Captain over land. It was unfortunately determined to go unarmed, so as to afford the natives less temptation for molesting them. At first they were treated kindly, but toward night, after travelling about 35 miles, the savages fell upon them with spears, killed the Captain, and wounded the mate so severely that they supposed him to be also dead.

Mr. Reed states that he presented his side and received most of the spears in his arm. One, however, struck him near his eye, and he for a time became senseless. On his recovery he observed the negroes cutting up and roasting and making their supper on the body of the captain. He lay still until night when the cannibals fell asleep—then crept into the bush and made his escape to the schooner, which he reached in a miserable condition. A few days after the return of Mr. Reed with the melancholy intelligence of the murder of Captain Austin, Mr. Daniel Wood, of Poughkeepsie, chief mate, Robert McTurk of this village, Robert Blainey and John Fowler, a colored seaman of this place, died of fever.

A part of the survivors, burying their dead companions in the sand of the beach, again took the yawl, and making another attempt, succeeded in getting through the surf and reaching the settlement on English River, from whence another boat was sent to the schooner, which returned with the sick that were left on board. The Governor subsequently despatched a boat to the wreck, with a crew of six or seven natives to save a portion of the cargo. It was loaded with some of the most valuable articles, but in returning the boat was swamped, and all on board perished.

Only three of the company survived. Charles Wilson, (stipped in a foreign port,) and David Baker, a lad, the only person living of the crew that left this village in 1839, went on board the English iron steamer Nemesis, and subsequently got on board of a Stonington whale ship, which arrived last week. Baker got back to Newburgh last Thursday. David Reed, the second mate, not having sufficiently recovered from his wounds and the fever, was left at Delago Bay.

Capt. Austin and Mr. Wood were highly esteemed by the citizens of Newburgh. They made several voyages in the ships Portland and Illinois, in the employ of the Newburgh Whaling Company. On their return from the last cruise of these ships, they projected the voyage, the melancholy results of which are above recorded, and which, until the schooner grounded at the bar of the river on her return had been very successful: her cargo at the time being worth twenty or thirty thousand dollars. They had experienced no sickness on the coast until a few days previous to that unfortunate occurrence. There was no insurance on the vessel or cargo, which was owned by the captain and Mr. Wood and two or three citizens of Newburgh.

63- The number of buildings in the compact part of the city of New-York, is 32,116; of which there are used as breweries, distilleries, tanneries, and the like, 46; as dwelling houses exclusively, 16,458; as dwellings with shops, 6,814; as stores and offices exclusively, 3,855; as taverns and private boarding houses, 736; as baths, 9; as factories, with engines equal to 1100 horse power, 74; as large factories, with labor-saving power, 172; as private stables, 2,603; as livery stables, 137; as dairy stables, 57; miscellaneous, 1,355.

The valuation of real estate in the city, as corrected by the Board of Supervisors in 1840, is $187,922,714; and of personal estate, $35,013,801. Aggregate, $222,936,515.

From 1810 to 1841, the Corporation has expended, for opening, widening, and improving streets, &c. $6,275,317.

The total amount derived from the city, by the state, from auction duties, from 1816 to 1840 inclusive, is $4,249,527.

The receipts into the general Treasury, during the year 1840, from the ordinary revenues of the city, from the negotiation of its stocks, and from the management of its "trust accounts," including the cash on hand at the commencement of the year, amounted to $8,004,610 12.

The amount of warrants drawn upon the Treasurer, for the ordinary expenses of the City government, the payment of its pre-existing debts, for its disbursements on the public works, and on its "trust accounts," including the warrants outstanding at the commencement of the year, amounted to $6,007,280 54; from which is to be deducted the warrants outstanding and unclaimed at the close of the year, amounting to $176,829 50. The result, showing that the actual amount paid by the Treasurer, during the year, to be $5,830,451 04; and the cash balance in the Treasury, January 1st, 1841, to be $174,179 08.

DISTRESSING.—On the night of the 24th ult., the store and dwelling of Reuben Wharton, in Liberty, Kentucky, was entirely consumed with all it contained, and Mr. Wharton perished in the flames, in endeavoring to save his money, books, &c., all of which were destroyed by the devouring element, and the balance of the family with difficulty made their escape, without even their clothing. While the ashes of a husband and father are mingling with those of all his earthly possessions, a widow and eight children are left, seven of whom are helpless females, to suffer under this awful calamity.

63- Massachusetts keeps 7000 volunteer militia under pay.

THE NEW WORLD

Is a Journal of Popular Literature, Criticism, Science and the Arts. It is supplied with articles by the first living writers of the United States and Great Britain. The first number was issued in October, 1839, and its circulation has steadily increased to this day, till it counts more readers than any other newspaper of its kind in the world. This is owing to the fact of its having given to the public, for a sum merely nominal and always in advance of any other print, the most popular works of the most approved authors. Within the brief period of its existence it has issued, with unexampled celerity, and often before they appeared in London, works by Sir E. L. Bulwer, Thomas Moore, Charles Dickens, (Boz) Sheridan Knowles, W. H. Ainsworth, D'Israeli, Sergeant Telford, Captain Murray, Henry Cockton, the author of Valentine Vox, Samuel Warren, author of Passages from the Diary of a late Physician, Mrs. Jameson, Miss Mitford, and others less known to fame though scarcely inferior in merit. Pieces original and selected, by writers of our own country, have also adorned its pages—Miss Sedgwick, Professor Longfellow, Washington Irving, Bryant, Holmes, Halleck, Sprague, Dana, Sargent, &c. &c.

A most attractive feature in the New World at present is a new story by Boz (Charles Dickens), author of Oliver Twist, &c. entitled "BARNABY RUDGE." It will be regularly continued from week to week; and, as it has just been commenced, back numbers can be supplied.

The New World is frequently embellished with costly and beautiful Engravings.

Though striving to say much in few words, it is quite vain to attempt setting forth half the attractions of the New World in this place. It will speak for itself. Specimen numbers can always be sent to any part of the country to post-paid orders.

We cannot forbear to add in conclusion that the New World studiously avoids all party politics, and is conducted on principles of the strictest neutrality. No profane or improper jest, no vulgar allusion, no irreverent sentiment is ever allowed to soil its pages. Reverence of God and respect to man govern it always. The rule of the Editor is never to publish a line which he would hesitate to read aloud in the hearing of virtuous and intelligent females. THUS THE NEW WORLD IS MADE AN UNEXCEPTIONABLE FAMILY NEWSPAPER, and is earnestly recommended to the regard of every friend of a pure literature, as well as of correct morals and the public good.

No subscriptions received without advance payment. Address J. WINCHESTER, New-York, March 10, 1841. 30 Ann st., New-York.

THE EVERGREEN.

A Monthly Magazine of New and Popular Tales and Poetry.

EDITED BY PARK BENJAMIN.

This Magazine was originally commenced in obedience to the wishes of many of the subscribers to the New World, who desired to have the valuable and interesting articles which that journal contained, in some form suitable for preservation. At that time the New World was published only in the larger or folio form. Since the Quarto has been commenced the Evergreen has been rendered less valuable—and it HAS THEREFORE BEEN DETERMINED TO GIVE IT A NEW AND ORIGINAL CHARACTER.

With the exception of those which are already in the course of publication, no continued stories, which are issued in the New World, will appear in the Evergreen. But we shall avail ourselves of our copious supplies of new works from England, to publish in the Evergreen those which the New World, spacious as it is, is unable to contain. In the March number appear the first parts of OLD ST. PAULS, a new romance by W. Harrison Ainsworth, author of Crichton, Rookwood, The Tower of London, &c., and GEORGE ST. GEORGE JULIAN, OR THE PRINCE, by Henry Cockton, Esq., author of Valentine Vox, Stanley Thorn, &c. These romances promise to be extremely interesting; they appear in London in weekly and monthly parts, and are given in the Evergreen soon after their receipt in this country; they will alone richly be worth the low sum demanded for this cheapest of the monthly periodicals.

This will be a change of matter and not of plan in the conduct of the Evergreen. It will be a repository of new articles and not simply a repetition of those appearing in another journal; but in all essential respects it will offer precisely the same claims as were set forth in its first prospectus.

LEVIATHAN NEW WORLD.

ANOTHER MAMMOTH SHEET.—We acknowledge the courtesy of the Editors of the "New World" in sending us their second mammoth sheet. This is as handsome in appearance as the other, while its pictorial embellishments are superior to those of the other. One of the most interesting is the representation (and an excellent one it is) of the exhumation of the remains of the Emperor Napoleon. This great sheet is a wonderful specimen of art, and will strike all with admiration. As for reading it, the best way to accomplish that is, according to the advice of the New York Commercial, to hang it upon a wall and at a little distance to read it through a spy glass.—[Richmond Compiler.

The mammoth "New World" is received. It is got up under the supervision of that accomplished "Columbus" of the newspaper press, Park Benjamin. He lays himself out without measure or stint, giving square feet of delightful reading, with "pictures to match," for only a York shilling. The "imp" at our elbow has just covered one side of a spacious room with this leviathan sheet, and since then he disappeared, doubtless to borrow a ladder to climb up to the top of its dizzy height.—[Philadelphia North American.

LEVIATHAN NEW WORLD.—We are indebted to the editors for a copy of this number, which is undoubtedly the largest specimen of a single sheet ever printed. As there are now two steamers a day, of the first class, from New-York, we can conceive of the possibility of transporting a sufficient number to supply the demand of the Yankees. It contains forty-four columns of editorial and well-selected reading matter, with a numerous array of fine wood engravings, among them Napoleon in his coffin as he appeared at the disinterment.—[Boston Am. Traveller.

THE GREAT LEVIATHAN, No. 2, of the New York "New World" was squeezed into our sanctum yesterday, and after repeated trials at a peep in order to get an idea of its immense proportions, and being as repeatedly defeated, we had the monster dragged out upon the flat—laid out to dry—and then stood with staring eyes, taking a good look at his majesty. And, oh! such a Leviathan! We lost our yard stick, and consequently could not take a correct measurement; but, supposed that it was about the size of a blanket. When any of our neighbor's barn-doors should unhinge, they will call at our office for the "Leviathan." It would serve admirable as a substitute.—[Columbia (Pa.) Spy.

THE NEW WORLD, a double sheet, containing all sorts of reading, and embellished with an abundance of wood cuts, is received by Taylor, No. 12 North street. It is such a good 'un.—[Baltimore Sun.

THE HARP OF ERIN.

Oh! still lies thy harp, dearest idle of the ocean!
 Its soft echoes sleep thy green mountains among;
 Where, where are thy bards, that with fondest devotion, Poured forth the sweet numbers that breathed through thy song!

Thy glory gone by, like the dream of ambition,
 Around thee a night dark and starless is cast!
 Now hushed are thy strains—as the voice of a vision,
 The dreamer scarce hears, ere he wakes—and 'tis past!

Oh! where, hapless Erin, is the light we saw shining
 On thy children, like fame o'er the warriors head?
 Those children enchained are in death-sleep reclining—
 That light was a sun-burst which dazzled and fled.

How proud were thy hopes when its lustre was glowing
 On the banner of Freedom then o'er thee unfurled;
 And how sweet were the notes from thy thousand harps flowing.

Whose tones were sent back by an echoing world.
 They fled like the dreams of life's beautiful morning,
 Those hopes—but still dimly in memory they glow;
 The rainbow that spanned thee, though bright, was the waning

Of the darkness and tempest that brood o'er thee now!
 My thoughts, like the bird that soars back to the bowers
 Where it first tried its pinions, though seas intervene,
 For ever return to those long faded hours,
 When thy hopes, like thy bosom, oh Erin! were green.

Yet mourn not, my soul! o'er the wide waste of waters,
 A star hath arisen, whose far-beaming ray
 Shall light up the smiles of thy desolate daughters,
 And the woes of thy sons disperse fleetly away.

O mourn then no more, though the night's dark and dreary,
 For see in the west beaming liberty's star:
 It's bright rays descend on the Shamrock so cheery,
 And thy harp, newly strung, shall send music afar.

No more shall thy white-bosomed maids be forsaken,
 No more through the cold world disconsolate roam;
 But Erin-maidens their voices awaken—
 Or Erin-go-bragh while their hearts are at home.

While the harp, on whose tones we have dwelt with emo-
 Univalled its soft strains of feeling shall draw; [tion,
 And then, as the pledge of our heart's true devotion,
 "We'll strike the sweet numbers of Erin-go-bragh."

THE LEGAL PROTECTION OF THE SENTIMENTS AND AFFECTIONS.

A Lecture,

Delivered before the Mechanics' Institute of New York,

BY E. P. HURLBUT, ESQ.

Man is endowed with certain propensities which impel him to a prompt and vigorous defence of his person and his rights; and in the absence of a superior protection he has always the right to defend himself. Laws for the protection of humanity emanate from man's superior nature, and therefore, whenever it is possible, they ought to furnish a full measure of protection, rather than leave any man to passionate and vindictive self-defence. The most perfect of human laws, and their most rigorous administration, will, however, always leave man exposed in society to aggression, which he may properly resist by force. The law cannot always shield his person from the ruffian's attack, although it might punish the aggressor after his mischiefs are perpetrated. It cannot secure his property from theft or embezzlement, although it may inflict penalties upon the offender. So that in the best ordered society man will have occasion to draw upon his combativeness and destructiveness, when these can avail, him to prevent injuries to his rights. One of the legitimate offices of these instincts is, the opposing of force as the means of preventing injury. If they go farther, either in or out of society, they offend the superior sentiments. Acting under the control of the moral powers, they work for defence, and not for vengeance. Taking into view the harmonious action of man's moral and intellectual, as well as his passionate nature, and giving the control to the former, man never could have had the right of vindictive self-redress.

Conscientiousness was ordained, under the enlightenment of the intellectual faculties, to determine between the accuser and the accused—between him who demanded and him who withheld right. From his very constitution, as we have seen, man must exist in society—where he can always have an appeal for justice to his impartial fellow-men. They immediately sympathize with the injured, and are impelled by their moral feelings to redress his wrongs. If in a moment of excitement he exceed the limit of defence, and take vengeance, he offends against the moral feelings of his brethren, and wounds his own superior sentiments, so that he feels the agony of remorse, after they regain the just supremacy of his mind. Self-redress, then, by way of taking vengeance upon the aggressor, is not a natural right—but a natural wrong; and man in society does but obey the true law of his nature when he looks to the social body for the redress of injuries. In the prevention of wrongs, then, the animal powers of the individual may be properly exerted, while in the redress of them the moral powers of the social body must have exclusive sway.

But benevolence, not less than justice, is all-pervading in human society, and dictates the benign sentiment of mercy and good will to all the sensitive creation. It disposes man to desire the prevention of offences, as it shrinks from their punishment, and looks in mercy even upon the vilest offender. It infuses a spirit of philanthropy in the legal code, tempers justice with mercy, and sheds a tear for the victim of the offended laws. It would not, nevertheless, defeat justice, but would prevent the occasion for its exercise; and, under its blessed influences, the social body is stimulated to make provision for the prevention of wrong, and to inflict punishment only as one means of prevention.

But such is the nature of man, that an offence to any of his rights so disturbs the serenity of his mind, and its harmonious action, and produces such a mingled excitement of both his sentiments and his passions, that unless the laws afford him redress, he will take it upon himself to obtain it, and he will oftentimes execute vengeance upon the offender; which is the product of conscientiousness, combativeness, and destructiveness, acting in combination. For in the act of self-redress, justice often arrays herself in a ruffian garb, and uses the assassin's weapons. Vengeance comes of enraged justice; and greater wrong may be done in the passionate redress of injuries, than in the perpetration by the first offender. But this wrong proceeds from the disturbed and inharmonious activity of man's innate faculties; and laws emanating from, and adapted to the harmony of his mental forces, must provide for the exclusion of so great an evil in human society. How shall this be done? By a legal recognition of every human right, and guaranteeing to each, as far as possible, a full and complete measure of protection. Humanity will forever cry aloud for the protection of her rights, and for the redress of injuries. And when human law fails to mete out justice to man, be not astonished if he take vengeance instead. Society claims the right to punish, in order to deter from crime; when it fails to punish, the aggrieved party will be inclined to supply the omission; but if while smarting under a sense of injury he act out this inclination, he will do that for which he himself will be punishable, and thus he will conceive himself to be the victim of three wrongs. The first comes from society, a wrong of omission in not protecting his infringed rights; the second, an actual wrong from the individual aggressor; and the third, the outrage of society, in punishing him for obtaining that redress for himself, which it had failed to afford him. He will conceive himself to be the victim of society, and not unlikely will be a perverse citizen ever after.

Let me illustrate this with a few examples. The law leaves the citizen perfectly unprotected from the rudest insult by simple speech. His truth, integrity, honor or courage, may be called to naught; the honor of his wife or daughter may be openly impeached by the rudest assailant; and thus his self-esteem, approbation, and feelings of domestic attachment may be wounded in the highest degree; yet the law leaves him to take care of himself. Combativeness and destructiveness, however, do not desert him, but rush to the aid of these wounded feelings, and inflict instantaneous personal chastisement upon the offender. An assault and battery is committed, and justice now removes the bandage from her eyes, and beholds this as the first wrong!

She declares that no mere words can justify a battery, and that the man beaten has an action for his damages against him who smote him—and moreover, that so much does the Law abhor bodily strife, and desire peace among men, that the battery is subject to further punishment as a misdemeanor, and that he who smote the rude and insolent accuser, must pay a fine to the state for the offence, and be imprisoned in a common jail for a period fixed by the same just law. How feels the prisoner now? He very naturally wants to inflict chastisement upon the blind goddess herself, conceiving that she has done him far them greatest injury in the case.

But let us suppose a far more serious case of wrong; that of a husband injured in the most sacred of the marital rights. He detects the destroyer of his peace, and kills him on the spot. This killing is pronounced manslaughter; for which the injured husband is condemned to the state prison at hard labor for a term of years. But suppose that he refrains from killing at the instant, and challenges the author of his ruin to mortal combat. The coward and villain takes the challenge to the police, and the injured husband is arrested for merely sending the challenge, and condemned to prison as a felon. But suppose the wrong-doer to accept the challenge; they go to the field, and the husband speeds the bullet to his heart—he dies, and in the eye of the law, he is a murdered man, and the broken-hearted husband is pronounced a wilful murderer, and expiates his offence upon the gallows! What ought he to have done? What only the law allowed him to do. He should have left his house with great equanimity of mind, as soon as he discovered the damning deed which stung him with the deepest agony; he should have abstained even from giving vent to his feelings by words, lest he should have used profane oaths—which the laws punish by a fine. He should have gone to a gentleman of the bar, coolly stated his case, and received for answer, that as there was no witness to prove the wrong, the law could afford no redress—but in case of a witness, then he could have his action and recover a COMPENSATION IN MONEY for this wrong! "Money—a world's wealth!" say—"an universe of worlds!" would he not exclaim—"I'll have none of it—I'll murder him and die, for life has ceased to be a blessing now!" And yet by our law, money atones for this deepest and darkest of domestic wrongs, and when the offender shall have paid the sum ordained, he may go about at noonday, serene and calm, as a gentleman and good citizen! Why mock the injured in such a case by treating this wrong, as one that can be atoned for by money! Retain this sort of redress, if you please, for that order of men who will stoop to receive it; but do not allow a wrong which destroys the happiness of a fellow being for life, to pass with lighter condemnation than the least offence to the right of property. Our laws punish certain injuries to the latter right as felonies. The stealing of property to the value of twenty-five dollars is an infamous crime, and punishable by imprisonment in a State prison for a term of years; and yet how slightly is man's happiness affected by the injury thus redressed?

We have statutes for the protection of animals from cruel and inhuman treatment, making it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment; while human affections are left exposed to the deepest wounds, and the wrong doer may walk abroad the companion and equal of judges and legislators, nay, may sit upon the bench himself, and be clothed with the holy ermine of justice, instead of being condemned to the cells of a prison, to wear a felon's garb.

The peace of families is also left entirely exposed to other acts of profligacy. The parent may find the honor of a daughter lost; and the law which took its origin in a barbarous age, and which recognized in this no other injury to the parent than the loss of the daughter's services, affords him a compensation in money for that loss; to which may now be added something more, if the jury please, for the wounded feelings of the parent. Against the form of the remedy the injured party first revolts, and next against the idea of a compensation in damages. These wanting all proper appreciation of the wrong, may perhaps be content with damages; but those whose sense of the injury is the keenest, scorn your legal remedy, and go unredressed by the law. In either event the wrong-doer escapes all degradation; and after having done a felon's wrong, walks forth a gentleman. If his deed were made a felony, he would not fall below his victim.

Mr. Chitty, in his learned and admirable work upon Medical Jurisprudence, notices a case of this character, where the defendant insultingly sent the £1,000 damages awarded by the jury to the injured father, by a livery servant, with his compliments, and that he would with pleasure pay him another £1000, if he would send him his second daughter. If this wretch had been condemned as a felon, what servant would have worn his livery, or delivered his bitter taunts! And yet society consents to harbor such a man in her bosom, while she condemns the petty swindler to the dungeons of a prison! Nay, more—if the injured father should take such vengeance upon him as his feelings should prompt, he would become a criminal himself, and forfeit his liberty or his life, for yielding to the impulses of his nature in vindicating his honor, and his happiness, where the law had failed to protect them.

If the social body leave any man unprotected in any of his rights, as to those rights and their vindication, he must be left to his natural remedies. I do not contend that a man unprotected has the right to execute vengeance upon the wrong-doer; but I insist that it is a known fact that a large portion of mankind will be prompted by their natural impulses to do so; and it becomes a grave question whether men in society, having neglected a due measure of protection, have acquired the right to punish the individual who resorts to self-redress. It seems to me the social body can only punish him who redresses a wrong by an act of vengeance, when they can point to the law, and say to the offender, "here was your redress; had you appealed to our laws, your rights would have been fully vindicated—but having chosen vengeance when justice was within your reach, we condemn you." The taking of vengeance is a moral offence, in the absence of any human law for the protection of rights; but I apprehend it is not an offence of which the social body can take any cognizance, but it must be left to the Creator's laws.

It would follow, then, that society, in order to acquire the right to punish an act of self-redress, must first have afforded a due measure of legal protection to the right, whose infringement occasioned the act of vengeance.

"As the state," says Vattel, "does not permit an individual to pursue, with arms in his hands, the usurper of his fortune, only because he may obtain justice from the magistrate; so if the sovereign will not allow him to draw his sword against him from whom he received an insult, he ought necessarily to take such measures, that the patience and obedience of the citizen insulted shall be no prejudice to him. The society cannot deprive a man of his natural right of making war against an aggressor, without furnishing him with other means of securing himself from the evil his enemy would do him, for in all those occasions which the public authority cannot lend us its assistance, we resume our primary right of natural self-defence."

About seven or eight years ago, a case of self-defence occurred in the central part of this state, under peculiar circumstances. Nathaniel Foster was indicted for the wilful murder of Peter Waters, an outlaw of the St. Regis tribe of Indians, and who occupied, as his hunting grounds, the forests in the northern part of Herkimer and Hamilton counties.

Foster was another Leatherstocking, passionately addicted to hunting, and who had left a cultivated farm in Herkimer county, in the care of his sons, and, with his wife alone, removed into the northern wilderness, and occupied a rude cabin some fifty miles from any settlement. The Indian and Foster, occupying the same hunting grounds, occasionally met in the course of their excursions in quest of game; and at times Foster was enabled to furnish the Indian with ammunition and stores of provisions for his comfort. This Foster was the more inclined to do, from a sense of insecurity, and fear that the Indian would take his life. For he was not only a savage, but one of fierce and malignant dispositions, which were rendered worse by intemperate habits. Foster was a celebrated shot with his rifle, he never missed his mark, and his success was always great as a huntsman. The Indian became jealous of him, and at length manifested open signs of hatred and malice. He came once near to the door of Foster's cabin, and called out for him.

Foster's wife opened the door, when she beheld the Indian with his rifle raised in an attitude to fire; but, seeing the woman instead of his intended victim, he went away. After this he openly threatened to execute his murderous purpose. Foster had attained to at least fifty-five years of age when this occurred, had always before lived in a well settled and agricultural district, and was esteemed a good citizen. He was rather distinguished for his kindness as a neighbor and his pride of character as a man. He knew that the laws ought to afford him protection, and accordingly he took a journey through the wilderness alone, went to the nearest settlement, and made complaint to a Justice of the Peace against the Indian, and declared that he considered his life in jeopardy. The magistrate feared to do his duty, saying that the Indian was a malignant fellow, and if he meddled with him it would be at the hazard of losing his own life. He therefore refused to afford Foster any protection. Foster returned to his lone cabin. In a short time afterward a party of men from Lewis county, three or four in number, came to Foster's to join him in a hunting and fishing excursion upon a lake in his vicinity, and while they were making their preparations the Indian came among them and rudely assailed Foster, threw him upon the ground, drew a knife and stabbed him in the arm; but was prevented by the interference of the party from doing further harm. As soon as he was taken off from Foster he said, "now I kill you, Foster," and went away. Foster knew not only the Indian character, but the particular dispositions of this individual, and he therefore knew that whenever the Indian saw him again, he would attempt to shoot him, and his own life depended upon the fact whether the Indian should see him first, and have time to take deadly aim before he should perceive him. He therefore concluded that his safety depended upon taking the Indian's life. He informed his party that he should not go with them, and they went off without him. He took down his rifle, withdrew the charge it contained, loaded it anew, put in two balls, and started in pursuit of the Indian. He found him at a distance of four or five miles from the place of the morning's encounter, in his bark canoe in the vicinity of the other men who formed the intended party that were at Foster's in the morning, and were in a canoe together.

A rustle was heard in the thicket on the shore. The fishing party looked eagerly thither. The Indian was appalled, knew his fate, and rowed eagerly toward the other boat. A moment more, and a rifle shot was heard—the Indian fell over his canoe dead—his heart pierced at its centre with two balls. Foster walked away from the smoke in the thicket, and afterward openly acknowledged that he killed the Indian.

He was arrested for wilful murder. Before the indictment was found, and while he was at large on bail, the public discussed his case a great deal, and many thought and told him he could not escape punishment, although they thought it a hard case. He nevertheless could not be induced to flee. He uniformly said to me that he supposed he was guilty of murder in the eye of the law, but that by the laws of God he was an innocent man. It came to my lot as junior counsel to open his defence to the jury, and in doing so endeavored to show them that Foster was entirely without the protection of the law. That it was true he was within the territorial jurisdiction of the State, and of the county where he was tried, but that the law afforded him no protection whatever; that he had a right to defend his life against any assailant; and that, as the enemy against whom he was defending was a savage, unknown to the law, who lurked about for revenge, and who never forgave a real or supposed injury, but took life at the first opportunity—that Foster was not bound to wait till his rifle flashed, or he was in the act of fulfilling his murderous intention—but if he was morally sure that the Indian intended to kill him at first sight after the morning's encounter, he had a right to follow him any distance, and at the first sight to take his life. I could take no other ground; the case of killing was quite clear, and that Foster was the man there was no reasonable doubt. By the law of the land this killing was wilful murder; and yet the public sentiment was in favor of Foster's entire acquittal—inasmuch that a verdict of guilty would have produced a popular demonstration, and perhaps an attempt to rescue the prisoner. So painful did the public prosecutor find his duty in presenting the case to the jury, that when summing up for the people he was wholly overpowered by his feelings, and wept like a child, giving utterance only to sobs at some times, while addressing the jury. After deliberating some two hours the jury pronounced a verdict of not guilty, and Foster was discharged out of custody to the great joy of the whole community. He yet lives—a vigorous and jolly woodsman, the best rifle shot in all the country, and scarcely showing any signs of decay. If he had been the original of old Balt, of "Greyslaer," the portraiture of his character by the writer of that admirable novel could scarcely have been made truer to the life.*

Wherever the social body neglects to protect the human sentiments and affections, it must leave the lacerated victim of another's wrongs to wreak his own vengeance upon the offender; and if assaults, duels and assassinations ensue, no statute can properly denounce its penalties upon the vindicator of his rights, and all that the courts can inquire into is, whether there was such a provocation as ordinarily produces the consequences which happened; if so, and such provocation was not punishable by law, then the law shall take no notice of the consequences! This would produce a dreadful state of society, but not a state much more to be dreaded, than one which allows the holiest sentiments and affections of man's nature to be wounded with impunity, the most flagrant wrongs to be unprevented and unpunished, and yet denounces the severest punishments upon the man, who, smarting under a sense of the deepest injury, takes vengeance upon the wrong-doer.

I pray you not to misconstrue my meaning. I am not the advocate of either of these conditions in society, but most heartily condemn both as an entire departure from the true rule of social organization.

My appeal is for humanity. I demand for it full and perfect protection by the laws of society; and I demand that the human sentiments and affections shall have a measure of protection commensurate with their dignity and importance to man's happiness; and I have only designed to point out the injustice of society, in neglecting a just and general protection to all the rights of man.

"Although it will be admitted," says Mr. Chitty, "that the true object of law ought to be security to individuals of the full enjoyment of those endowments with which the Almighty has blessed mankind; yet the English law is singularly defective in the protection of the natural passions and feelings from injuries. It in general interferes only where there has been a visible bodily injury, inflicted by force or poison, while it leaves almost entirely unprotected the whole class of the most malignant mental injuries and sufferings, unless in a few cases, where, by descending to fiction, it sordidly supposes some pecuniary loss, and sometimes under that mask, indirectly, and contrary to its own legal principle, affords compensation for wounded feelings. Thus a parent cannot in that character sue for an injury inflicted on his child, and on his own domestic happiness; nor can he punish the silent seducer of his daughter, occasioning his most agonizing mental sufferings, and her ruin, unless the facts will sustain the allegation that the daughter was a servant of the father, and that by reason of the seduction he lost the benefit of her services. Nor is there punishment for many verbal slanders, undermining the character of the person calumniated, and occasioning the most dangerous illness, or even death."

Mr. Chitty further notices that the killing of a person by fright or alarm is not a felonious murder, but at most a misdemeanor; and that in point of law it is not murder to work on the imagination so that death ensue, or to call the feelings into so strong an exercise as to produce a fatal malady; and he concludes that the British law is entirely defective in not punishing, corporeally, those who wilfully occasion injuries to the passions, emotions, affections, or feelings of another.

Many of you, doubtless, remember a most distressing case of suicide, by a young gentleman of this city, some two years ago, who rushed to the top of his house, which was three stories high, and precipitated himself thence upon the pavement below, thus occasioning his awful and instantaneous death. A few weeks before this most melancholy event he was in perfect health, mingling with his fellow-citizens, having their highest respect, and the attachment of many warm and devoted friends. His domestic character was a model of the most affectionate kindness and perfect devotion to the happiness of a mother (his only surviving parent) and his brothers and sisters. His charities were liberal; no worthy applicant for aid ever went away empty from his door. He was generous even to a fault. His integrity was of the highest order, and he preserved the most unsullied honor, it was his soul—his life. In fine, he was one of the noblest young men I have ever known, and was whose memory I shall always cherish to the latest hour

* This trial took place in the then Fifth Circuit of this State, before the Hon. Hiram Denio, then Circuit Judge; and I cannot refrain from expressing my conceptions of that gentleman's judicial character. I have never seen a more competent or upright judge upon the bench. During his brief but brilliant judicial career, (which was terminated by ill health,) he sometimes held an entire session without an exception being taken to his decisions. He despatched business without hurry, and was always kind and courteous, without the slightest relaxation of the proper rigor of a court of justice. His mind is of the first order; his brain of the largest size, well balanced, and rendered active by high cultivation and exercise. His charge to the jury, in the case referred to, was well worthy of imitation. He presented the evidence to the jury, with the arguments which had been and might be urged upon it, both for and against the prisoner, with such minuteness that not the slightest circumstance or inference which made for either side was omitted, and with such impartiality, that no one could have conjectured from his language or manner, whether he believed the prisoner to be innocent or guilty. He did not invade the true province of the jury, by a word or suggestion, nor even by a look; but left them to determine both the law and the fact, according to the spirit of our criminal code. He gave them all the liberal light of his own gifted mind, without its conclusions, its prejudices, or colorings, if any existed in it.

of my life. I would that it were divested of the story of his unhappy fate.

A few days before his melancholy death he called upon me, under great anxiety of mind, and stated to me, more as a friend than as his professional adviser, the details of a conspiracy formed to extort money from him, by several abandoned people in this city, one of whom had sought his acquaintance to ask charity, and who had received pecuniary relief at his hands.

The conspirators had a scurrilous paper in their interest, and a threat of a libellous publication had been made in its columns. This was his concern at the time of his visit to me. I inquired into the whole matter with great interest and anxiety. I know the truth of his case, and I know to a moral certainty that there was not a shadow of just foundation for the least censure upon his fair fame. I advised him to treat the conspirators with utter contempt, and to pay them not the least attention. He soon after received from some lawyer, who read the laws but to violate their spirit, and whose moral nature was attuned to the work of mischief, further intimation that the conspiracy was to be consummated by a suit at law. He brooded over this matter till sleep and rest forsook him. The scurrilous print came out with its brutal libel, and its victim fell beneath the stroke. When he next called upon me, which was the day after the publication, I think, his whole appearance was that of a maniac, and his wild exclamations, his intense mental suffering, amounting to the most dreadful agony, baffled description. Alas! I could not soothe his wounded spirit,—he was taken to his home, and when I inquired after him at the next opportunity, I learned his awful death. This man was murdered, and his murderers live unmolested by the law.

"If," says Mr. Chitty, "legislators had sufficiently considered the connection of mind with external objects, and that the miseries and sufferings of the mind may be infinitely greater than those of the body, adequate punishments would have been provided for many mental injuries, which at present can only be visited by the censure of mankind, or, at the most, by inadequate discretionary punishment, limited to fine and imprisonment."

The reflections of this profound jurist upon the British law, are equally applicable to our own. The same defects exist in our legal code; the most sacred rights of humanity cry out in vain for protection to either British or American laws. Nay, more; the legislatures of both countries have hitherto treated with derision and contempt, the petitions which have been presented to them upon the subject of laws for the protection of human sentiments and affections. There were presented to the legislature of this state, at the last session, sundry petitions from ladies in one or more of the counties, praying that the grossest violation of the marital rights, and the vilest infringement of the domestic peace might be punished as crimes. These grave legislators ill concealed their mirth at this outbreak of humanity. It was a capital joke, and made them merry for a season. If these ladies had presented a petition, praying for further protection of their wardrobes from theft, a bill for that purpose would have been passed by this gallant legislature. But as they sought for protection for domestic love and peace, for noble pride, and kind affections, for honor and happiness, these Solons derided the application. They could appreciate silks and laces, and yet deride the holiest sentiments of the being they adorned—"they could pity the plumage—and forget the dying bird."

Let us now examine more minutely some of the rights of man, arising from the sentiments and affections of his nature, with a view to the ascertainment of what is a proper measure of legal defence and vindication. And first—the marital rights. The sexes are born nearly equal in point of numbers, and this alone creates a natural necessity for their uniting in pairs. But it would go no farther; it would not determine the permanency of that union, but leave it to be dissolved at the mere option of either of the parties, upon the slightest occasion. The law of nature, however, has not only ordained the pairing of the sexes, but the permanency and sacred inviolability of the union. It is true that the instincts which lie at the foundation of it, are shared by man in common with all the animal creation; but in man these instincts are strengthened and consecrated by high and noble sentiments, which are wanting in animals; and we have seen that the most sacred rights emanate from these sentiments, and among the chief of these are the marital rights. Offspring result from the marriage union. Mankind have a natural love of offspring—heightened by holy hope, and just pride, and benevolent affections. The parents have to deal also with sensitive, rational, and moral beings in their children, whose fate is so connected with their own, as that they are bound to preserve inviolate that union which has called them into being, and whose continuance alone can promote their happiness. Man is denied his animal freedom in this regard; it is subject to his moral and superior nature, and it is well that it is so. Moreover, such is the nature of human affection, that a judicious attachment is strengthened by indulgence and time, so that a separation by death, even, is among the severest trials of the afflicted. If so great distress come from the act of Providence, to which man is disposed, by his reverence and awe, to submit with meek and pious endurance, what must he suffer, whose domestic affections are wounded by that worse deprivation, the moral death of the being whom only he loved? No sentiment of veneration and submission to the Creator's laws, now soothes his wounded spirit; but his pride, his honor, and his sense of justice are rudely lacerated, and his entire moral nature revolts at the wrong. Marriage is an institution of nature. The sacred exclusiveness of domestic love is demanded by the laws of the human mind, and hence the right to its inviolability. The human legislator cannot plead that he instituted the married state, and may therefore notice, or disregard its claims, as he shall choose. He is bound to regard it as the institution of nature, and to vindicate its rights by appropriate laws.

Consider next the wounds inflicted upon parental feelings. Philoprogenitiveness and Adhesiveness cling to the child. Benevolence showers blessings around it, and hope and pride look forward with exultation to its advancement and success in life. The object of so much attachment, and who promises so much, attains to womanhood—sweet, confiding, innocent, and beautiful, but falls the victim of such vile art and falsehood, as was so foreign from her nature that she was not prepared for its encounter. The parent is stung with the deepest agony. Every sentiment and affection which before derived pleasure from her existence, is now a source of torment to him. He was before happy, he is now miserable; his rights therefore have been invaded, and he justly demands protection from the law.

We have seen that a sense of pride and love of approbation were innate in man; these may be wounded by malicious detraction and insult, and this will disturb the peace of the injured individual. He therefore demands, very properly, legal protection for these sentiments.

I cite these instances for the purpose of leading the way to a discussion of the species of redress which the law ought to afford for injuries to the sentiments and affections. The right of property is fully acknowledged by our laws, and in general is well protected. A man injured in this right has secured to him a civil action for redress, in which he recovers a compensation in money for the wrong done him; and in cases of injury by theft, embezzlement and, in some cases, of fraud, and imposture, the law has made the offence criminal, and punished it as a felony. One would suppose that a right so sacredly guarded by the law must have a higher and holier origin than others, and that its protection was of higher importance to man's happiness than those rights which were entirely neglected. Whence then the origin of this right? It emanates from the instinct to acquire. Man has a natural desire to acquire and keep property. This instinct is possessed in a slight degree by some of the animal tribes, and it does not aspire to the dignity of a sentiment. It, however, calls the sentiment of self-esteem to its aid, and then says, "this is mine; and because it is mine, it is better than if it were thine; and I am better than thou art, because I have it and thou hast it not." Now if you deprive this man of this thing, you become a felon; but if you only take away his wife, or degrade his daughter, or destroy his character, you are still a gentleman in the eye of the law!

The person is also greatly favored in our jurisprudence. Not only its utility but its symmetrical beauty has met with a most favorable consideration. If you cut off a man's ear, or slit his nose, or otherwise maim him, you are regarded as a felon; but you may so lacerate his feelings as to destroy his reason, and escape without legal notice. An ear or nose is more valuable, says the law, than the reasonable faculties. Nay, so jealous is the law of injury to the corporeal man, that you may not shake your feet at him without striking distance, though you touch him not, but forthwith you will be arrested and carried before a magistrate for the offence, and if he himself does not call you a coward, vagabond, and knave, he will be regarded as uncommonly civil and reserved upon the occasion!

Now, all human rights emanate from the natural sentiments and desires of the mind; they have, therefore, the same source, but it does not necessarily follow that they enjoy the same rank and dignity; some are more sacred and important than others to human happiness.

Every member of man's physical frame is of some degree of importance in the exercise of its corporeal functions; but he can bear the loss of one with less sacrifice than another, because it is not of equal importance to his bodily strength or activity. The loss of his finger is not equal to the deprivation of his hand, nor his arm to that of his leg. It becomes us then, to fix the grade of man's intellectual powers, and to determine the relative rank and dignity of the various faculties, dispositions, and sentiments of the human mind. The supremacy will be conceded to man's moral nature; his intellectual faculties are next in rank, but wholly subsequent to it, as are also the animal feelings.

Man's highest enjoyments consist in the gratification of his sentiments. His secondary pleasures arise from the indulgence of his animal feelings, under the restraint of the sentiments and the intellect. The source of his highest enjoyments, when disturbed or wounded, becomes the source of his most poignant suffering. He can bear pecuniary loss easier than domestic deprivation, an injury to his person with less sacrifice than an injury to his character. Fraud and deception offend him more than theft, and obtaining by false pretences more than robbery. He can endure hunger and want easier than the loss of his good name, and will sacrifice the peace of his body for his peace of mind. He will lay down life itself for freedom, truth, or justice, and enlist all the powers of his nature in the service of its benevolence. He will spend his fortune to satisfy his love of praise, and devote his life to gratify his pride and ambition. Nay, he will deny himself the entire gratification of the lower propensities, unless their indulgence can proceed under the sanction of his moral sentiments. If this be so, ought not the law to recognise these gradations of nature, and to award its protection according to their demands?

Injuries to the sentiments and affections then ought to be regarded as criminal offences, and be punishable according to their degree of moral turpitude; and the conviction of the offender in any of these cases should be a moral stigma upon his character. In the most enormous of these offences, such as those most deeply affecting the marital rights, and domestic love and peace, the law ought to pronounce them felonies, and punish them as such, as also those lacerations of the sentiments which result in the wreck of human reason. And it seems to me that all idea of pecuniary compensation for this class of injuries, ought to be banished from the mind. Slander and libel which wound the sentiments only, and do not directly injure a man's pecuniary interest, ought also to be treated as criminal offences, and the civil action for pecuniary compensation ought to be abolished altogether. The rule which I contend for is this—when the injury is an offence to the moral feelings or affections, it should be treated as a crime and as such only. The idea of bartering a man's moral nature for money, of enduring so much mental agony for so many dollars, is utterly degrading to humanity. Money is not the standard by which to estimate moral worth or human happiness. But where the offence is against the right of property, the extent of the injury can be measured by this standard, and a compensation be made in money. Such injury may also be a moral offence; and when so, should be treated as a crime.

This would abolish the civil action of adultery, the action for debauching a daughter, and the action for slander and libel, except where the words published occasioned a direct and immediate pecuniary injury. It would abolish the action of assault and battery except where the bodily injury was such as to occasion a pecuniary loss, and it would substitute criminal punishment as the sole measure of protection and redress. All fraud and false pretences which injured another's right would be regarded as criminal, and if they produce pecuniary loss, the civil action would also be retained for redress in damages. The rule, in fine, would be, to treat all offences against the sentiments and affections of man's nature as moral wrongs, and to lay all atonement by money for injuries to human rights entirely out of view, except where the injury affected the right of property directly.

This would prevent and redress moral wrongs by moral means, and award for pecuniary wrongs their only appropriate remedy. What! shall a man's whole moral nature be grossly outraged and lacerated by the vilest wrong, and the law deal out a bait to a mere instinct by way of atonement and satisfaction? Suppose self-esteem, approbation, adhesiveness, benevolence, and conscientiousness to be raging under offence and injury, and you soothe them by gratifying acquisitiveness? As well might you, when acquisitiveness itself was outraged by an injury to property, attempt to redress the wrong by gratifying the organs of music, and give solemn judgement in your courts that the defendant should play for the plaintiff some of his favorite tunes.

It may be objected that there is a vast disparity in the extent and seriousness of the various injuries to the sentiments and affections, according to the malignity of the offender, the sentiment or affection which should be wounded, and the organization and external condition of the aggrieved person, and that therefore it would be difficult if not impossible to frame a code of laws which should afford the required recognition and protection of these rights, without endangering the rights and liberty of the accused. I answer, that the laws already recognize and afford protection to rights where the same difficulty exists; and what has been safely done in one case can be done in another of the same nature.

The right of life itself is protected by our statutes, which declare that the destruction of human life may be either murder, punishable by death—or manslaughter, punishable by imprisonment in a state-prison, for a long term of years—or manslaughter punishable by a shorter term of imprisonment; or the same offence, punishable by imprisonment in a county jail, or by a fine only. And cases are declared in which the taking of human life is either justifiable or excusable homicide, which of course are not punishable at all.

Now the punishment for the taking of human life is not regulated by the mere fact of the destruction of life, for if it were, there would be but one offence, and one punishment; but the circumstances attending each case are considered, and the crime takes its character and meets its punishment from the degree of moral turpitude manifested in its perpetration. We have seen that every man has an innate love of life—and in one, this intuitive attachment to life is much stronger than in another, and yet the law does not attempt to measure the offence of man-killing by the amount of the instinctive attachment which was violated by the act of killing. The law recognizes the instinct and the right, and protects it whether it be strong or weak. The killing of a human being who should be so disgusted with life, as that he would have committed suicide, if he had not been murdered, is as much a crime in the eye of the law as if the deceased had the most ardent attachment to life. So also the life of the humble is as sacredly protected as that of the great.

The same holds true of the right of property. The law regards the right alike, and its violation as the same offence, whether the owner was a miser or philanthropist, whether he had much or little. The offender who steals from a man with large acquisitiveness, commits no greater offence than when he steals from one with a small instinctive love of property. The offence is against the right, and the means of prevention and punishment are to be graduated according to the degree of moral turpitude manifested by the offender. Accordingly he who steals a loaf of bread is not punished to the same extent as he who takes hundreds of dollars. So also the law has already distinguished between various degrees of forgery, and created several distinct grades of this crime, and awarded various degrees of punishment. The same may be said of the crime of arson. I am not required to show that these gradations or any of them are correct; but I cite these instances to show—not only that by our law at present there are recognized several distinct crimes, from those meeting with capital punishment to the lesser sort, punishable by slight imprisonment—but moreover that offences against the same right are graduated, and meet with different degrees of punishment.

Suppose, then, the law should declare seduction to be a moral offence of which it would take cognizance; that if the victim of it was under a certain age, and it was effected by a pledge of marriage—it should be punishable by imprisonment for a certain term of years; if of mature years, and the circumstances were less aggravating—with a lesser term—leaving the jury to find the degree of the crime as it should be defined by law, and have the punishment for that degree fixed and certain. No greater difficulty could be encountered here than legislation has already overcome, in cases of homicide, arson, forgery and theft.

So in cases of slander. Written slander, or libel, is now regarded, by law, as exhibiting greater moral turpitude, and as more to be dreaded than verbal slander. The former is indictable as a misdemeanor now, while the latter is not, but is the subject only of a civil action for damages. Would there be any difficulty in pronouncing them both to be criminal offences, and graduating their punishment according to the degree of moral turpitude evinced in their perpetration?

This much the law could do at any rate; it could define what should be the first degree of any moral offence, and could fix its certain punishment, and it could declare that all other like offences should fall within either a second or third degree, in the discretion of a jury who should weigh the circumstances of each case; and the punishment for these degrees could also be graduated and fixed by law. This would take all arbitrary discretion from the courts, and leave the accused in the hands of a jury of the country, coming from the body of the people, and properly representing the just sentiment of an enlightened and virtuous community.

I perceive no insurmountable difficulty in the practical application of the principles of legislation, for which I have striven in this discourse. They at least invite candid investigation. Humanity pleads for their adoption; the noblest sentiments of our nature impel us to demand their consideration in the halls of legislation; and I have yet to be convinced, that He who ordained the pressing demands of the human sentiments and affections, and conferred upon man intellectual powers to subserve them, has been so sparing of the latter endowment, as that, how hard soever he shall strive, his reasoning powers will fail of securing an adequate measure of legal protection against the vilest wrongs which one human being can inflict upon another.

Lockhart's Spanish Ballads.

THE MURDER OF THE MASTER OF SAINT IAGO.

The next four ballads relate to the history of Don Pedro, King of Castille, called The Cruel.

An ingenious person not long ago published a work, the avowed purpose of which was to prove that Tiberius was a humane and contemplative prince, who retired to the Island of Capree only that he might indulge in the harmless luxury of philosophic meditation; and, in like manner, Pedro, the Cruel has found, in these latter times, his defenders and apologists; above all, Voltaire.

There may be found, without doubt, in the circumstances which attended his accession, something to palliate the atrocity of several of his bloody acts. His father had treated his mother with contempt: He had not only entertained, as his mistress, in her lifetime, a lady of the powerful family of Guzman, but actually proclaimed that lady his queen, and brought up her sons as princes in his palace; nay, he had even betrayed some intentions of violating, in their favor, the order of succession, and the rights of Pedro. And, accordingly, no sooner was Alphonso dead, and Pedro acknowledged by the nobility, than Donna Leonora de Guzman and her sons, whether from consciousness of guilt, or from fear of violence, or from both of these causes, betook themselves to various places of strength, where they endeavored to defend themselves against the authority of the new King. After a little time, matters were so far accommodated by the interference of friends, and Donna Leonora took up her residence at Seville; but Pedro was suddenly, while in that city, seized with a distemper which his physicians said must, in all probability, have a mortal termination; and during his confinement, (which lasted for several weeks) many intrigues were set on foot, and the pretensions of various candidates for the throne openly canvassed among the nobility of Castille.

Whether the King had, on his recovery, discovered any thing indicative of treasonous intentions in the recent conduct of Leonora and her family, (which, all things considered, seems not improbable), or whether he merely suffered himself, as was said at the time, to be overpowered by the undictive arguments of his own mother, the queen-dowager, the fact is certain, that in the course of a few days, Donna Leonora was arrested, and put to death by Pedro's command, in the Castle of Talavera. Don Fadrique, (or Frederick), one of her sons, who had obtained the dignity of Master of the order of St. Iago, fled upon this into Portugal, and fortified himself in the city Coimbra; while another of them, Don Enrique, or Henry, Lord of Trastamara, took refuge at the Court of Arragon, openly renouncing his allegiance to the crown of Castille, and professing himself henceforth, in all things, the subject and vassal of the prince who gave him protection. Henry of Trastamara was, from this time, the declared and active enemy of his brother; and in consequence of his influence, and that of his mother's kindred, but most of all, in consequence of Don Pedro's own atrocious proceedings, Castille itself was filled with continual tumults and insurrections.

Don Fadrique, however, made his peace with Pedro. After a lapse of many months he was invited to come to the court at Seville, and take his share in the amusements of an approaching tournament. He accepted the invitation, but was received with terrible coldness, and immediately executed within the palace. The friends of Pedro asserted that the King had that very day detected Don Fadrique in a correspondence with his brother, Henry of Trastamara, and the Arragonese; while popular belief attributed the slaughter of The Master to the unhappy influence which the too celebrated Maria de Padilla had long ago thus begun to exercise over Pedro's mind.

Maria was often, in consequence of her close intimacy with the King, called by the name of their hated race; but she was in reality not only of Christian, but of noble descent in Spain. However that might be, Pedro found her in the family of his minister, Albuquerque, where she had been brought up, loved her with all the violence of his temper, and made her his wife in all things but the name. Although political motives induced him, not long afterward, to contract an alliance with a princess of the French blood royal—the unfortunate Blanche of Bourbon,—he lived with his young queen but a few days and then deserted her for ever, for the sake of this beautiful, jealous and imperious mistress.

The reader will observe, that there is a strange peculiarity in the structure of the ballad which narrates the Murder of the Master of St. Iago. The unfortunate Fadrique is introduced in the beginning of it as telling his own story, and so he carries it on, in the first person, until the order for his execution is pronounced by Pedro. The sequel is given as if by another voice. I can suppose this singularity to have had a musical origin.

The Master was slain in the year 1358.

I.
"I sat alone in Coimbra—the town myself had ta'en,—
When came into my chamber, a messenger from Spain;
There was no treason in his look, an honest look he wore:
I from his hand the letter took,—my brother's seal it bore.

II.
"Come, brother dear, the day draws near," ('twas thus bespoke the King,) (ring,)"
"For plenary court and knightly sport, within the listed
Alas! unhappy Master, I easy credence lent;
Alas! for fast and faster I at his bidding went.

III.
"When I set off from Coimbra, and pass'd the bound of Spain,
I had a goodly company of spearmen in my train;
A gallant force, a score of horse, and sturdy mules thirteen;
With joyful heart I held my course—my years were young and green.

IV.
"A journey of good fifteen days within the week was done,
I halted not, though signs I got, dark tokens many a one;
A strong stream master'd horse and mule, I lost my poniard fine,
And left a page within the pool, a faithful page of mine.

V.
"Yet on to proud Seville I rode; when to the gate I came,
Before me stood a man of God, to warn me from the same;
The words he spake I would not hear, his grief I would not see,
I seek, said I, my brother dear—I will not stop for thee.

VI.
"No lists were closed upon the sand, for royal tourney dight;
No pawing horse was seen to stand, I saw no armed knight;
Yet aye I gave my mule the spur, and hasten'd through the town,
I stooped before his palace-door, then gaily leapt I down.

VII.
"They shut the door, my trusty score of friends were left behind; [mind; I would not hear their whisper'd fear, no harm was in my I greeted Pedro, but he turn'd—I wot his look was cold; His brother from his knee he spurn'd—'Stand off, thou Master beld—"

VIII.
"Stand off, stand off, thou traitor strong," twas thus he said to me, [my knee? "Thy time on earth shall not be long—what brings thee to My Lady craves a New-year's gift, and I will keep my word; Thy head methinks may serve the shift—Good yeoman, draw thy sword."

IX.
The Master lay upon the floor ere well that word was said, Then in a charger off they bore his pale and bloody head; They brought it to Padilla's chair, they bow'd them on the knee, [thee." "King Pedro greets thee, Lady fair, his gift he sends to

She seized it by the clotted hair, and o'er the window flung; The mastiff smelt it in his lair, forth at her cry he sprung;— The mastiff that had crouch'd so low to lick the Master's hand, He toss'd the morsel to and fro, and lick'd it on the sand.

XII.
And ever as the mastiff tore, his bloody teeth were shown, With growl and snort he made his sport, and pick'd it to the bone. The baying of the beast was loud, and swiftly on the street There gather'd round a gaping crowd, to see the mastiff eat.

XIII.
Then out and spake King Pedro—"What governance is this? The rabble rout, my gate without, torment my dogs, I wiss." Then out and spake King Pedro's page, "It is the Master's head, [fed." The mastiff tears it in his rage, therewith they him have

XIV.
Then out and spake the ancient Nurse, that nursed the brothers twain, [slain; "On thee, King Pedro, lies the curse, thy brother thou hast A thousand harlots there may be within the realm of Spain, But where is she can give to thee thy brother back again?"

XV.
Came darkness o'er King Pedro's brow, when thus he heard her say; He sorely rued the accursed vow he had fulfilled that day; He pass'd unto his paramour, where on her couch she lay, Leaning from out her painted bower, to see the mastiff's play.

XVI.
He drew her to a dungeon dark, a dungeon strong and deep; "My father's son lies stiff and stark, and there are few to weep. Fadrique's blood for vengeance calls, his cry is in mine ear; Thou art the cause, thou harlot false, in darkness lie thou here."

BOOK THE SECOND.

CHAPTER IX.—The Counterplot.

Startled, but not dismayed—for he was a man of great courage—by the sudden address and appearance of Guy Fawkes, Lord Mounteagle instantly sprang to his feet, and, drawing his sword, put himself into a posture of defence.

"You have betrayed me," he cried, seizing Tresham with his left hand; "but if I fall, you shall fall with me."

"You have betrayed yourself, my lord," rejoined Guy Fawkes; "or rather, Heaven has placed you in our hands as an instrument for the liberation of Viviana Radcliffe. You must take an oath of secrecy—a binding oath—such as, being a good Catholic, you cannot break—not to divulge what has come to your knowledge. Nay, you must join me and my confederates, or you quit not this spot with life."

"I refuse your terms," replied Mounteagle, resolutely—"I will never conspire against the monarch to whom I have sworn allegiance. I will not join you. I will not aid you in procuring Viviana Radcliffe's release. Nor will I take the oath you propose. On the contrary, I arrest you as a traitor, and I command you, Tresham, in the King's name, to assist me in his capture."

But suddenly extricating himself from the grasp imposed upon him, and placing Guy Fawkes between him and the Earl, Tresham rejoined—

"It is time to throw off the mask, my good lord and brother. I can render you no assistance. I am sworn to this league, and must support it. Unless you assent to the conditions proposed—and which for your own sake I would counsel you to do—I must, despite our near relationship, take part against you—even," he added, significantly, "if your destruction should be resolved upon."

"I will sell my life dearly, as you shall find," replied Mounteagle. "And, but for the sake of my dear lady, your sister, I would stab you where you stand."

"Your lordship will find resistance in vain," replied Guy Fawkes, keeping his eye steadily fixed upon him. "We seek not your life, but your co-operation. You are a prisoner."

"A prisoner!" echoed Mounteagle, derisively. "You have not secured me yet."

As he spoke he rushed toward the door; but his departure was checked by Bates, who presented himself at the entrance of the passage with a drawn sword in his hand. At the same moment, Catesby and Keyes issued from the closet, while Garnet and the other conspirators likewise issued from their hiding places. Hearing the noise behind him, Lord Mounteagle turned, and beholding the group, uttered an exclamation of surprise and rage.

"I am fairly entrapped," he said, sheathing his sword, and advancing toward them. "Fool that I was, to venture hither!"

"These regrets are too late, my lord," replied Catesby. "You came hither of your own accord. But, being here, nothing, except compliance with our demands, can insure your departure."

"Yes, one thing else," thought Mounteagle—"cunning. It shall go hard if I cannot outwit you. Tresham will act with me. I know his treacherous nature too well to doubt which way he will incline. Interest, as well as relationship, binds him to me. He will acquaint me with their plans. I need not, therefore, compromise myself by joining them. If I take the oath of secrecy, that will suffice—and I will find means of evading the obligation. I may thus make my own bargain with Salisbury. But I must proceed cautiously. Too sudden a compliance might awaken their suspicions."

"My lord," said Catesby, who had watched his countenance narrowly, and distrusted its expression, "we must have no double-dealing. Any attempt to play us false will prove fatal to you."

"I have not yet consented to your terms, Mr. Catesby," replied Mounteagle. "And I demand a few moments' reflection before I do so."

"What say you, gentlemen?" said Catesby. "Do you agree to his lordship's request?"

There was a general answer in the affirmative. "I would also confer for a moment alone with my brother Tresham," said Mounteagle.

"That cannot be, my lord," rejoined Garnet, peremptorily. "And take heed you meditate no treachery toward us, or you will destroy yourself here and hereafter."

"I have no desire to speak with him, father," observed Tresham. "Let him declare what he has to say before you all."

Mounteagle looked hard at him, but he made no remark. "In my opinion, we ought not to trust him," observed Keyes. "It is plain he is decidedly opposed to us. And if the oath is proposed to him, he may take it with some mental reservation."

"I will guard against that," replied Garnet.

"If I take the oath, I will keep it, father," rejoined Mounteagle. "But I have not yet decided."

"You must do so, then, quickly, my lord," returned Catesby.

The earl started. "We mean you no treachery, my lord," observed Keyes, "and expect to be dealt with, with equal fairness."

Surrendering his sword to Catesby, Mounteagle then walked to the farther end of the room, and leaning against the wall, with his back to the conspirators, appeared buried in thought.

"Take Tresham aside," whispered Catesby to Wright. "I do not wish him to overhear our conference. Watch him narrowly, and see that no signal passes between him and Lord Mounteagle."

Wright obeyed; and the others gathering closely together, began to converse in a low tone.

"It will not do to put him to death," observed Garnet. "From what he stated to Tresham, it appears that his servant was aware of his coming hither. If he disappears, therefore, search will be immediately made, and all will be discovered. We must either instantly secure ourselves by flight, and give up the enterprise, or trust him."

"You are right, father," replied Rookwood. "The danger is imminent."

"We are safe at present," observed Percy, "and may escape to France or Flanders before information can be given against us. Nay, we may carry off Mounteagle with us, for that matter. But I am loth to trust him."

"So am I," rejoined Catesby. "I do not like his looks."

"There is no help," said Fawkes. "We must trust him, or give up the enterprise. He may materially aid us, and has himself asserted that he can procure Viviana's liberation from the Tower."

"Pshaw!" exclaimed Catesby, impatiently. "What has that to do with the all-important question we are now considering?"

"Much," returned Fawkes. "And I will not move further in the matter, unless that point is insisted on."

"You have become strangely interested in Viviana of late," observed Catesby, sarcastically. "Could I suspect you of so light a passion, I should say you loved her."

A deep flush dyed Fawkes's swarthy cheeks, but he answered in a voice of constrained calmness,

"I do love her,—as a daughter."

"Humph!" exclaimed the other, drily.

"Catesby," rejoined Fawkes, sternly, "you know me well—too well, to suppose I would resort to any paltry subterfuge. I am willing to let what you have said pass. But I counsel you not to jest thus in future."

"Jest?" exclaimed Catesby. "I was never more serious in my life."

"Then you do me wrong," retorted Fawkes, fiercely; "and you will repeat the innuendo at your peril."

"My sons—my sons," interrupted Garnet, "what means this sudden—this needless quarrel, at a moment when we require the utmost calmness to meet the danger that assails us? Guy Fawkes is right. Viviana must be saved. If we desert her, our cause will never prosper. But let us proceed step by step, and first decide upon what is to be done with Lord Mounteagle."

"I am filled with perplexity," replied Catesby.

"Then I will decide for you," replied Percy. "Our project must be abandoned."

"Never," replied Fawkes, energetically. "Fly, and secure your own safety. I will stay and accomplish it alone."

"A brave resolution!" exclaimed Catesby, tendering him his hand, which the other cordially grasped. "I will stand by you to the last. No—we have advanced too far to retreat."

"Additional caution will be needful," observed Keyes. "Can we not make it a condition with Lord Mounteagle to retire, till the blow is struck, to his mansion at Hoxton?"

"That would be of no avail," replied Garnet. "We must trust him wholly, or not at all."

"There I agree with you, father," said Percy. "Let us propose the oath of secrecy to him, and detain him here, until we have found some secure retreat, utterly unknown to him, or to Tresham, whence we can correspond with our friends. A few days will show whether he has betrayed us or not. We need not visit this place again till the moment for action arrives."

"You need not visit it again at all," rejoined Fawkes. "Everything is prepared, and I will undertake to fire the train. Prepare for what is to follow the explosion, and leave the management of that to me."

"I cannot consent to such a course, my son," said Garnet. "The whole risk will thus be yours."

"The whole glory will be mine, also, father," replied Fawkes, enthusiastically. "I pray, you, let me have my own way."

"Well, be it as you will, my son," returned Garnet, with affected reluctance. "I will not oppose the hand of Heaven, which clearly points you out as the chief agent of this mighty enterprise. In reference to what Percy has said about a retreat till Lord Mounteagle's trustworthiness can be ascertained," he added to Catesby, "I have just been thought me of a large retired house on the borders of Epsom Chase, called White Webbs. It has been recently taken by Mrs. Rookwood, and her sister, Ann Vaux, and will afford us a safe asylum."

"An excellent plan, father," cried Catesby. "Since Guy Fawkes is willing to undertake the risk, we will leave Lord Mounteagle in his charge, and go there at once."

"What must be done with Tresham?" asked Percy. "We cannot take him with us, nor must he know of our retreat."

"Leave him with me," said Fawkes.

"You will be at a disadvantage," observed Catesby, "should he take part, as there is reason to fear he may do, with Lord Mounteagle."

"They are both unarmed," returned Fawkes, "but were it otherwise, I would answer with my head for their detention."

"All good saints guard you, my son!" exclaimed Garnet. "Henceforth, we resign the custody of the powder to you."

"It will be in safe keeping," replied Fawkes.

The party then advanced toward Lord Mounteagle, who, hearing their approach, instantly faced them.

"Your decision, my lord?" demanded Catesby.

"You shall have it in a word, sir," replied Mounteagle, firmly. "I will not join you, but I will take the required oath of secrecy."

"Is this your final resolve, my lord?" rejoined Catesby.

"It is," replied the Earl.

"It must content us," observed Garnet; "though we hoped you would have lent your active services to further a cause, having for its sole object the restoration of the church to which you belong."

"I know not the means whereby you propose to restore it, father," replied Mounteagle, "and I do not desire to know them. But I guess that they are dark and bloody, and as such I take no part in them."

"And you refuse to give us any counsel or assistance?" pursued Garnet.

"I will not betray you," replied Mounteagle. "I can say nothing further."

"I would rather be promised too little, than too much," whispered Catesby to Garnet. "I begin to think him sincere."

"I am of the same opinion, my son," returned Garnet.

"One thing you shall do, before I consent to set you free, on any terms, my lord," observed Guy Fawkes. "You shall engage to procure the liberation of Viviana Radcliffe from the Tower. You told Tresham you could easily accomplish it."

"I scarcely knew what I said," replied Mounteagle, with a look of embarrassment.

"You spoke confidently, my lord," rejoined Fawkes.

"Because I had no idea I should be compelled to make good my words," returned the Earl. "But, as a Catholic, and related by marriage to Tresham, who is a suspected person, any active exertions in her behalf on my part might place me in jeopardy."

"This excuse shall not avail you, my lord," replied Fawkes. "You must weigh your own safety against hers. You stir not hence, till you have sworn to free her."

"I must perforce assent, since you will have no refusal," replied Mounteagle. "But I almost despair of success. If I can effect her deliverance, I swear to do so."

"Enough," replied Fawkes.

"And now, gentlemen," said Catesby, appealing to the others, "are you willing to let Lord Mounteagle depart upon the proposed terms?"

"We are," they replied.

"I will administer the oath at once," said Garnet; "and you will bear in mind, my son," he added, in a stern tone to the Earl, "that it will be one which cannot be violated without perdition to your soul."

"I am willing to take it," replied Mounteagle.

Producing a primer, and motioning the Earl to kneel before him, Garnet then proposed an oath of the most solemn and binding description. The other repeated it after him, and at its conclusion placed the book to his lips.

"Are you satisfied?" he asked, rising.

"I am," replied Garnet.

"And so am I," thought Tresham, who stood in the rear,—"that he will perjure himself."

"Am I now at liberty to depart?" inquired the Earl.

"Not yet, my lord," replied Catesby. "You must remain here till midnight."

Lord Mounteagle looked uneasy, but seeing remonstrance would be useless, he preserved a sullen silence.

"You need have no fear, my lord," said Catesby; "But we must take such precautions as will ensure our safety, in case you intend us treachery."

"You cannot doubt me, sir, after the oath I have taken," replied Mounteagle, haughtily. "But since you constitute yourself my jailor, I must abide your pleasure."

"If I am your jailer, my lord," rejoined Catesby, "I will prove to you that I am not neglectful of my office. Will it please you to follow me?"

The Earl bowed in acquiescence; and Catesby marching before him to a small room, the windows of which were carefully barred, pointed to a chair, and instantly retiring, looked the door upon him. He then returned to the others, and taking Guy Fawkes aside, observed in a low tone,

"We shall set out instantly for White Webbs. You will remain on guard with Tresham, whom you will, of course, keep in ignorance of our proceedings. After you have set the Earl at liberty, you can follow us, if you choose. But take heed you are not observed."

"Fear nothing," replied Fawkes.

Soon after this, Catesby, and the rest of the conspirators, with the exception of Guy Fawkes and Tresham, quitted the room, and the former concluded they were about to leave the house. He made no remark, however, to his companions but getting between him and the door, folded his arms upon his breast, and continued to pace backward and forward before it.

"Am I a prisoner as well as Lord Mounteagle?" asked Tresham, after a pause.

"You must remain with me here till midnight," replied Fawkes. "We shall not be disturbed."

"What! are the others gone?" cried Tresham.

"They are," was the reply.

Tresham's countenance fell, and he appeared to be meditating some project, which he could not muster courage to execute.

"Be warned by the past, Tresham," said Fawkes, who had regarded him fixedly for some minutes. "If I find reason to doubt you, I will put it out of your power to betray us a second time."

"You have no reason to doubt me," replied Tresham, with apparent candor. "I only wondered that our friends should leave me without any intimation of their purpose. It is for me, not you, to apprehend some ill design. Am I not to act with you further?"

"That depends upon yourself, and on the proofs you give of your sincerity," replied Fawkes. "Answer me frankly. Do you think Lord Mounteagle will keep his oath?"

"I will stake my life upon it," replied Tresham.

The conversation then dropped, and no attempt was made on either side to renew it. In this way several hours passed, when at length silence was broken by Tresham, who requested permission to go in search of some refreshment; and Guy Fawkes assenting, they descended to the lower room, and partook of a slight repast.

Nothing further worthy of notice occurred. On the arrival of the appointed hour, Guy Fawkes signified to his companion that he might liberate Lord Mounteagle; and immediately availing himself of the permission, Tresham repaired to the chamber, and threw open the door. The Earl immediately came forth, and they returned together to the room in which Guy Fawkes remained on guard.

"You are now at liberty to depart, my lord," said the latter; "and Tresham can accompany you if he thinks proper. Remember that you have sworn to procure Viviana's liberation."

"I do," replied the Earl.

And he then quitted the house with Tresham.

"You have had a narrow escape, my lord," replied the latter, as they approached Whitehall, and paused for a moment under the postern of the great western gate.

"True," replied the Earl; "but I do not regret the risk I have run. They are now wholly in my power."

"You forget your oath, my lord," said Tresham.

"If I do," replied the Earl, "I but follow your example. You have broken one equally solemn, equally binding, and would break a thousand more were they imposed upon you. But I will overthrow this conspiracy, and yet not violate mine."

"I see not how that can be, my lord," replied Tresham.

"You shall learn in due season," replied the Earl. "I have had plenty of leisure for reflection in that dark hole, and have hit upon a plan which, I think, cannot fail."

"I hope I am no party to it, my lord," rejoined Tresham. "I dare not hazard myself among them further."

"I cannot do without you," replied Mounteagle; but I will ensure you against all danger. It will be necessary for you, however, to act with the utmost discretion, and keep a constant guard upon every look and movement, as well as upon your words. You must fully regain the confidence of these men, and lull them into security."

"I see your lordship's drift," replied Tresham. "You wish them to proceed to the last point, to enhance the value of the discovery."

"Right," replied the Earl. "The plot must not be discovered till just before its outbreak, when its magnitude and danger will be the more apparent. The reward will then be proportionate. Now, you understand me, Tresham."

"Fully," replied the other.

"Return to your own house," rejoined Mounteagle. "We need hold no further communication together till the time for action arrives."

"And that will not be before the meeting of Parliament," replied Tresham; "for they intend to overwhelm the King and all his nobles in one common destruction."

"By Heaven! a brave design!" cried Mounteagle. "It is a pity to mar it. I knew it was a desperate and daring project, but should never have conceived aught like this. Its discovery will indeed occasion universal consternation."

"It may benefit you and me to divulge it, my lord," said Tresham, "but the disclosure will deeply and lastingly injure the Church of Rome."

"It would injure it more deeply if the plot succeeded," replied Mounteagle, "because all loyal Catholics must disapprove so horrible and sanguinary a design. But we will not discuss the question further, though what you have said confirms my purpose, and removes any misgiving I might have felt as to the betrayal. Farewell, Tresham. Keep a watchful eye upon the conspirators, and communicate with me should any change take place in their plans. We may not meet for some time. Parliament, though summoned for the third of October, will, in all probability, be prorogued till November."

"In that case," replied Tresham, "you will postpone your disclosure likewise till November?"

"Assuredly," replied Mounteagle. "The King must be convinced of his danger. If it were found out now, he would think lightly of it. But if he has actually set foot upon the mine which a single spark might kindle to his destruction, he will duly appreciate the service rendered him. Farewell! and do not neglect my counsel."

CHAPTER X....White Webbs.

Tarrying for a short time within the house after the departure of the others, Guy Fawkes lighted a lantern, and concealing it beneath his cloak, proceeded to the cellar, to ascertain that the magazine of powder was safe. Satisfied of this, he made all secure, and was about to return to the house, when he perceived a figure approaching him. Standing aside, but keeping on his guard for fear of a surprise, he would have allowed the person to pass, but the other halted, and after a moment's scrutiny, addressed him by name in the tones of Humphrey Chetham.

"You seem to haunt this spot, sir," said Fawkes, in answer to the address. "This is the third time we have met hereabouts."

"On the last occasion," replied Chetham, "I told you Viviana was a prisoner in the Tower. I have now better news for you. She is free."

"Free!" exclaimed Fawkes, joyfully. "By Lord Mounteagle's instrumentality?—But I forget. He has only just left me."

"She has been freed by my instrumentality," replied the young merchant. "She escaped from the Tower a few hours ago."

"Where is she?" demanded Guy Fawkes, eagerly.

"In a boat at the stairs of the Parliament House," replied Chetham.

"Heaven and our Lady be praised!" exclaimed Fawkes. "This is more than I hoped for. Your news is so good, young sir, that I can scarce credit it."

"Come with me to the boat, and you shall soon be satisfied of the truth of my statements," rejoined Chetham.

And followed by Guy Fawkes, he hurried to the river side, where a wherry was moored. Within it sat Viviana, covered by the tilt.

Assisting her to land, and finding she was too much exhausted to walk, Guy Fawkes took her in his arms, and carried her to the house he had just quitted.

Humphrey Chetham followed as soon as he had dismissed the waterman. Placing his lovely burthen in a seat, Guy Fawkes instantly went in search of such restoratives as the place afforded. Viviana was extremely faint; but after she had swallowed a glass of wine, she revived, and looking around her, inquired where she was.

"Do not ask," replied Fawkes; "let it suffice you are in safety. And now," he added, "perhaps, Humphrey Chetham will inform me in what manner he contrived your escape. I am impatient to know."

The young merchant then gave the required information, and Viviana added such particulars as were necessary to the full understanding of the story. Guy Fawkes could scarcely control himself when she related the tortures she had endured, nor was Chetham less indignant.

"You rescued me just in time," said Viviana. "I should have sunk under the next application."

"Thank Heaven! you have escaped it," exclaimed Fawkes.

"You owe much to Humphrey Chetham, Viviana."

"I do, indeed," she replied.

"And can you not requite it?" he returned. "Can you not make him happy?—Can you not make me happy?"

Viviana's pale cheek was instantly suffused with blushes, but she made no answer.

"Oh, Viviana!" cried Humphrey Chetham, you hear what is said. If you could doubt my love before, you must be convinced of it now. A hope will make me happy. Have I that?"

"Alas! no," she answered. "It would be the height of cruelty, after your kindness, to deceive you. You have not."

The young merchant turned aside to hide his emotion.

"Not even a hope!" exclaimed Guy Fawkes, "after what he has done. Viviana, I cannot understand you. Does gratitude form no part of your nature?"

"I hope so," she replied, "way, I am sure so—for I feel the deepest gratitude toward Humphrey Chetham. But gratitude is not love, and must not be mistaken for it."

"I understand the distinction too well," returned the young merchant, sadly.

"It is more than I do," rejoined Guy Fawkes; "and I will frankly confess that I think the important services Humphrey Chetham has rendered you entitle him to your hand. It is seldom—whatever poets may feign—that love is so strongly proved as his has been; and it ought to be adequately requited."

"Say no more about it, I entreat," interposed Chetham.

"But I will deliver my opinion," rejoined Guy Fawkes; "because I am sure what I advise is for Viviana's happiness. No one can love her better than you. No one is more worthy of her. Nor is there any one to whom I so much desire to see her united."

"Oh, Heavens!" exclaimed Viviana. "This is worse than the torture."

"What mean you?" exclaimed Fawkes, in astonishment.

"She means," interposed Chetham, "that this is not the fitting season to urge the subject—that she will never marry."

"True—true," replied Viviana. "If I ever did marry—I ought to select you."

"You ought," replied Fawkes. "And I know nothing of the female heart, if it can be insensible to youth, devotion, and manly appearance like that of Humphrey Chetham."

"You do know nothing of it," rejoined Chetham, bitterly. "Woman's fancies are unaccountable."

"Such is the received opinion," replied Fawkes; "but as I am ignorant of the sex, I can only judge from report. You are the person I should imagine she would love—nay, to be frank, whom I thought she did love."

"No more," said Humphrey Chetham. "It is painful both to Viviana and to me."

"This is not a time for delicacy," rejoined Guy Fawkes. "Viviana has given me the privilege of a father with her."

And where her happiness is so much concerned as in the present case, I should imperfectly discharge my duty if I did not speak out. It would sincerely rejoice me, and I am sure contribute materially to her own happiness, if she would unite herself to you."

"I cannot—I cannot," she rejoined. "I will never marry."

"You hear what she says," remarked Chetham. "Do not urge the matter further."

"I admire maiden delicacy and reserve," replied Fawkes; "but when a man has acted as you have done, he deserves to be treated with frankness. I am sure Viviana loves you. Let her tell you so."

"You are mistaken," replied Chetham; "and it is time you should be undeceived. She loves another."

"Is this so?" cried Fawkes, in astonishment.

She made no answer.

"Whom do you love?" he asked.

Still, no answer.

"I will tell you whom she loves—and let her contradict me if I am wrong," said Chetham.

"Oh, no!—no!—in pity spare me!" cried Viviana.

"Speak!" thundered Fawkes. "Who is it?"

"Yourself," replied Chetham.

"What!" exclaimed Fawkes, recoiling—"love me! I will not believe it. She loves me as a father—but nothing more—nothing more. But you were right. Let us change the subject. A more fitting season may arrive for its discussion."

After some further conversation, it was agreed that Viviana should be taken to White Webbs; and leaving her in charge of Humphrey Chetham, Guy Fawkes went in search of a conveyance to Enfield.

Traversing the Strand—every hostel in which was closed—he turned up Wych street, immediately on the right of which there was a large inn (still in existence,) and entering the yard, discovered a knot of carriers moving about with lanterns in their hands. To his inquiries respecting a conveyance to Enfield, one of them answered, that he was about to return thither with his waggon at four o'clock—it was then two—and should be glad to take him and his friends. Overjoyed at the intelligence, and at once agreeing to the man's terms, Guy Fawkes hurried back to his companions, and, with the assistance of Humphrey Chetham, contrived to carry Viviana (for she was utterly unable to support herself) to the inn yard, where she was immediately placed in the waggon, on a heap of fresh straw.

About an hour after this, but long before daybreak, the carrier attached his horses to the waggon, and set out. Guy Fawkes and Humphrey Chetham were seated near Viviana, but little was said during the journey, which occupied about three hours. By this time, it was broad daylight; and as the carrier stopped at the door of a small inn, Guy Fawkes, alighted, and inquired the distance to White Webbs.

"It is about a mile and a half off," replied the man. "If you pursue that lane, it will bring you to a small village about half a mile from this, where you are sure to find some one who will gladly guide you to the house, which is a little out of the road, on the borders of the forest."

He then assisted Viviana to alight, and Humphrey Chetham descending at the same time, the party took the road indicated—a winding country lane with high hedges, broken by beautiful timber—and proceeding at a slow pace, they arrived in about half an hour at a little cluster of cottages, which Guy Fawkes guessed to be the village alluded to by the carrier. As they approached it, a rustic leaped a hedge, and was about to cross to another field, when Guy Fawkes, calling to him, inquired the way to White Webbs.

"I am going in that direction," replied the man. "If you desire it, I will show you the road."

"I shall feel much indebted to you, friend," returned Fawkes, "and will reward you for your trouble."

"I want no reward," returned the countryman, trudging forward.

Following their guide, after a few minutes' brisk walking, they reached the borders of the forest, and took their way along a patch of green sward that skirted it. In some places, their track was impeded by gigantic thorns and brushwood, while at others avenues opened upon them affording them peeps into the heart of the wood. It was a beautiful sylvan scene. And as at length they arrived at the head of a long glade, at the farther end of which a herd of deer were seen, with their branching antlers mingling with the overhanging boughs, Viviana could not help pausing to admire it.

"King James often hunts within the forest," observed the countryman. "Indeed, I heard one of the rangers say it was not unlikely he might be here to-day. He is at Theobald's Palace now."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Fawkes. "Let us proceed. We lose time. Are we far from the house?"

"Not above a quarter of a mile," was the answer.

"You will see it at the next turn of the road."

As the countryman had intimated, they speedily perceived the roof and tall chimneys of an ancient house above the trees, and as it was now impossible to mistake the road, Guy Fawkes thanked their guide for his trouble, and would have rewarded him, but he refused the gratuity, and, leaping a hedge, disappeared.

Pursuing the road, they shortly afterward arrived at a gate leading to the house—a large building, erected probably at the beginning of Elizabeth's reign—and entering it, they passed under an avenue of trees. On approaching the mansion, they observed that many of the windows were closed, and the whole appearance of the place was melancholy and deserted. The garden was overgrown with weeds, and the door looked as if it was rarely opened.

Not discouraged by these appearances, but rather satisfied by them of the security of the asylum, Guy Fawkes proceeded to the back of the house, and entering a court, the flags and stones of which were covered with moss, while the interstices were filled with long grass, Guy Fawkes knocked against a small door, and, after repeating the summons, it was answered by an old woman-servant, who popped her head out of an upper window, and demanded his business.

Guy Fawkes was about to inquire for Mrs. Brooksby, when another head, which proved to be that of Catesby, appeared at the window. On seeing Fawkes and his companions, Catesby instantly descended, and unfastened the door. The house proved far more comfortable within than its exterior promised; and the old female domestic having taken word to Anne Vaux that Viviana was below, the former lady, who had not yet risen, sent for her to her chamber, and provided every thing for her comfort.

Guy Fawkes and Humphrey Chetham, neither of whom had rested during the night, were glad to obtain a few hours' repose on the floor of the first room into which they were shewn, and they were not disturbed until the day had considerably advanced, when Catesby thought fit to rouse them from their slumbers.

Explanations were then given on both sides. Chetham detailed the manner of Viviana's escape from the Tower, and Catesby in his turn acquainted them that Father Oldcorne was in the house, having found his way thither after his escape from the dwelling at Lambeth. Guy Fawkes was greatly rejoiced at the intelligence, and shortly afterwards had the satisfaction of meeting with the priest. At noon, the whole party assembled, with the exception of Viviana, who by the advice of Anne Vaux kept her chamber, to recruit herself after the sufferings she had undergone.

Humphrey Chetham, of whom no suspicions were now entertained, and of whom Catesby no longer felt any jealousy, was invited to stay in the house: and he was easily induced to pass his time near Viviana, although he might not be able to see her. Long and frequent consultations were held by the conspirators, and letters were despatched by Catesby to the elder Winter at his seat, Huddington in Worcestershire, entreating him to make every preparation for the crisis, as well as to Sir Everard Digby, to desire him to assemble as many friends as he could muster against the meeting of Parliament, at Dunchurch in Warwickshire, under the plea of a grand hunting-party.

Arrangements were next made as to the steps to be taken by the different parties after the explosion. Catesby undertook with a sufficient force to seize the Princess Elizabeth, the eldest daughter of James the First, who was then at the residence of the Earl of Harrington, near Coventry, and to proclaim her Queen, in case the others should fail in securing the princes. It was supposed that Henry, Prince of Wales, (who, it need scarcely be mentioned, died in his youth,) would be present with the King, his father, in the Parliament House, and would perish with him; and in this case, as Charles, Duke of York, (afterwards Charles the First,) would become successor to the throne, it was resolved that he should be seized by Percy, and instantly proclaimed. Other resolutions were decided upon, and the whole time of the conspirators was spent in maturing their projects.

And thus, weeks and even months stole on. Viviana had completely regained her strength, and passed a life of perfect seclusion; seldom, if ever, mixing with the others. She, however, took a kindly farewell of Humphrey Chetham before his departure for Manchester (for which place he set out about a fortnight after his arrival at White Webbs, having first sought out his servant, Martin Heydocke); but, though strongly urged by Guy Fawkes, she would hold out no hopes of a change in her sentiments toward the young merchant. Meetings were occasionally held by the conspirators elsewhere, and Catesby and Fawkes had more than one interview with Tresham—but never, except in places where they were secure from surprise.

The latter end of September had now arrived, and the meeting of Parliament was still fixed for the third of October. On the last day of the month, Guy Fawkes prepared to start for town, but before doing so, he desired to see Viviana. They had not met for some weeks; nor indeed, since Fawkes had discovered the secret of her heart (and perhaps of his own,) had they ever met with the same freedom as heretofore. As she entered the room in which he awaited her coming, a tremor agitated his frame, but he had nerved himself for the interview, and speedily subdued the feeling.

"I am starting for London, Viviana," he said, in a voice of forced calmness. "You may guess for what purpose. But, as I may never behold you again, I would not part with you without a confession of my weakness. I will not deny that what Humphrey Chetham stated, and which you have never contradicted—namely, that you loved me, for I must speak out—has produced a strong effect upon me. I have endeavored to conquer it, but it will return. Till I knew you, I never loved, Viviana."

"Indeed!" she exclaimed.

"Never," he replied. "The fairest had not power to move me. But I grieve to say—notwithstanding my struggles—I do not continue equally insensible."

"Ah!" she ejaculated, becoming as pale as death.

"Why should I hesitate to declare my feelings? Why should I not tell you that—though blinded to it so long—I have discovered that I do love you. Why should I hesitate to tell you that I regret this, and lament that we ever met?"

"What mean you?" cried Viviana, with a terrified look.

"I will tell you, replied Fawkes. "Till I saw you, my thoughts were removed from earth, and fixed on one object. Till I saw you, I asked not to live, but to die the death of a martyr."

"Die so still," rejoined Viviana. "Forget me—oh! forget me."

"I cannot," replied Fawkes. "I have striven against it. But your image is perpetually before me. Nay, at this very moment, when I am about to set out on the enterprise, you alone detain me."

"I am glad of it!" exclaimed Viviana, fervently. "Oh that I could prevent you—could save you!"

"Save me!" echoed Fawkes, bitterly. "You destroy me."

"How?" she asked.

"Because I am sworn to this project," he rejoined; "and if I were turned from it, I would perish by my own hand."

"Oh! say not so," replied Viviana, "but listen to me. Abandon it, and I will devote myself to you."

Guy Fawkes gazed at her for a moment passionately, and then, covering his face with his hands, appeared torn by conflicting emotions.

Viviana approached him, and pressing his arm, asked in an entreating voice, "Are you still determined to pursue your dreadful project?"

"I am," replied Fawkes, uncovering his face, and gazing at her; "but, if I remain here a moment longer, I shall not be able to do so."

"I will detain you then," she rejoined, "and exercise the power I possess over you for your benefit."

"No!" he replied, vehemently. "It must not be. Farewell, for ever."

And breaking from her, he rushed out the room. As he gained the passage, he encountered Catesby, who looked abashed at seeing him.

"I have overheard what has passed," said the latter, "and applaud your resolution. Few men, similarly circumstanced, would have acted as you have done."

"You would not," said Fawkes, coldly.

"Perhaps not," rejoined Catesby. "But that does not lessen my admiration of your conduct."

"I am devoted to one object," replied Fawkes, "and nothing shall turn me from it."

"Remove yourself instantly from temptation," replied Catesby. "I will meet you at the cellar beneath the Parliament House to-morrow night."

With this, he accompanied Guy Fawkes to the door; and the latter, without hazarding a look behind, set out for London, where he arrived at nightfall.

On the following night, Fawkes examined the cellar, and found it in all respects as he had left it; and, apprehensive lest some difficulty might arise, he resolved to make every preparation. He, accordingly, pierced the sides of several of the barrels piled against the walls with a gimblet, and inserted in the holes small pieces of a slow burning match. Not content with this, he staved in the tops of the uppermost tier, and scattered powder among them to secure their instantaneous ignition.

This done, he took a powder-horn, with which he was provided, and kneeling down, and holding his lantern so as to throw a light upon the floor, laid a train to one of the lower barrels, and brought it within a few inches of the door, intending to fire it from that point. His arrangements completed, he arose, and muttered,

"A vessel is provided for my escape in the river, and my companions advise me to use a slow match, which will allow me to get out of harm's way. But I will see the deed done, and if the train fails, will hold a torch to the barrels myself."

At this juncture, a slight tap was heard without.

Guy Fawkes instantly masked his lantern, and, cautiously opening the door, beheld Catesby.

"I am come to tell you that Parliament is prorogued," said the latter. "The House does not meet till the fifth of November. We have another month to wait."

"I am sorry for it," rejoined Fawkes. "I have just laid the train. The lucky moment will pass."

And, locking the door, he proceeded with Catesby to the adjoining house.

They had scarcely been gone more than a second, when two figures, muffled in cloaks, emerged from behind a wall.

"The train is laid," observed the foremost, "and they are gone to the house. You might seize them now without danger."

"That will not answer my purpose," replied the other. "I will give them another month."

"Another month!" replied the first speaker. "Who knows what may happen in that time? They may abandon their project."

"There is no fear of that," replied the other. "But you had better go and join them."

Original Poetry.

To the Editor of the New World:

DEAR SIR: In addressing the first-born of my muse to the Editor of a periodical so high in point of literary merit as the New World, you may well imagine that my heart trembles, and beats violently against the bony gratings of its earthly prison-house, while my fingers are scrawling a letter of introduction for my offering to the grim executioner of poor "Flaccus." But, in "good earnest," do not judge too harshly the following lines; and if they are worthy a place in the green borders of the "New World," grant them a resting-place from their weary journey and send joy to the heart of their conceited author, by clothing them in the robes of print, that they may greet his eye joyfully in their borrowed plumage.

As I never have ventured to send a piece of my rhyming nonsense, as you will perchance call it, to the printer's ken, you will do me the great favor, should you deem the poetry good for any thing, to correct for me the bad punctuation, and not throw the piece aside on this account.

Yours, &c., R. H. B.

TO THE MOON.

I've seen thee, moon, when rising on the ocean,
Streaming in one bright glance of trembling light
Far on its bosom breezed with gentle motion
By new-born breezes of the summer night.

And I have seen thee when on high careering
Through the clear softness of the azure sky,—
The lovely guardian of the night appearing,
While all thy starry train is marshalled nigh.

And I have seen thee in the midnight hour,
When all around is slumbering and still,
Send down thy beams on some old ruined tower,
And with thy light its crumbling chambers fill;

As if thou'dst hear its old and hidden story—
Who its grim dwellers were, and how they died—
Whether on battle-field they fell in glory,
Or in gray hairs were buried at its side.

And I have seen thee when, with fitful gleaming,
From the thick clouds thou look'st in brightness down,
While through the sky the lightning fires are streaming,
And in the west the moaning tempest frown.

And then I've seen thee when the winds are blowing
Fainter and fainter on the billowy sea;
While yet the rocks the spray are backward throwing,
And raindrops glitter on each plant and tree,
And there is ever on thy clear brow dwelling
The same calm smile of loveliness and joy;
And in my heart the same sweet tale thou'rt telling
That made me, years ago, a thoughtful boy.
Still o'er the earth thy welcome light is pouring
Down the bright arch of thy imperial throne;
And, all thy majesty and grace adoring,
I kneel and worship at thy shrine alone.

To R. H. B.

Most welcome correspondent: We array in letters of black ink verses worthy of being printed in letters of fine gold. We must, perforce, acknowledge that we do not admire the originality of your subject so much as we do the beauty of your thoughts and the melodious stanzas in which they are conveyed. Macte virtute! which meaneth in the vulgar "go ahead!" This counsel we seldom extend to rhymesters. Customarily, we exorcise the whole race of hardlings, who exclude readable paragraphs from the columns of weakly newspapers. But thee we welcome!

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

Mr. Gammon was quite shocked at the indignity which had been perpetrated, and asked why the villains had not been kept till he could have been sent for. Then, leaving the melancholy Titmouse and Fitz-Snooks to themselves for a little while, he took a solitary walk in the Elm avenue, where—grief has different modes of expressing itself—he relieved his excited feelings by reiterated bursts of laughter. As soon as the York True Blue had, amongst other intimations of fashionable movements, informed the public that "The Hon. Pimp Yahoo" had quitted Yatton Hall for York Castle, where he intended to remain and receive a large party of friends—it was astonishing how soon they began to muster and rally round him. "Detainers!"—so that species of visiting cards is called—came fluttering in like snow; and, in short, there was no end of the messages of civility and condolence which he received from those whom he had obliged with his valuable countenance and custom.

Ah me, poor Yahoo, completely done! Oft is it, in this infernal world of ours, that the best concerted schemes are thus suddenly defeated by the envious and capricious fates! Thus were thy arms suddenly held back from behind, just as they were encircling as pretty, plump a pigeon as ever nestled in them with pert and playful confidence, to be plucked! Alas, alas! And didst thou behold the danger to which it was exposed, as it fluttered upward unconsciously into the region where thine affectionate eye detected the keen hawk in deadly poise? Ah me! Oh dear! What shall I do? What can I say? How vent my grief for The Prematurely Caged?

"Quis desiderio sit pudor, aut modus
Tam chari capitis?—
Ergo Yahoem perpetuus carcer
Tenet? Cui Pudor, et Justitiam soror,
Incorrupta Fides, pudique Veritas,
Quando ultum inveniet parem?
Multis ille bonis flebilis abjicit!
Nulli flebilior, quam tibi, Tittlebat!
Tu frustra plus, haui! non ita credulum
Poenis Yahoem creditorem—
Quem brevi semel horrido,
Nigro compulerit Gammonis gregi.
Durum!"

Poor Titmouse was very dull for some little time after this sudden abduction of the bold and brilliant spirit, for whom I have above poured out the deep sorrows of my soul, and wished to bring an action, at the suggestion of Fitz-Snooks, against the miscreant who had dared to set the law in motion at Yatton, under the very nose of its lord and master. As soon, however, as Gammon intimated to him that all those who had lent Yahoo money, might now rely upon that gentleman's honor, and whistle back their money at their leisure, Titmouse burst into a great rage, telling Gammon that he, Titmouse, had only a day or two before lent Yahoo £150, of good and lawful money of Great Britain; and that he was a "cursed scamp," who knew he could not pay; and a Detainer, at the suit of "Tittlebat Titmouse, Esq.," was one of the very earliest that found its way into the Sheriff's office, that gentleman becoming one of the very bitterest and most relentless creditors of the fallen Yahoo, except, perhaps, Mr. Fitz-Snooks, who, having lent the amiable Yahoo no less than thirteen hundred pounds, remained easy all the while, under the impression that certain precious documents called "I. O. U.'s" of the said Yahoo were as good as cash, was infinitely dismayed on discovering that it was otherwise; that he was not to be paid before all other creditors, and immediately; so he also sent a special message in the shape of a detainer, backed by a great number of curses.

In process of time Mr. Yahoo bethought himself of getting "whitewashed;" but when he came to be inspected, it was considered that he was not seasoned; so the operation was delayed for two years, under a very arbitrary statute, which enacted, "that if it should appear that the said prisoner had contracted any of his debts fraudulently, or by means of false pretences, or without having had any reasonable expectation at the time when contracted of paying the same, &c. &c. &c., or shall be indebted for damages recovered in any action for criminal conversation, or seduction, or for malicious injuries, &c. &c., such prisoner shall be discharged as to such debts and damages, so soon only as he shall have been in custody at the suit of such creditors for a period or periods not exceeding two years." Such is the odious restraint upon the liberty of the subject, which at this day, in the nineteenth century, is suffered to disgrace the statute law of England; for, in order to put other Yahoos upon their guard against the cruel and iniquitous designs upon them, I here inform them that the laws upon which Mr. Yahoo suffered his two years' incarceration, every one of his debts, &c., coming under one or other of the descriptions above-mentioned, are, propter pudor! re-enacted, and at this moment in force, as several most respectable gentlemen, if you could get access to them, would tell you.

Yahoo having been thus adroitly disposed of, Mr. Gammon had the gratification of finding that mischievous simpleton, Fitz-Snooks, very soon afterward take his departure. He pined for the pleasures of the town, (which he had money enough to enjoy for about three years longer, with economy; after which he might go abroad, or to the dogs—wherever they were to be found.) "I was indeed monstrous dull at Yatton; the game, which Yahoo had given him a taste for, was so very strictly preserved there! and the birds so uncommon shy and wild, and strong on the wing! Besides, Gammon's presence was a terrible pressure upon him, overawing and beaunting him, in spite of several attempts which he had made, when charged with the requisite quantity of wine, to exhibit an impertinent familiarity, or even defiance. As soon as poor Titmouse had bade him good-by, shaken hands with him, and lost sight of him—he was at Yatton, alone with Gammon, and felt as if a spell were upon him—he was completely cowed and prostrate. Yet Gammon laid himself out to the very uttermost to please him, and re-assure his drooping spirits. Titmouse had got it into his head that the mysterious and dreadful Gammon had, in some deep way or other, been at the bottom of Yahoo's abduction and the disappearance of Fitz-Snooks, and would, by-and-by, do the same for him. He had no feeling of ownership of Yatton; but of being, as it were, only tenant-at-will thereof to Mr. Gammon. Whenever he tried to re-assure himself, by repeating to himself that it did not signify—for Yatton was his own—and he might do as he liked, his feelings might be compared to a balloon, which, with the eye of eager and anxious thousands upon it, yet cannot get inflated sufficiently to rise one inch from the ground. How was it? Mr. Gammon's manner toward him was most uncommonly respectful; what else could he wish for? Yet he would have given a thousand pounds to Mr. Gammon to take himself off, and never show his nose again at Yatton! It annoyed him, too, more than he could express, to perceive the deference and respect which every one at the Hall manifested toward Mr. Gammon. Titmouse would sometimes stamp his foot, when alone, with childish fury on the ground, when he thought of it. When at dinner, and sitting together afterward, Gammon would rack his invention for jokes and anecdotes to amuse Titmouse—who would certainly give a kind of laugh, exclaim—"Bravo! Ha, ha! 'Pon my life!—capital!—By Jove! Most uncommon good! you don't say so?" and go on, drinking glass after glass of wine, or brandy and water, and smoking cigar after cigar, till he felt duddled and sick, in which condition he would retire to bed, and leave Gammon clear and serene in head and temper, to his meditations. When, at length, Gammon broached the subject of their bill—a frightful amount it was; of the monies advanced by Mr. Quirk, for his support for eight or nine months, on a liberal scale; and which mounted up to a sum infinitely larger than could have been supposed; and lastly, of the bond for ten thousand pounds, as the just reward to the firm for their long-continued, most anxious, and successful exertions on Titmouse's behalf—Titmouse mustered up all his resolution, as for a last desperate struggle; swore they were robbing him; and added, with a furious snap of the fingers, "they had better take the estate themselves—allow him a pound a week, and send him back to Tagrag's." Then he burst into tears, and cried like a child, long and bitterly.

"Well, sir," said Gammon, after remaining silent for some time, looking at Titmouse calmly, but with an expression of face which frightened him out of his wits, "if this is to be really the way in which I am to be treated by you—I, the only real disinterested friend you have in the world, (as you have had hundreds of opportunities of ascertaining,) if my advice is to be spurned, and my motives suspected; if your first and deliberate engagements to our firm are to be wantonly broken!"

"I've been humbugged into making them," said Titmouse, passionately.

"Why, you little miscreant!" exclaimed Gammon, starting up in his chair, and gazing at him as if he would have scooped him with his eye. "Do you DARE to say so? If you have no gratitude—have you lost your memory; what were you when I dug you out of your dismal hole at Closest Court? Did you not repeatedly go down on your knees to us? Did you not promise a thousand times to do more than you are now called upon to do? And is this, you insolent little fellow—is this the return you make us for putting you, a beggar—and very nearly, too, an idiot?"

"You're most uncommon polite," said Titmouse, suddenly and bitterly.

"Silence, sir! I am in no humor for trifling!" interrupted Gammon, sternly. "I say, is this the return you think of making us; not only to insult us, but refuse to pay money actually advanced by us to save you from starvation—money, and days and nights, and weeks and months, and many months of intense anxiety, expended in discovering how to put you in possession of a splendid fortune?—Poh! you little wretched trifler—why should I trouble myself thus? Remember—remember, Tittlebat Titmouse," continued Gammon, in a low tone, and extending toward him threateningly his long thin fore-finger, "I who made you, will one day—one single day—unmake you—blow you away like a bit of froth; you shall never be seen, or heard of, or thought of, except by some draper whose shopman you may be!"

"Ah!—'pon my life! Dare say you think I'm uncommon frightened! Ah, ha! Monstrous—particular good!" said Titmouse.

Gammon perceived that he trembled in every limb; and the smile which he tried to throw into his face was so wretched, that had you seen him at that moment, and considered his position, much and justly as you now despise him, you must have pitied him. "You're always now going on in this way—it's so very likely! Why, 'pon my soul, am not I to be a lone one of these days? Can you help that? Can you send a lord behind a draper's counter? 'Pon my soul, what do you say to that? I like that, uncommon!"

"What do I say?" replied Gammon, calmly; "why, that I've a great mind to say and do something that would make you—make you—fit to drown yourself in a rain-tub."

Titmouse's heart was lying fluttering in his throat.

"Tittlebat, Tittlebat!" continued Gammon, dropping his voice, and speaking in a very kind and earnest manner, "if you did but know the extent to which an accident has placed you in my power! at this moment in my power! Really I almost tremble, myself, to think of it!" He rose, brought his chamber-candlestick out of the hall—lit it—bade Titmouse good night, sadly but sternly—and shook him by the hand—"I may rid you of my presence to-morrow morning, Mr. Titmouse. May you find a truer—a more powerful friend than you will have lost in me!" Titmouse never shrunk more helplessly under the eye of Mr. Gammon than he did at that moment.

"You—'pon my life—stop and smoke another cigar with a poor devil, will you, Mr. Gammon?" he inquired, faintly. "It's somehow—most uncommon lonely in this queer, large, old-fashioned!"

"Not to-night, thank you," replied Gammon—and withdrew, leaving Titmouse in a state of mingled alarm and anger—the former, however, predominating.

"By jingo!" he at length exclaimed, with a heavy sigh, after a reverie of about three minutes, gulping down the remainder of his brandy and water. "If that same gent, Mr. Gammon, a'n't the—the devil—he's the very best imitation of him that ever I heard tell of!" Here he glanced furtively round the room; then he got a little flustered; rang his bell quickly for his valet, and, followed by him, retired to his dressing-room.

The next morning the storm had entirely blown over. When they met at breakfast, Titmouse, as Gammon knew would be the case, was all submission and respect; in fact, he was evidently thoroughly frightened by what Gammon had said, and infinitely more by the manner in which he had said what he did say over-night. Gammon, however, preserved for some little time the haughty air with which he had met him: but a few words of poor Titmouse's, expressing his regret for what he had said when he had drunk too much—poor little soul!—over night, and unqualifyingly submitting to every one of the requisitions which had been insisted on by Mr. Gammon—quickly dispersed the cloud that was settled on Gammon's brow.

"Now, my dear sir," said he, very graciously, "You show yourself the gentleman I always took you for—and I forget, for ever, all that passed between us so unpleasantly last night. I am sure it will never be so again: for now we entirely understand each other!"

"Oh yes—'pon my life—quite entirely!" replied Titmouse, meekly.

Soon after breakfast, they adjourned, at Gammon's request, to the billiard-room; where, though that gentleman knew how to handle a cue, and Titmouse did not, he expressed great admiration for Titmouse's play, and felt great interest in being shown by him how to get a ball, now and then, into each pocket at one stroke, a masterly manoeuvre which Titmouse succeeded in two or three times, and Gammon, not once, during their hour's play. "It was upon that occasion that they had the friendly conversation in which Titmouse made the suggestion we have already heard of, viz., that Gammon should immediately clap the screw upon Aubrey, with a view to squeezing out of him at least sufficient to pay the £10,000 bond, and their bill of costs, immediately; and Titmouse urged Gammon at once to send Aubrey packing after Yahoo to York Castle, as an inducement to an early settlement of the remainder. Gammon, however assured Mr. Titmouse that in all probability Mr. Aubrey had not a couple of thousand pounds in the world.

"Well—that will do to begin with," said Titmouse, "and the rest must come, sooner or later."

"Leave him to me, my dear Titmouse, or rather to Mr. Quirk—who'll wring him before he's done with him, I'll warrant him! But, in the meanwhile, I'll work day and night, but I'll relieve you from this claim of Mr. Quirk, for, in fact, I have little or no real interest in the matter."

"You'll take a slapping slice out of the bond, eh? Aha, Mr. Gammon! But what were you saying you'd do for me?"

"I repeat that I am your only disinterested friend, Mr. Titmouse; I shall never see a hundred pounds of what is going into Mr. Quirk's hands, who, I must say, however, has richly earned what he's going to get, by following my directions throughout. But I was saying that I had hit upon a scheme for ridding you of your difficulties. Though you have only just stepped into your property, and consequently people are very shy of advancing money on mortgage, if you'll only keep quiet, and leave the affair entirely to me, I will undertake to get you a sum of possibly twenty thousand pounds."

"My eyes!" exclaimed Titmouse, excitedly; quickly, however, adding, with a sad air—"but then, what a lot of it will go to old Quirk?"

"He is rather a keen and hard—ahem! I own; but—"

"'Pon my life—could n't we do the old gent?"

"On no consideration, Mr. Titmouse: it would be a fatal step for you—and indeed for me."

"What? and can he do any thing, too? I thought it was only you."—The little fool had brought a glimpse of color into Gammon's cheek—but Titmouse's volatility quickly relieved his Prospero. "By the way, 'pon my life—ah!—I have to pay it all back again!—There's a go! I had n't thought of that."

"I shall first try to get it out of Mr. Aubrey," said Gammon, "and then out of another friend of yours. In the mean while, we must n't drop the Tag-rags, just yet." They then got into a long and confidential conversation together; in the course of which, Titmouse happened to pop out a little secret of his, which till then he had managed to keep from Gammon, and which occasioned that gentleman a great and sudden inward confusion—one which it was odd that so keen an observer as Titmouse did not perceive indications of in the countenance of Gammon, viz. his—Titmouse's—fervent and disinterested love for Miss Aubrey. While he was rattling on with eager volubility upon this topic, Gammon, after casting about a little in his mind, as to how he should deal with this interesting discovery, resolved for the present to humor the notion, and got out of Titmouse a full and particular account of his original "smite"—the indelible impression she had made on his heart—the letter which he had addressed to her—[here Gammon's vivid fancy portrayed to him the sort of composition which must have reached Miss Aubrey, and he nearly burst into a gentle fit of laughter]—and, with a strange candor—or rather, to do him justice, with that frank simplicity which is characteristic of noble natures—he at length described his unlucky encounter with Miss Aubrey and her maid, in the winter; whereat Gammon felt a sort of sudden inward spasm, which, by a sort of sympathy, excited a twinkling sensation in his right toe—but it passed away—"it was only a juvenile indiscretion of Titmouse's; and Gammon, with rather a serious air, assured Titmouse that he had probably greatly endangered his prospects with Miss Aubrey.

"Eh? Why, de—vil take it! a'n't I going to offer to her though she's got nothing!" interrupted Titmouse, with astonishment.

"True—Ah, I had lost sight of that! Well—if you will pledge yourself to address no more letters to her, nor take any steps to see her, without first communicating with me—I think I can promise—hem!" he looked archly at Titmouse.

"She's a most uncommon lovely gall!"—he simpered, sheepishly. The fact was that Gammon had conceived quite another scheme for Titmouse—wholly inconsistent with his pure, ardent, and enlightened attachment to Miss Aubrey; 'twas undoubtedly rather a bold and ambitious one, but Gammon did not despair; for he had that confidence in himself, and in his knowledge of human nature, which always supported him in the most arduous and apparently hopeless undertakings.

There was a visible alteration for the better in the state of things at Yatton, as soon as Messrs. Yahoo and Fitz-Snooks had been disposed of. Now and then a few of the distinguished people who had honored Mr. Titmouse by going out in procession to meet and welcome him, were invited to spend a day at Yatton; and generally quitted full of admiration of the dinner and wines they got, the unaffected good-nature and simplicity of their hospitable host, and the bland, composed, and intellectual deportment and conversation of Mr. Gammon. When rent-day arrived, Mr. Titmouse, attended by Mr. Gammon, made his appearance from time to time, in the steward's room, and also in the hall, where, according to former custom, good substantial fare was set out for the tenants. They received him with a due respect of manner; but where was the cheerfulness, the cordiality, the rough, honest heartiness of days gone by? Few of them stayed to partake of the good things prepared for them, which greatly affected Mr. Griffiths, and piqued Mr. Gammon: as for Titmouse, however, he said, with a laugh, "Curse them! let 'em leave it alone if they a'n't hungry!" and any faint feeling of mortification he might have experienced, was dissipated by the amount of the sum paid into his bankers. Gammon was sensible that the scenes which had been exhibited at Yatton on the first night of his protégé's arrival, had seriously injured him in the neighborhood and county, and was bent upon effacing, as quickly as possible, such unfavorable impressions, by prevailing on Titmouse to "purge and live cleanly"—at all events for the present.

Let me pause now, for a moment, to inquire, ought not this favored young man to have felt happy? Here he was, master of a fine estate, producing him a very splendid rent-roll; a delightful residence, suggesting innumerable dear and dignified associations connected with old English feeling; a luxurious table, with the choicest liquors and wines in abundance; might smoke the finest cigars that the world could produce, from morning to night, if so disposed; had unlimited facilities for securing a distinguished personal appearance, as far as dress and decoration went; had all the amusements of the county at his command; troops of servants, eager and obsequious in their attentions; horses and carriages of every description which he might have chosen to order out—had, in short, all the "appliances and means to boot," which could be desired or imagined by a gentleman of his station and affluence. Mr. Gammon was, though somewhat stern and plain spoken, still a most sincere and powerful friend, deeply and disinterestedly solicitous about his interest, and protecting him from villainous and designing adventurers; then he had in prospect the brilliant mazes of fashionable life in town—oh, in the name of every thing that this world can produce, and of the feelings it should excite, ought not Titmouse to have enjoyed life—to have been happy? Yet he was not; he felt, quite independently of any constraint occasioned by the presence of Mr. Gammon, full of deplorable ennui, and wearisomeness inexpressible, and which nothing could alleviate but the constant use of cigars and brandy and water. On the first Sunday after the departure of Fitz-Snooks, he was prevailed upon to accompany the devout and exemplary Gammon to church; where, barring a good many ill-concealed yawns and constant fidgetiness, he conducted himself with tolerable decorum. Yet still the style of his dress, his air, and his countenance, filled the little congregation with feelings of great astonishment, when they thought that that was the new Squire of Yatton, and for a melancholy moment contrasted him with his predecessor, Mr. Aubrey. As for the worthy vicar, Dr. Tatham, Gammon resolved to secure his good graces, and succeeded. He called upon him soon after having heard from Titmouse of his, Yahoo, and Fitz-Snooks' encounter with Dr. Tatham, and expressed profound concern on hearing of the rude treatment he had encountered. There was a gentleness and affability—tempering at once and enhancing his evident acuteness and knowledge of the world—which quite captivated the little doctor. But, above all, the expressions of delicate sympathy and regret, with which he now and then alluded to the late occupants of Yatton and toward whom the stern requisitions of professional duty had caused him to play so odious a part, and inquired about them, drew out almost all that was in the little doctor's heart concerning his departed friends. Gammon gazed with deep interest at the old blind stag-hound, and feeble old Peggy, and seemed never tired of hearing the doctor's little anecdotes concerning them. He introduced Titmouse to the vicar; and, in his presence, Gammon declared his (Titmouse's) hatred and contempt for the two fellows who were with him when first he saw

Dr. Tatham; who thereupon banished from his heart all recollection of the conduct which had so deeply hurt his feelings. Gammon, on another occasion, infinitely delighted the doctor by calling on a Monday morning, and alluding with evident interest and anxiety to certain passages in the doctor's sermon of the day before, and which led to a very lengthened and interesting discussion. In consequence of what then transpired, the doctor suddenly be-thought himself of writing out an old sermon, which he had once preached before the judges of assize—and which, during the week, he touched up with a good deal of care for the ensuing Sunday—when he had the satisfaction of observing the marked and undeviating attention with which Mr. Gammon sat listening to him; and he afterward stepped into the little vestry, and warmly complimented the doctor upon his performance.

Thus it was that Dr. Tatham came to pen a postscript to one of his letters to Mrs. Aubrey, which I have formerly alluded to, and of which the following is a copy:—"P. S. By the way, the altered state of things at the Hall, I am of opinion, is entirely owing to the presence and the influence of a Mr. Gammon—one of the chief of Mr. Titmouse's solicitors, and to whom he seems very firmly attached. I have lived too long in the world to form hasty opinions, and am not apt to be deceived in my estimate of character; but I must say, I consider him to be a very superior man, both in character, intellect, and acquirements. He possesses great acuteness and knowledge of the world, general information, a very calm and courteous address—and, above and beyond all, is a man of very enlightened, religious feeling. He comes constantly to church, and presents a truly edifying example to all around, of decorum and attention. You would be delighted to hear the discussions we have had on points which my sermons have suggested to him. I preached one lately, specially aimed at him, which, thank God! I have every reason to believe has been attended with happy effects, and allayed some startling doubts which had been for years tormenting him. I am sure that my dear friend" (i. e. Mr. Aubrey) "would be delighted with him. I had myself, I assure you, to overcome a very strong prejudice against him—a thing I always love to attempt—and have in a measure, in the present instance, succeeded. He speaks of you all frequently, with evident caution, but, at the same time, respect and sympathy."

This postscript it was, which, as I have already intimated, suggested to Mr. Aubrey to seek the interview with Gammon which has been described, and during which it was frequently present to his mind.

While, however, under the pressure of Mr. Gammon's presence and authority, Titmouse was for a brief while leading this sober, retired life at Yatton—why, he hardly knew, except that Gammon willed it—a circumstance occurred which suddenly placed him on the very highest pinnacle of popularity in metropolitan society. I hardly know how to suppress my feelings of exultation, in retracing the rapid steps by which Mr. Titmouse was transformed into a lion of the first magnitude. Be it known that there was a Mr. Bladdery Pip, a fashionable novelist, possessed of most extraordinary versatility and power; for he had, at the end of every nine months, during the last nine years, produced a novel in three volumes—each succeeding one eclipsing the splendor of its predecessor, (in the judgement of the most able and disinterested newspaper critics,) in "the masterly structure of the plot"—the "vivid and varied delineation of character"—the "profound acquaintance with the workings of the human heart"—"exquisite appreciation of life in all its endless varieties"—"piercing but delicate satire"—"bold and powerful denunciations of popular vices"—"rich and tender domestic scenes"—"inimitable ease and grace"—"consummate tact and judgement"—"reflection co-extensive with observation"—"the style flowing, brilliant, nervous, varied, picturesque," et cetera, et cetera, et cetera. We have, in the present day, thank Heaven! at least a hundred such writers; but at the time about which I am writing, Mr. Bladdery Pip was pretty nearly alone in his glory. Such was the man, to whom it suddenly occurred, on glancing over the newspaper report of the trial of Doe on the demise of Titmouse v. Joller, to make the interesting facts of the case the basis of a new novel, on quite a new plan, which was approved of by no less than fifty ladies of rank, to whom the secret had been, in the strictest confidence, entrusted; and which was infinitely to transcend all his former works, and occasion quite a revolution in that brilliant and instructive species of literature. To work went Mr. Pip, within a day or two after the trial was over, and in an incredibly short space of time had got to the close of his labors; practice had made him perfect, and given him infinite facility in the production of first-rate writing. The spirited publisher quickly set to work to get the steam up. How skillfully he went to work! For some time there appeared numerous intimations in the daily papers, that "the circles of ton" were "on the qui vive" with expectation of a certain, &c. &c. &c., that "disclosures of a very extraordinary character" were being looked for—"attempts made to suppress," &c. &c.—"compromising certain distinguished," &c. &c., and so forth; all these paragraphs being in the unquestionable editorial style, and genuine indications of a mysterious under-current of curiosity and excitement, existing in those regions which were watched with reverential awe and constancy, by those in the lower regions. As time advanced, more frequent and distinct became the intimations of what was going forward, and what might be shortly expected, from the appearance of the long-promised work. Take, for instance, the following, which ran the round of every newspaper in town and country:

"The efforts made to deprive the public of the interesting and peculiar scenes contained in the forthcoming novel, and to suppress it, have entirely failed, owing to the resolution of the author, and the determination of the publisher; and their only effect has been to stimulate and expedite their efforts. It will bear the exciting and piquant title—"TIPPTIWINK;" and is founded on the remarkable circumstances attending the recent trial of a great ejection case at York. More than one noble family's history is involved in some of the details which will be found in the forthcoming publication, for which, we are assured, there are already symptoms of an unprecedented demand. The "favored few" who have seen it, predict that it will produce a prodigious sensation. The happy audacity with which facts are adhered to, will, we trust, not lead to the disagreeable consequences that are looked for in certain quarters with some anxiety. When we announce that its author is the gifted writer of the "THE SILVER SPURS," "SPIN-NACH," "TEETOTUM HALL," "THE DEVIL'S CHALICE," "THE PIROUETTE," &c. &c. &c., we trust we are violating no literary confidence."

There was no resisting this sort of thing. In that day, a skillfully-directed play of puffs laid prostrate the whole reading and fashionable world, producing the excitement of which they affected to chronicle the existence. The publisher hit upon another admirable device. He had seven hundred copies printed off; and, allowing a hundred for a first edition, he varied the title-pages of the remaining six hundred by the words—"Second Edition"—"Third Edition"—"Fourth Edition"—"Fifth Edition"—"Sixth Edition"—"Seventh Edition." By the time that the fourth edition had been announced, there existed a real rage for the book; the circulating libraries at the West End of the town were besieged by applicants for a perusal of the work; and "notices" and "extracts" began to make their appearance in the newspapers. The idea of the work was admirable. Tippetiowink, the hero, was a young gentleman of ancient family—the only child—kidnapped away in his infancy by the malignant agency of "the demon Mowbray," a distant relative, of a fierce and wicked character, who succeeded to the enjoyment of the estate, and would have come, in time, to the honors and estates of the most ancient and noble family in the kingdom, the Earl of Frizzleton. Poor Tippetiowink was at length discovered by his illustrious kinsman, by mere accident, in an obscure capacity, in the employ of a benevolent linen-draper, Blackbag, who was described as one of the most amiable and generous of linen-drapers; and, after a series of wonderful adventures, in which he displayed the most heroic constancy, the Earl succeeds in reinstating his oppressed and injured kinsman in the lofty station he ought always to have occupied. His daughter—a paragon of female loveliness—the Lady Sapphira Sigh-away—evinces the deepest interest in the success of Tippetiowink; and at length—the happy result may be guessed. Out of these few and natural incidents, Mr. Bladdery Pip was pronounced at length, by those who govern, if they do not indeed constitute public opinion, to have produced an imperishable record of his genius, avoiding all the faults, and combining all the excellencies, of all his former productions. The identity between Titmouse and Tippetiowink, Lord Dreddlington and Lord Frizzleton, Lady Cecilia and Lady Sapphira, and Mr. Aubrey and "the demon Mowbray," was quickly established. The novel passed speedily into the tenth edition; and, an undoubted, and a very great sensation was produced; extracts descriptive of the persons, particularly that of Titmouse, and the Earl, and Lady Cecilia, figuring in the story, were given in the London papers, and thence transferred into these all over the country. The very author, Mr. Bladdery Pip, became a resuscitated lion, and had his portrait, looking most intensely intellectual, prefixed to the tenth edition. Then came portraits of "Tittlebat Titmouse, Esq.," (for which he had never sat,) giving him large, melting eyes, and a very pensive face, and a most fashionable dress. The Earl of Dreddlington and Lady Cecilia became also a lion and lioness. Hundreds of opera-glasses were directed at once to their box; innumerable were the anxious salutations they received as they drove round the Park—and they drove round it three or four times as often as they had ever done before. "T was whispered that the King had read the book, and drank the Earl's health, under the name of Lord Frizzleton, while the Queen did the same for Lady Cecilia as Lady Sapphira. Their appearance produced a manifest sensation at both the levee and drawing-room—Majesty looked blander than usual as they approached: poor Lord Dreddlington and Lady Cecilia mounted in a trice into the seventh heaven of rapturous excitement; for there was that buoyant quality about their heads which secured them a graceful and rapid upward motion. They were both unutterably happy, living in a gentle, delicious tumult of excited feelings. Irrepressible exultation glistened in the Earl's eyes; he threw an infinite deal of blandness and courtesy into his manners wherever he was and whomsoever he addressed, as if he could now easily afford it, confident in the inaccessible sublimity of his position. It was slightly laughable to observe, however, the desperate efforts he made to maintain his former frigid composure of manner, but in vain; his nervousness looked almost like a sudden, though gentle, accession of St. Vitus's dance. Innumerable were the inquiries made after Titmouse—his person—his manners—his character—his dress, by her friends, of Lady Cecilia. Young ladies tormented her for his autograph. "T was with her as if the level surface of the Dead Sea had been stirred by the freshening breeze!

When a thing of this sort is once fairly set going, where is it to end? When fashion does go mad, her madness is wonderful; and she very soon turns the world mad. Presently the young men appeared in stocks—black satin stocks, embroidered some with flowers, and others with gold, were worn every where, called "Titmouse Ties;" and hats, with high crowns and rims a quarter of an inch in depth, called "Tittlebats." All the young blades about town, especially in the City, dressed themselves in the most extravagant style; an amazing impetus was given to the cigar trade—the shops were crowded, and every puppy that walked the streets puffed cigar-smoke in your eyes. In short, lively Titmouse might be seen running about the streets in all directions. As for Tag-rag, wonders befel him. A paragraph in a paper pointed him out as the original Blackbag, and his shop as the scene of Titmouse's service. Thither quickly poured the tide of fashionable curiosity and custom. His business was soon trebled. He wore his best clothes every day, and smirked, and smiled, and bustled about in a perfect crowd in his shop, in a fever of excitement. He began to think of buying the adjoining premises, and adding them to his own; and set his name down as a subscriber of half-a-guinea a-year to the "Decayed Drapers' Association." These were glorious times for Mr. Tag-rag. He had to engage a dozen extra hands; there were never less than fifty or a hundred persons in his shop at once; strings of carriages before his door, sometimes two deep, and strugglings between the coachmen for precedence; in fact, he believed that the Millennium was coming in earnest.

The undulations of the popular excitement in town, were not long in reaching the calm retreat of Titmouse in Yorkshire. To say nothing of his having on several occasions observed artists busily engaged in sketching different views of the Hall and surrounding scenery, and, on inquiry, discovered that they were sent from town for the express purpose of presenting to the public sketches of the "residence of Mr. Titmouse," a copy of the inimitable performance of Mr. Bladdery Pip—viz., "TIPPTIWINK," tenth edition—was sent down to Mr. Titmouse by Gammon; who also forwarded to him, from time to time, newspapers containing those paragraphs which identified Titmouse with the hero of the novel and also testified the profound impression which it was making upon the thinking classes of the community. Was Titmouse's wish to witness the ferment he had so unconsciously produced in the metropolis unreasonable? Yatton was beginning to look duller daily, even before the arrival of this simultaneous intelligence from town; Titmouse feeling quite out of his element. So—Gammon was contradicted—up came Titmouse to town. If he had not been naturally a fool, the notice he attracted in London must soon have made him one. He had been for coming up in a post chaise and four; but Gammon, in a letter, succeeded in dissuading him from incurring so useless an expense, assuring him that men of as high consideration as himself, constantly availed themselves of the safe and rapid transit afforded by the royal mail. His valet, on being appealed to, corroborated Mr. Gammon's representations; adding, that the late hour in the evening at which the mail arrived in town, would effectually shroud him from public observation. Giving strict and repeated orders to his valet to deposit him at once "in a first-rate West-End hotel," the haughty lord of Yatton, plentifully provided with cigars, stepped into the mail, his valet perched upon the box-seat. That functionary was well acquainted with town, and resolved on his master's taking up his quarters at the Harcourt Hotel, in the immediate vicinity of Bond street. The mail passed the Peacock, at Islington, about half-past eight o'clock; and long before they had reached even that point, the eager and anxious eye of Titmouse had been on the look-out for indications of his celebrity. He was, however, compelled to own that both people and places seemed much as usual, wearing no particular air of excitement. He was a little chagrined, till he reflected on the vulgar ignorance of the movements of the great for which the eastern regions of the metropolis were proverbial, and also on the increasing duskiness of the evening, the rapid pace at which the mail rattled along, and the circumstance of his being concealed inside. When his humble hackney-coach (its driver a feeble old man, with a wisp of straw for a hat-band, and sitting on the rickety box like a heap of dirty old clothes, and the flagging and limping horses looking truly miserable objects) had rumbled slowly up to the lofty and gloomy door of the Harcourt Hotel, it seemed to excite no notice whatever. A tall waiter, in a plain suit of black evening dress, continued standing in the ample doorway, eyeing the plebeian vehicle which had drawn up with utter indifference—conjecturing, probably, that it had come to the wrong door. With the same air of provoking superciliousness he stood, till the valet, having jumped down from his seat beside the driver, ran up, and in a peremptory sort of way exclaimed, "Mr. Titmouse of Yatton!" This stirred the waiter into something like energy.

"Here, sir!" called out Mr. Titmouse, from within the coach; and on the waiter's slowly approaching, inquired with sufficiently swaggering manner, "Pray, has the Earl of Dreddlington been inquiring for me here to-day?" The words seemed to operate like magic, converting the person addressed, in a moment, into a slave—supple and obsequious.

"His lordship has not been here to-day, sir," he replied in a low tone, with a most courteous inclination; and gently opening the door, and noiselessly letting down the steps, "Do you alight, sir?"

"Who—a—have you room for me, and my fellows there?"

"Oh yes, sir! certainly. Shall I show you into the coffee-room, sir?"

"The coffee-room? Curse the coffee-room, sir! Do you suppose I'm a commercial traveler? Show me into a private room, sir!" The waiter bowed low; and in silent surprise led Mr. Titmouse to a very spacious and elegantly furnished apartment—where, amidst the blaze of six wax candles, and attended by three waiters, he supped an hour or two afterward, in great state—retiring about eleven o'clock to his apartment, overcome with fatigue, and brandy and water: having fortunately escaped the indignity of being forced to sit in the same room where an English nobleman, one or two members of parliament, and a couple of foreign princes, were sitting sipping their claret, some writing letters, and others coming over the evening papers. About noon, the next day, he called upon the Earl of Dreddlington; and, though, under ordinary circumstances, his lordship would have considered the visit rather unseasonable, he nevertheless received his fortunate and now truly distinguished kinsman with the most urbane cordiality. At the Earl's suggestion, and with Mr. Gammon's concurrence, Titmouse, within about a week after his arrival in town, took chambers in the Albany, together with the elegant furniture which had belonged to their late tenant, a young officer of distinction, who had shortly before suddenly gone abroad upon a diplomatic mission. Mr. Titmouse soon began to feel, in various ways, the distinction which was attached to his name—commencing, as he did at once, the gay and brilliant life of a man of high fashion, and under the august auspices of the Earl of Dreddlington. Like a cat, shod with walnut-shells by some merry young scapegrace, doubtless feels more and more astonished and excited at the clatter it makes in scampering up and down the bare echoing floors and staircases; so, in some sort, was it with Titmouse, and the sudden and amazing collet with which all his appearances and movements were attended in the regions of fashion. 'Tis a matter of indifference to a fool, whether you laugh with him or at him; so as that you do but laugh, an observation which will account for much of the conduct both of Lord Dreddlington and Titmouse. In this short life, and dull world, the thing is, to create a sensation, never mind how; and every opportunity of doing so should be gratefully seized hold of, and improved to the uttermost, by those who have nothing else to do and have an inclination to distinguish themselves from the common herd of mankind. Lord Dreddlington had got so inflated by the attention he excited, that he set down everything he witnessed to the score of deference and admiration. His self-conceit was so intense, that it consumed every vestige of sense he had about him. He stood in solitary grandeur upon the lofty pillar of his pride, inaccessible to ridicule, and impenetrable indeed of its approach, like some "on a monument smiling at" seers. Indeed,

"His soul was like a star, and dwelt apart."

He did not conceive it possible for any one to laugh at him, or anything he might choose to do, or any one he might think fit to associate with and introduce to the notice of society—which kind office he forthwith performed for Titmouse, with whose odd person, and somewhat eccentric dress and demeanor, his lordship (who imagined that the same operation was going on in the minds of other people) was growing daily more familiar. Thus, that which had at first so shocked him, he got at length thoroughly reconciled to, and began to suspect whether it was not assumed by Titmouse out of a daring scorn for the intrusive opinions of the world, which showed a loftiness of spirit akin to his own. Beside, in another point of view—suppose the manner and appearance of Titmouse were ever so absurd, so long as his lordship chose to tolerate them, who should venture to gainsay them? So the earl asked him frequently to dinner; took him with them when his lordship and lady Cecilia went out in the evenings; gave him a seat in his carriage in going down to the House; and invited him, to accompany him and lady Cecilia when they either drove or rode round the Park; as to which latter, Titmouse's assiduous attention at the riding-school enabled him to appear on horseback without being glaringly unequal to the management of his horse, which, however, he once or twice contrived to give an inclination toward backing upon those of lady Cecilia and the Earl. Titmouse happening to let fall, at the Earl's table that he had that day ordered an elegant chariot to be built for him, his lordship intimated that a cab was the usual turn-out of a bachelor man of fashion; whereupon Titmouse the next day countermanded his order, and was fortunate enough to secure a cab which had just been completed for a young nobleman who was unable to pay for it, and whom, consequently, the builder did not care about disappointing. He soon provided himself with a great horse and a little tiger. What pen can do justice to the feelings with which he first sat down in that cab, yielding upon its well-balanced springs, took the reins from his little tiger, and then heard him jump up behind! As it was a trifle too early for the Park, he suddenly bethought himself of exhibiting his splendors before the establishment of Mr. Tag-rag; so he desired his little imp behind to run and summon his valet, who in a trice came down; and in answer to a question, "whether there was n't something wanting from a draper or hosiery," was informed glibly, that six dozen of best cambric pocket handkerchiefs, a dozen or two pair of white kid gloves, half a dozen stocks, and various other items were "wanting"—(i. e. by the valet himself, for Titmouse was already sufficiently provided.) Off, however, he drove, and succeeded at length in reaching the Oxford street establishment, before the door of which five or six carriages were standing. I should say that, at the moment of Mr. Titmouse's strutting into that scene of his former miserable servitude, he experienced a gush of delight which was sufficient to efface all recollection of the misery, privation and oppression endured in his early days. There was presently an evident flutter among the gentlemen engaged behind the counter—for it must be "the great Mr. Titmouse!" Tag-rag, catching sight of him, bounced out of his little room, and bustled up to him through the crowd of customers, bowing, scraping, blushing, and rubbing his hands, full of pleasurable excitement, and exhibiting the most profound obsequiousness. "Hope you're well, sir," he commenced in a low tone, but instantly added, in a louder tone, observing that Titmouse had come upon business, "what can I have the honor to do for you, sir, this morning?" And handing him a stool, Tag-rag, with a respectful air, received a very liberal order from Mr. Titmouse, and minuted it down in his memorandum book.

"Dear me, sir, is that your cab?" said Tag-rag, as having accompanied Titmouse, bowing every step, to the door, they both stood there for a moment, "I never saw such a beautiful turn-out in my life, sir!"

"Ye—a—a. Pretty well—pretty well; but that young rascal of mine's dirtied one of his boots a little—darn him!" and he looked terrors at the tiger.

"Oh dear!—so he has; shall I wipe it off, sir? Do let me!"

"No, it don't signify much. By the way, Mr. Tag-rag," added Mr. Titmouse, in a drawing way, "all well—at—at—demme if I've not this moment forgot the name of your place in the country?"

"Satin Lodge, sir," said Tag-rag, meekly, but with infinite inward uneasiness.

"Oh—ay, to be sure. One sees, 'pon my soul, such a lot of places—but—all well?"

"All very well, indeed, sir; and constantly talking of you, sir."

"Ah—well! My compliments"—here he drew on his second glove, and moved toward his cab, Tag-rag accompanying him—"glad they're well. If ever I'm driving that way—good day!" In popped Titmouse—crack went his whip—away darted the horse—Tag-rag following it with an admiring and anxious eye.

As Mr. Titmouse sat in his new vehicle, on his way to the Park, dressed in the extreme of the mode, his glossy hat perched sideways on his bushy, well-oiled, but somewhat mottled hair; his waistcoat lined with velvet; his full satin stock, spangled with inwrought gold flowers, and with two splendid pinks, connected together with delicate double gold chains; his shirt-collars turned down over his stock; his chased gold eyeglass stuck in his right eye; the stiff wristbands of his shirt turned back over his coat cuffs; and his hands in snowy kid gloves, holding his whip and reins: when he considered the exquisite figure he must thus present to the eye of all beholders, and gave them credit for gazing at him with the same feelings which similar sights had, but a few months before, called forth in his despairing breast, his little cap of happiness was full, and even brimming over. This, though I doubt whether it was a just reflection, was still a very natural one; for he knew what his own feelings were, though not how weak and absurd they were, and of course judged others by himself. If the Marquis of Whigborough, with his £200,000 a-year, and 5000 independent voters at his command, were on his way down to the House, absorbed with anxiety as to the effect of the final threat he was going to make to the Minister, that, unless he had a few strawberry leaves promised him, he would feel it his duty to record his vote against the great bill for "Giving Every Body Every Thing," which stood for a third reading that evening; or if the great Duke of Thunderbolt, a glance of whose eye, or a wave of whose hand, would lift up an European war, and who was balancing in his mind the fate of millions of mankind, as depending upon his fiat for peace or war—I say that if both or either of these personages had passed or met Titmouse, in their cabs, which they were mechanically urging onward, so absorbed the while with their own thoughts, that they scarce knew whether they were in a cab or on a handbarrow, in which latter, had it been before their gates, either of them might in his abstraction have seated himself; Titmouse's superior acquaintance with human nature assured him that the sight of his tip-top turn-out could not fail of attracting their attention, and setting their pride. Whether Milton, if cast on a desolate island, but with the means of writing Paradise Lost, would have done so, had he been certain that no human eye would ever peruse a line of it; or whether Mr. Titmouse, had he been suddenly deposited, in his splendid cab, in the midst of the desert of Sahara, with not one of his species to fix an envious eye upon him, would nevertheless have experienced a great measure of satisfaction, I am not prepared to say. As, however, every condition of life has its mixture of good and evil, so, if Titmouse had been placed in the midst of the aforesaid desert at the time when he was last before the reader, instead of dashing along Oxford Street, he would have escaped certain difficulties and dangers which he presently encountered. Had an ape, not acquainted with the science of driving, been put into Titmouse's place, he would probably have driven much in the same style, though he would have had greatly the advantage over his rival in respect of his simple and natural appearance; being, to the eye of correct taste, "when unadorned, adorned the most." Mr. Titmouse, in spite of the assistance to his sight which he derived from his glass, was continually coming into collision with the vehicles which met and passed him, on his way to Cumberland Gate. He got into no fewer than four distinct rows (to say nothing of the flying curses which he received in passing,) between the point I have named and Mr. Tag-rag's premises. But as he was by no means destitute of spirit, he sat in his cab, on these four occasions, cursing and blaspheming like a little fiend, till he almost brought tears of vexation into the eyes of one or two of his opponents, (cads, cab-drivers, watermen, hackney-coachmen, market-gardeners, and draymen,) who unexpectedly found their own weapons—i. e. slang—wielded with such superior power and effect, for once in a way, by a swell—an aristocrat. The more mainly of his opponents were filled with secret respect for the possessor of such powers. Still it was unpleasant for a person of Mr. Titmouse's distinction to be engaged in these conflicts; and he would have given the world to be able to conquer his conceit so far as to summon his little tiger within, and surrender to him the reins. Such a ridiculous confession of his own incapacity, however, he could not think of, and he got into several little disturbances in the Park; after which he drove home: the battered cab had to be taken to the maker's, where the injuries it had sustained were repaired for the trifling sum of twenty pounds.

The eminent position secured for Titmouse by the masterly genius of Mr. Bladdery Pip, was continued and strengthened by much more substantial claims upon the respect of society, possessed by the first-named gentleman. Rumor is a dame that always looks at objects through very strong magnifying glasses; and guided by what she saw, she soon gave out that Titmouse was patron of three boroughs, had a clear rent-roll of thirty thousand a-year, and had already received nearly a hundred thousand pounds in hard cash from the previous proprietor of his estates, as a compensation for the back rents, which that usurper had been for so many years in the receipt of. Then he was very near in succession to the ancient and distinguished Barony of Dreilincourt, and the extensive estates thereto annexed. He was young; by no means ill-looking; and was—unmarried. Under the mask of modesty and eccentricity, it was believed that he concealed great natural acuteness, for the purpose of ascertaining who were his real and who only his pretended friends and well-wishers; and that his noble relatives had given in to his little scheme for the purpose of aiding him in the important discovery upon which he was bent. Infinite effect was thus given to the Earl's introductions. Wherever Titmouse went he found new and delightful acquaintances; and invitations to dinners, balls, routs, soirées, came showering daily into his rooms at the Albany, where also were left innumerable cards, bearing names of very high fashion. All who had daughters or sisters in the market, paid eager and persevering court to Mr. Titmouse, and still more so to the Earl of Dreddlington and Lady Cecilia, his august sponsors; so that—such being the will of that merry jade Fortune—they who had once regarded him as an object only of shuddering disgust and ineffable contempt, and had been disposed to order their servants to show him out again into the streets, were now in a manner, magnified and made honorable by means of their connection with him; or rather, society, through his means, had become suddenly sensible of the commanding qualities and pretensions of the Earl of Dreddlington and the Lady Cecilia. In the ball-room, at Almack's even, how many young men, handsome, accomplished, and of real consequence, applied in vain for the hand of haughty beauty, which Mr. Titmouse had only to ask for, and have! Whose was the opera-box into which he might not drop as a welcome visitor, and be seen lounging in envied familiarity with its fair and brilliant inmates? Were there not mothers of high fashion, of stately pride, of soaring rank, who would have humbled themselves before Titmouse, if thereby he could have been brought a savior to the feet of one of their daughters? But it was not over the fair sex alone that the magic of Mr. Titmouse's name and pretensions had obtained this great and sudden ascendancy; he excited no small attention among men of fashion—great numbers of whom quickly recognised in him one very fit to become their butt and their dupe. What signified it to men secure of their own position in society, that they were seen openly associating with one so outrageously absurd in his dress—and vulgar and ignorant beyond all example? So long as he bled freely, and trotted out briskly and willingly, his eccentricities could be not merely tolerated, but humored. Take, for instance, the gay and popular MARQUIS GANTS-JAUNES DE MILLEFLEURS; but he is worth a word or two of description, because of the position he had contrived to acquire and retain, and the influence which he managed to exercise over a considerable portion of London society. The post he was anxious to secure was that of the leader of ton; and he wished it to appear that that was the sole object of his ambition. While, however, he affected to be entirely engrossed by such matters as devising new and exquisite variations of dress and equipage, he was, in reality, bent upon graver pursuits—upon gratifying his own licentious tastes and inclinations with secrecy and impunity. He despised folly, cultivating and practising only vice, in which he was, in a manner, an epicure.

BARNABY RUDGE

BY CHARLES DICKENS, ESQ.

CHAPTER I.

In the year 1775, there stood upon the borders of Epping Forest, at a distance of about twelve miles from London—measuring from the Standard in Cornhill, or rather from the spot on or near to which the Standard used to be in days of yore—a house of public entertainment, called the Maypole; which fact was demonstrated to all such travellers as could neither read nor write (and sixty-six years ago, a vast number, both of travellers and stay-at-homes, were in this condition) by the emblem reared on the roadside, over against the house, which, if not of those goodly proportions that Maypoles were wont to present in olden times, was a fair young ash, thirty feet in height, and straight as any arrow that ever English yeoman drew.

The Maypole, by which term from henceforth is meant the house, and not its sign—the Maypole was an old building, with more gable-ends than a lazy man would care to count on a sunny day; huge zig-zag chimneys, out of which it seemed as though even smoke could not choose but come in more than naturally fantastic shapes, imparted to it its tortuous progress; and vast stables, gloomy, ruinous, and empty. The place was said to have been built in the days of King Henry the Eighth; and there was a legend, not only that Queen Elizabeth had slept there one night, while upon a hunting excursion, to wit, in a certain oak-panelled room, with a deep bay window, but that next morning, while standing on a mounting block, before the door, with one foot in the stirrup, the virgin monarch had then and there boxed and cuffed an unlucky page for some neglect of duty. The matter-of-fact and doubtful folks, of whom there was a few among the Maypole customers, as unselectly there always are in every little community, were inclined to look upon this tradition as rather apocryphal; but whenever the landlord of that ancient hostelry appealed to the mounting block itself, as evidence, and triumphantly pointed out that there it stood in the same place to that very day, the doubters never failed to be put down by a large majority, and all true believers exulted as in a victory.

Whether these and many other stories of the like nature, were true or untrue, the Maypole was really an old house, a very old house, perhaps as old as it claimed to be, and perhaps older, which will sometimes happen with houses of an uncertain, as with ladies of a certain age. Its windows were olddiamond pane lattices, its floors were sunken and uneven, its ceilings blackened by the hand of time, and heavy with massive beams. Over the doorway was an ancient porch, quaintly and grotesquely carved; and here on summer evenings the more favored customers smoked and drank—ay, and sang many a good song too, sometimes—reposing on two grim-looking, high backed settles, which, like the twin dragons of some fairy tale, guarded the entrance to the mansion.

In the chimneys of the disused rooms, swallows had built their nests for a many a long year, and from earliest spring to latest autumn, whole colonies of sparrows chirped and twittered in the eaves. There were more pigeons about the dreary stable-yard and outbuildings than anybody but the landlord could reckon up. The wheeling and circling flights of runts, fantails, tumblers, and pouters, were perhaps not quite consistent with the grave and sober character of the building; but the monotonous cooing, which never ceased to be raised by some among them, all day long, suited it exactly, and seemed to lull it to rest. With its overhanging stories, drowsy little panes of glass, and front bulging out and projecting over the pathway, the old house looked as if it were nodding in its sleep. Indeed it needed no very great stretch of fancy to detect in it other resemblances to humanity. The bricks of which it was built, had originally been a deep dark red, but had grown yellow and discolored like an old man's skin; the sturdy timbers had decayed like teeth; and here and there the ivy, like a warm garment to comfort it in its age, wrapt its green leaves closely round the time-worn walls.

It was a hale and hearty age, though, still—and in the summer or autumn evenings, when the glow of the setting sun fell upon the oak and chestnut trees of the adjacent forest, the old house, partaking of its lustre, seemed their fit companion, and to have many good years of life in him yet.

The evening with which we have to do, was neither a summer nor an autumn one, but the twilight of a day in March, when the wind howled dismally among the bare branches of the trees, and, rumbling in the wide chimneys and driving the rain against the windows of the Maypole Inn, gave such of its frequenters as chanced to be there at the moment, an undeniable reason for prolonging their stay, and caused the landlord to prophecy that the night would certainly clear at eleven o'clock precisely, which by a remarkable coincidence was the hour at which he always closed his house.

The name of him upon whom the spirit of prophecy thus descended was John Willet, a burly, large-headed man with a fat face, which betokened profound obstinacy and slowness of apprehension, combined with a very strong reliance upon his own merits. It was John Willet's ordinary boast in his more placid moods that if he was slow he was sure; which assertion could in one sense at least be by no means gainsaid, seeing that he was in everything unquestionably the reverse of fast, and withal one of the most dogged and positive fellows in existence—always sure that what he thought or said or did was right, and holding it as a thing quite settled and ordained by the laws of nature and Providence, that anybody who said or did or thought otherwise must be inevitably and of necessity wrong.

Mr. Willet walked slowly up to the window, flattened his fat nose against the cold glass, and, shading his eyes that his sight might not be affected by the ruddy glow of the fire, looked abroad. Then he walked slowly back to his old seat in the chimney-corner, and, composing himself in it with a slight shiver, such as a man might give way to and so acquire an additional relish for the warm blaze, said, looking round upon his guests:

"It'll clear at eleven o'clock. No sooner and no later. Not before and not afterward."

"How do you make out that?" said a little man in the opposite corner. "The moon is past the full, and she rises at nine."

John looked sedately and solemnly at his questioner until he had brought his mind to bear upon the whole observation, and then made answer, in a tone which seemed to imply that the moon was peculiarly his business and nobody else's:

"Never you mind about the moon. Do n't you trouble yourself about her. You let the moon alone, and I'll let you alone."

"No offence, I hope?" said the little man.

Again John waited leisurely until the observation had thoroughly penetrated to his brain, and then replying, "No offence as yet," applied a light to his pipe and smoked in placid silence; now and then casting a sidelong look at a man wrapped in a loose riding-coat with huge cuffs ornamented with tarnished silver lace and large metal buttons, who sat apart from the regular frequenters of the house, and, wearing a hat flapped over his face, which was still further shaded by the hand on which his forehead rested, looked unobscured enough.

There was another guest, who sat, booted and spurred, at some distance from the fire also, and whose thoughts—to judge from his folded arms and knitted brows, and from the unaltered liquor before him—were occupied with other matters than the topics under discussion or the persons who discussed them. This was a young man of about eight-and-twenty, rather above the middle height, and though of a somewhat slight figure, gracefully and strongly made. He wore his own dark hair, and was accoutred in a riding dress, which, together with his large boots (resembling in shape and fashion those worn by our Life Guardsmen at the present day,) showed indisputable traces of the bad condition of the roads. But travel-stained though he was, he was well and even richly attired, and without being over-dressed looked a gallant gentleman.

Lying upon the table beside him, as he had carelessly thrown them down, were a heavy riding-whip and a slouched hat, the latter worn no doubt as being best suited to the inclemency of the weather. There, too, were a pair of pistols in a holster-case, and a short riding cloak. Little of his face was visible, except the long, dark lashes which concealed his downcast eyes; but an air of careless ease and natural gracefulness of demeanor pervaded the figure, and seemed to comprehend even these slight accessories, which were all handsome, and in good keeping.

Toward this young gentleman the eyes of Mr. Willet wandered but once, and then as if in mute inquiry whether he had observed his silent neighbor. It was plain that John and the young gentleman had often met before. Finding that his look was not returned, or indeed observed by the person to whom it was addressed, John gradually concentrated the whole power of his eyes into one focus, and brought it to bear upon the man in the flapped hat, at whom he came to stare in course of time with an intensity so remarkable that it affected his fireside cronies, who all, as with one accord, took their pipes from their lips, and stared with open mouths at the stranger likewise.

The sturdy landlord had a large pair of dull, fish-like eyes, and the little man who had hazarded the remark about the moon (and who was the parish clerk and bell-ringer of Ohigwell; a village hard by,) had little, round, black, shiny eyes like beads; moreover this little man wore at the knees of his rusty black breeches, and on his rusty black coat, and all down his long flapped waistcoat, little queer buttons like nothing except his eyes; but so like them, that as they twinkled and glistened in the light of the fire, which shone too in his bright shoe-buckles, he seemed all eyes from head to foot, and to be gazing with every one of them at the unknown customer. No wonder that a man should grow restless under such an inspection as this, to say nothing of the eyes belonging to short Tom Cobb the general chandler and post-office keeper, and long Phil Parkes the ranger, both of whom, infected by the example of their companions, regarded him of the flapped hat no less attentively.

The stranger became restless; perhaps from being exposed to this raking fire of eyes, perhaps from the nature of his previous meditations—most probably from the latter cause, for, as he changed his position and looked hastily round, he started to find himself the object of such keen regard, and darted an angry and suspicious glance at the fireside group. It had the effect of immediately diverting all eyes to the chimney, except those of John Willet, who, finding himself, as it were, caught in the fact, and not being (as has been already observed) of a very ready nature, remained staring at his guest in a particularly awkward and disconcerted manner.

"Well?" said the stranger.

Well. There was not much in well. It was not a long speech. "I thought you gave an order," said the landlord, after a pause for two or three minutes for consideration.

The stranger took off his hat, and disclosed the hard features of a man of sixty or thereabouts, much weather-beaten and worn by time, and the naturally harsh expression of which was not improved by a dark handkerchief, which was bound tightly round his head, and, while it served the purpose of a wig, shaded his forehead, and almost hid his eyebrows. If it were intended to conceal or divert attention from a deep gash, now healed into an ugly scar, which, when it was first inflicted, must have laid bare his cheekbone, the object was but indifferently attained, for it could scarcely fail to be noted at a glance. His complexion was of a cadaverous hue, and he had a grizzly, jagged beard of some three weeks' date. Such was the figure (very meanly and poorly clad) that now rose from the seat, and, stalking across the room, sat down in a corner of the chimney, which the politeness or fears of the little clerk very readily assigned to him.

"A highwayman!" whispered Tom Cobb, to Parkes the ranger.

"Do you suppose highwaymen do n't dress handsomer than that?" replied Parkes. "It's a better business than you think for, Tom, and highwaymen do n't need or use to be shabby, take my word for it."

Meanwhile, the subject of their speculations had done honor to the house, by calling for some drink, which was promptly supplied by the landlord's son, Joe, a broad-shouldered, strapping young fellow, of twenty, whom it pleased his father still to consider a little boy, and to treat accordingly.

Stretching out his hands to warm them by the blazing fire, the man turned his head toward the company, and after running his eye sharply over them said, in a voice well suited to his appearance,

"What house is that which stands a mile or so from here?"

"Public house?" said the landlord, with his usual deliberation.

"Public house, father!" exclaimed Joe, "where's the public house, within a mile or so of the Maypole? He means the great house—the Warren—naturally and of course. The old, red, brick house, sir, that stands in its own grounds—"

"Ay," said the stranger.

"And that fifteen or twenty years ago, stood in a park, five times as broad, which, with other and richer property, has bit by bit, changed hands and dwindled away—more's the pity!" pursued the young man.

"Maybe," was the reply. "But my question related to the owner. What it has been, I do n't care to know, and what it is, I can see for myself."

The heir-apparent to the Maypole pressed his finger on his lips, and glancing at the young gentleman, already noticed, who had changed his attitude, when the house was first mentioned, replied in a lower tone,

"The owner's name is Haredale, Mr. Geoffrey Haredale, and"—again he glanced in the same direction as before—"and a worthy gentleman, too—hem!"

Paying as little regard to this admonitory cough, as to the significant gesture that had preceded it, the stranger pursued his questioning.

"I turned out of my way, coming here, and took the footpath that crosses the grounds. Who was the young lady that I saw entering a carriage? His daughter?"

"Why, how should I know, honest man?" replied Joe, contriving in the course of some arrangements about the hearth, to advance close to his questioner, and pluck him by the sleeve, "I did n't see the young lady, you know."

Whew! There's the wind again—and rain—well it is a night!

"Rough weather, indeed!" observed the strange man.

"You're used to it?" said Joe, catching at anything which seemed to promise a diversion of the subject.

"Pretty well," returned the other. "About the young lady—has Mr. Haredale a daughter?"

"No, no," said the young fellow, fretfully, "he's a single gentleman—he's—be quiet, can't you, man? Don't you see this talk is not relished yonder?"

Regardless of this whispered remonstrance, and affecting not to hear it, his tormentor provokingly continued:

"Single men have had daughters before now. Perhaps she may be his daughter, though he is not married."

"What do you mean?" said Joe, adding, in an under tone, as he approached him again, "You'll come in for it presently, I know you will!"

"I mean no harm," returned the traveller, boldly, "and have said none that I know of. I ask a few questions—as any stranger may, and not unnaturally—about the inmates of a remarkable house in a neighborhood which is new to me, and you are as agast and disturbed as if I were talking treason against King George. Perhaps you can tell me why, sir, for (as I say) I am a stranger, and this is Greek to me!"

The latter question was addressed to the obvious cause of Joe Willet's discomposure, who had risen and was adjusting his riding-cloak preparatory to stalling abroad. Briefly replying that he could give him no information, the young man beckoned to Joe, and handing him a piece of money in payment of his reckoning, hurried out attended by young Willet himself, who, taking up a candle, followed to light him to the house door.

While Joe was absent on this errand, the elder Willet and his three companions continued to smoke with profound gravity, and in a deep silence, each having his eyes fixed on a huge copper boiler that was suspended over the fire. After some time Joe Willet slowly shook his head, and thereupon his friends slowly shook theirs; but no man withdrew his eyes from the boiler, or altered the solemn expression of his countenance in the slightest degree.

At length Joe returned—very talkative and conciliatory, as though with a strong presentiment that he was going to be found fault with.

"Such a thing as love is!" he said, drawing a chair near the fire, and looking round for sympathy. "He has set off to walk to London—all the way to London. His nag gone lame in riding out here this blessed afternoon, and comfortably littered down in our stable at this minute; and he giving up a good hot supper and our best bed, because Miss Haredale has gone to a masquerade up in town, and he has set his heart upon seeing her! I don't think I could persuade myself to do that, beautiful as she is—but then I'm not in love, (at least I don't think I am,) and that's the whole difference."

"He is in love then?" said the stranger.

"Rather," replied Joe. "He'll never be more in love, and may very easily be less."

"Silence, sir!" cried his father.

"What a chap you are, Joe!" said Long Parkes.

"Such an inconsiderate lad!" murmured Tom Cobb.

"Putting himself forward and wringing the very nose off his own father's face!" exclaimed the parish clerk, metaphorically.

"What does I do?" reasoned poor Joe.

"Silence, sir!" returned his father, "what do you mean by talking, when you see people that are more than two or three times your age, sitting still and silent and not dreaming of saying a word?"

"Why that's the proper time for me to talk, isn't it?" said Joe, rebelliously.

"The proper time, sir!" retorted his father, "the proper time's no time."

"Ah to be sure!" muttered Parkes, nodding gravely to the other two who nodded likewise, observing under their breaths that that was the point.

"The proper time's no time, sir," repeated John Willet; "when I was your age I never talked, I never wanted to talk, I listened and improved myself, that's what I did."

"And you'd find your father rather a tough customer in argument, Joe, if anybody was to try and tackle him"—said Parkes.

"For the matter o' that, Phil!" observed Mr. Willet, blowing a long, thin, spiral cloud of smoke out of the corner of his mouth, and staring at it abstractedly as it floated away; "For the matter o' that, Phil, argument is a gift of Natur. If Natur has gifted a man with powers of argument, a man has a right to make the best of 'em, and has not a right to stand on false delicacy, and deny that he is so gifted; for that is a turning of his back on Natur, a flouting of her, a slighting of her precious caskets, and a proving of one's self to be a swine that is n't worth her scattering pearls before."

The landlord pausing here for a very long time, Mr. Parkes naturally concluded that he had brought his discourse to an end; and therefore, turning to the young man with some austerity, exclaimed:

"You hear what your father says, Joe? You would n't much like to tackle him in argument, I'm thinking, sir."

"—Ir," said John Willet, turning his eyes from the ceiling to the face of his interrupter, and uttering the monosyllable in capitals, to apprise him that he had put in his oar, as the vulgar say, with unbecoming and irreverent haste; "Ir, sir, Natur has fixed upon me the gift of argument, why should I not own to it, and rather glory in the same? Yes, sir, I am a tough customer that way. You are right, sir. My toughness has been proved, sir, in this room many and many a time, as I think you know; and if you don't know," added John, putting his pipe into his mouth again, "so much the better, for I ain't proud and am not going to tell you."

A general murmur from his three cronies, and a general shaking of heads at the copper boiler, assured John Willet that they had had good experience of his powers and needed no further evidence to assure them of his superiority. John smoked with a little more dignity and surveyed them in silence.

"It's all very fine talking," muttered Joe, who had been fidgeting in his chair with divers uneasy gestures. "But if you mean to tell me that I'm never to open my lips—"

"Silence, sir!" roared his father. "No, you never are. When your opinion's wanted, you give it. When you're spoke to, you speak. When your opinion's not wanted and you're not spoke to, don't you give an opinion and don't you speak. The world's undergone a nice alteration since my time, certainly. My belief is that there ain't any boys left—that there is n't such a thing as a boy—that there's nothing now between a male baby and a man—and that all the boys went out with his blessed Majesty King George the Second."

"That's a very true observation, always excepting the young princes," said the parish-clerk, who, as the representative of church and state in that company, held himself bound to the nicest loyalty. "If it's godly and righteous for boys, being of the ages of boys, to behave themselves like boys, then the young princes must be boys and cannot be otherwise."

"Did you ever hear tell of mermaids, sir?" said Mr. Willet.

"Certainly I have," replied the clerk.

"Very good," said Mr. Willet. "According to the constitution of mermaids, so much of a mermaid as is not a woman must be a fish. According to the constitution of young princes, so much of a young prince (if anything) as is not actually an angel, must be godly and righteous. Therefore if it's becoming and godly and righteous in the young princes (as it is at their ages) that they should be boys, they are and must be boys, and cannot by possibility be anything else."

This elucidation of a knotty point being received with such marks of approval as to put John Willet into a good humor, he contented himself with repeating to his son his command of silence, and addressing the stranger, said:

"If you had asked your questions of a grown-up person—of me or any of these gentlemen—you'd have had some satisfaction, and would n't have wasted breath. Miss Haredale is Mr. Geoffrey Haredale's niece."

"Is her father alive?" said the man carelessly.

"No," rejoined the landlord, "he is not alive, and he is not dead—"

"Not dead!" cried the other.

"Not dead in a common sort of way," said the landlord.

The cronies nodded to each other, and Mr. Parkes remarked in an undertone, shaking his head meanwhile as who should say, "let no man contradict me, for I won't believe him," that John Willet was in amazing force to-night, and fit to tackle a Chief Justice.

The stranger suffered a short pause to elapse, and then asked abruptly, "What do you mean?"

"More than you think for, friend," returned John Willet. "Perhaps there's more meaning in them words than you suspect."

"Perhaps there is," said the strange man, gruffly; "but what the devil do you speak in such mysteries for? You tell me first that a man is not alive, nor yet dead—then that he's not dead in a common sort of way—then, that you mean a great deal more than I think for. To tell you the truth, you may do that easily; for so far as I can make out, you mean nothing. What do you mean, I ask again?"

"That," returned the landlord, a little brought down from his dignity by the stranger's surliness, "is a Maypole story, and has been any time these four-and-twenty years. That story is Solomon Daisy's story. It belongs to the house; and nobody but Solomon Daisy has ever told it under this roof, or ever shall—that's more."

The man glanced at the parish-clerk, whose air of consciousness and importance plainly betokened him to be the person referred to, and, observing that he had taken his pipe from his lips, after a very long whiff to keep it alight, and was evidently about to tell his story without further solicitation, gathering his large coat about him, and shrinking further back was almost lost in the gloom of the spacious chimney-corner, except when the flame, struggling from under a great sagot whose weight almost crushed it for the time, shot upward with a strong and sudden glare, and illuminating his figure for a moment, seemed afterward to cast it into deeper obscurity than before.

By this flickering light, which made the old room, with its heavy timbers and pannelled walls, look as if it were built of polished ebony—the wind roaring and howling without, now rattling the latch and creaking the hinges of the stout oaken door, and now driving at the casement as though it would beat it in—by this light, and under circumstances so suspicious, Solomon Daisy began his tale:

"It was Mr. Reuben Haredale, Mr. Geoffrey's elder brother—"

Here he came to a dead stop, and made so long a pause that even John Willett grew impatient and asked why he did not proceed.

"Cob," said Solomon Daisy, dropping his voice, and appealing to the post-office keeper; "what day of the month is this?"

"The nineteenth."

"Of March," said the clerk, bending forward, "the nineteenth of March; that's very strange."

In a low voice they all acquiesced, and Solomon went on:

"It was Mr. Reuben Haredale, Mr. Geoffrey's elder brother, that twenty-two years was the owner of the Warren, which, as Joe has said—not that you remember it Joe, for a boy like you can't do that, but because you have often heard me say so—was then a much larger and better place, and a much more valuable property than it is now. His lady was lately dead, and he was left with one child; the Miss Haredale you have been inquiring about; who was then scarcely a year old."

Although the speaker addressed himself to the man who had shown so much curiosity about this same family, and made a pause here as if expecting some exclamation of surprise or encouragement, the latter made no remark, nor gave any indication that he heard or was interested in what was said. Solomon therefore turned to his old companions, whose noses were brightly illuminated by the deep red glow from the bowls of their pipes; assured, by long experience, of their attention, and resolved to show his sense of such indecent behavior.

"Mr. Haredale," said Solomon, turning his back upon the strange man, "left this place when his lady died, feeling it lonely like, and went up to London, where he stopped some months; but finding that place as lonely as this—as I suppose and have always heard say—he suddenly came back again with his little girl to the Warren, bringing with him beside, that day, only two women servants, and his steward, and a gardener."

Mr. Daisy stopped to take a whiff at his pipe, which was going out, and then proceeded—at first in a snuffing tone, occasioned by keen enjoyment of the tobacco and strong pulling at the pipe, and afterward with increasing distinctness:

"—Bringing with him two women servants, and his steward and a gardener. The rest stopped behind up in London, and were to follow next day. It happened that that night, an old gentleman who lived at Chigwell-row, and had long been poorly, deceased, and an order came to me at half after twelve o'clock at night to go and toll the passing bell."

There was a movement in the little group of listeners, sufficiently indicative of the strong repugnance any one of them would have felt to have turned out at such a time upon such an errand. The clerk felt and understood it, and pursued his theme accordingly.

"It was a dreary thing, especially as the grave-digger was laid up in his bed, from long working in a damp soil and sitting down to take his dinner on cold tombstones, and I was consequently under obligation to go alone, for it was too late to hope to get any other companion. However, I was n't unprepared for it; as the old gentleman had often made it a request that the bell should be tolled as soon as possible after the breath was out of his body, and he had been expected to go for some days. I put as good a face upon it as I could, and muffled myself up, (for it was mortal cold,) started out with a lighted lantern in one hand and the key of the church in the other."

At this point of the narrative, the dress of the strange man rustled as if he had turned himself to hear more distinctly. Slightly pointing over his shoulder, Solomon elevated his eyebrows and nodded a silent inquiry to Joe whether this was the case. Joe shaded his eyes with his hand and peered into the corner, but could make out nothing, and so shook his head.

"It was just such a night as this; blowing a hurricane, raining heavily, and very dark—I often think now, darker than I ever saw it before or since; that may be my fancy, but the houses were all close shut and the folks in-doors, and perhaps there is only one other man who knows how dark it really was. I got into the church, chained the door back so that it should keep ajar—for to tell the truth, I did n't like to be shut in there alone—and putting my lantern on the stone seat in the little corner where the bell-ropes is, sat down beside it to trim the candle."

"I sat down to trim the candle, and when I had done so, I could not persuade myself to get up again and go about my work. I do n't know how it was, but I thought of all the ghost stories I had ever heard, even those that I had heard when I was a boy at school, and had forgotten long ago; and they did n't come into my mind one after another but all crowding at once, like. I recollected one story there was in the village, how that on a certain night in the year (it might be that very night for anything I knew,) all the dead people came out of the ground and sat at the heads of their own graves till morning. This made me think how many people I had known were buried between the church door and the churchyard gate, and what a dreadful thing it would be to have to pass among them and know them again, so earthy and unlike themselves. I had known all the niches and arches in the church, from a child; still I could n't persuade myself that those were their natural shadows, which I saw on the pavement, but felt sure there were some ugly figures hiding among 'em and peeping out. Thinking on in this way, I began to think of the old gentleman who was just dead, and I could have sworn, as I looked up the dark chancel, that I saw him in his usual place, wrapping his shroud around him, and shivering as if he felt it cold. All this time I sat listening, and hardly dared to breathe. At length I started up and took the bell-ropes in my hands. At that minute there rang—not that bell, for I had hardly touched the rope—but another!

"I heard the ringing of another bell, and a deep bell too, plainly. It was only for an instant, and even then the wind carried the sound away, but I heard it. I listened for a long time, but it rang no more. I had heard of corpse candles, and at last I persuaded myself that this must be a corpse bell tolling of itself at midnight for the dead. I tolled my bell—how, or how long, I do n't know—and ran home to bed as fast as I could touch the ground."

"I was up early next morning, after a restless night, and told the story to my neighbors. Some were serious, and some made light of it: I do n't think anybody believed it real. But that morning, Mr. Reuben Haredale was found murdered in his bed-chamber, and in his hand was a piece of the cord attached to an alarm-bell, outside the roof, which hung in his room, and had been cut asunder, no doubt by the murderer, when he seized it."

"That was the bell I heard."

"A bureau was found opened, and a cash-box, which Mr. Haredale had brought down that day, and was supposed to contain a large sum of money, was gone. The steward and gardener were both missing, and both suspected for a long time, but they were never found, though hunted far and wide. And far enough they might have looked for poor Mr. Rudge, the steward, whose body—scarcely to be recognized, but by his clothes, and the watch and ring he wore—was found, months afterward, at the bottom of a piece of water, in the grounds, with a deep gash in the breast, where he had been stabbed with a knife. He was only partly dressed; and people all agreed that he had been sitting up reading in his own room, where there were many traces of the blood, and was suddenly fallen upon and killed, before his master."

"Everybody now knew that the gardener must be the murderer, and though he has never been heard of, from that time to this, he will be, mark my words. The crime was committed this day two-and-twenty years—on the nineteenth of March, one thousand seven hundred and thirty-three. On the nineteenth of March, in some year, no matter when—I know it, I am sure of it, for we have always, in some strange way or other, been brought back to the subject on that day ever since—on the nineteenth of March, in some year, sooner or later, that man will be discovered."

CHAPTER II.

"A strange story!" said the man, who had been the cause of the narration. "Stranger still, if it comes about as you predict. Is that all?"

A question so unexpected, nettled Solomon Daisy not a little. By dint of relating the story very often, and ornamenting it (according to village report) with a few flourishes, suggested by the various hearers, from time to time, he had come by degrees to tell it with great effect; and "is that all?" after the climax, was not what he was accustomed to.

"Is that all!" he repeated, "yes, that's all, sir. And enough, too, I think."

"I think so too. My horse, young man. He is but a hack, hired from a road-side posting house, but he must carry me to London, to-night."

"To-night!" said Joe.

"To-night," returned the other. "What do you stare at? This tavern would seem to be a House of Call, for all the gaping idlers of the neighborhood!"

At this remark, which evidently had reference to the scrutiny he had undergone, as mentioned in the foregoing chapter, the eyes of John Willett and his friends were diverted with marvellous rapidity to the copper boiler again—Not so with Joe, who being a mettlesome fellow, returned the stranger's angry glance with a steady look, and rejoined:

"It's not a very bold thing to wonder at your going out to-night—surely you have been asked such a harmless question in an inn before, and in better weather than this. I thought you might n't know the way, as you seem strange to this part."

"The way—" repeated the other, irritably.

"Yes. Do you know it?"

"I'll—Humph!—I'll find it," replied the man, waving his hand and turning on his heel. "Landlord, take the reckoning here."

John Willett did as he was desired, for on that point he was seldom slow, except in the particulars of giving change, and testing the goodness of any piece of coin that was offered to him, by the application of his teeth or his tongue, or some other test, or, in doubtful cases, in a long series of tests, terminating in its rejection. The guest then wrapt his garments about him, so as to shelter himself as effectually as he could from the rough weather, and without any word or sign of farewell, betook himself to the stable yard. Here Joe (who had left the room, on the conclusion of their short dialogue) was protecting himself and the horse from the rain, under the shelter of an old pent-house roof.

"He's pretty much of my opinion," said Joe, patting the horse upon the neck; "I'll wager that your stopping here, to-night, would please him better than it would please me."

"He and I are of different opinions, as we have been more than once on our way here," was the short reply.

"So I was thinking, before you came out, for he has felt your spurs, poor beast."

The stranger adjusted his coat collar about his face, and made no answer.

"You'll know me again, I see," he said, marking the young fellow's earnest gaze, when he had sprung into the saddle.

"The man's worth knowing, master, who travels a road he don't know, mounted on a jaded horse, and leaves good quarters to do it on such a night as this."

"Yet have sharp eyes, and a sharp tongue, I find."

"Both I hope by nature, but the last grows rusty sometimes, for the want of using."

"Use the first less, too, and keep their sharpness for your sweethearts, boy," said the man.

So saying, he shook his hand from the bridle, struck him roughly on the head with the butt-end of his whip, and galloped away; dashing through the mud and darkness with a headlong speed, which few badly-mounted horsemen would have cared to venture, even had they been thoroughly acquainted with the country, and which, to one who knew nothing of the way he rode, was attended at every step with great hazard and danger.

The roads, even within twelve miles of London, were at that time ill-paved, seldom repaired, and very badly made. The way this rider traversed, had been ploughed up by the wheels of heavy wagons, and rendered rotten by the frosts and thaws of the preceding winter, or possibly of many winters. Great holes and gaps had worn into the soil, which being now filled with water from the late rains, were not easily distinguishable, even by day; and a plunge into any one of them, might have brought down a surer-footed horse, than the poor beast now urged forward to the utmost extent of his powers. Sharp flints and stones rolled from under his hoofs continually; the rider could scarcely see beyond the animal's head, or further on either side than his own arm would have extended. At that time, too, all the roads in the neighborhood of the metropolis were infested by foot-pads, or highwaymen, and it was a night, of all others, in which any evil-disposed person of this class might have pursued his unlawful calling with little fear of detection.

Still, the traveller dashed forward at the same reckless pace, regardless alike of the dirt and wet which flew about his head, the profound darkness of the night, and the probability of encountering some desperate characters abroad. At every turn and angle, even where a deviation from the direct course might have been least expected, and could not possibly be seen until he was close upon it, he guided the bridle with an unerring hand, and kept the middle of the road. Thus he sped onward, raising himself in the stirrups, leaning his body forward until it almost touched the horse's neck, and flourishing his heavy whip above his head with the fervor of a madman.

There are times when the elements being in unusual commotion, those who are bent on daring enterprises, or agitated by great thoughts, whether of good or evil, feel a mysterious sympathy with the tumult of nature, and are roused into corresponding violence. In the midst of thunder, lightning, and storm, many tremendous deeds have been committed; men, self-possessed before have given a sudden loose to passions they could no longer control. The demons of wrath and despair have striven to emulate those who ride the whirlwind and direct the storm; and man, lashed into madness, with the roaring winds and boiling waters, has become for the time as wild and merciless as the elements themselves.

Whether the traveller was possessed by thoughts which the fury of the night had heated and stimulated into a quicker current, or was merely impelled by some strong motive to reach his journey's end, on he swept more like a hunted phantom than a man, nor checked his pace until arriving at some cross roads, one of which led by a longer route to the place whence he had lately started, he bore down so suddenly upon a vehicle, which was coming toward him, that in the effort to avoid it, he well-nigh pulled his horse upon his haunches, and narrowly escaped being thrown.

"Yohe!" cried the voice of a man. "What's that? who goes there?"

"A friend!" replied the traveller.

"A friend!" repeated the voice. "Who the devil calls himself a friend and rides like that, abusing Heaven's gifts in the shape of horseflesh, and endangering—not only his own neck, which might be no great matter, but the necks of other people?"

"You have a lantern there, I see," said the traveller, dismounting, "lend it me for a moment. You have wounded my horse, I think, with your shaft or wheel."

"Wounded him!" cried the other, "if I have n't killed him, it's no fault of yours. What do you mean by galloping along the king's highway like that, eh?"

"Give me the light," returned the traveller, snatching it from his hand, "and do n't ask idle questions of a man who is in a mood for talking."

"If you had said you were in no mood for talking before, I should perhaps have been in no mood for lighting," said the voice, "however, as it's the poor horse that's damaged, and not you, one of you is welcome to the light at all events—but it's not the sturdy one."

The traveller returned no answer to this speech, but holding the light near to his panting and reeking beast, examined him in limb and carcase. Meanwhile the other man sat very composedly in his vehicle, which was a kind of chaise, with a depository for a large bag of tools, and watched his proceedings with a careful eye.

The looker-on was a round, red-faced, sturdy yeoman, with a double chin, and a voice husky with good living, good sleeping, good humor, and good health. He was past the prime of life, but Father Time is not always a hard parent, and though he carries for none of his children, often lays his hand lightly upon those who have used him well; making them old men and women inexorably enough, but leaving their hearts and spirits young, and in full vigor. With such people, the gray head is but the impression of the old fellow's hand, in giving them his blessing, and every wrinkle but a notch in the quiet calendar of a well-spent life.

The person whom the traveller had thus so abruptly encountered, was off this kind, bluff, hale, hearty, and in a green old age: at peace with himself, and evidently disposed to be so with all the world. Although muffled up in divers coats and handkerchiefs—one of which, passed over his crown and tied in a convenient crease of his double chin, secured his three-cornered hat and bob-wig from blowing off his head—there was no disguising his plump and comfortable figure; neither did certain dirty finger-marks upon his face, give it any other than an odd and comical expression, through which its natural good humor shone with undiminished lustre.

"He is not hurt," said the traveller, at length, raising his head and the light together.

"You have found that out at last, have you?" rejoined the old man. "My eyes have seen more fight than yours, but I would n't change with you."

"What do you mean?"

"Mean! I could have told you that he was n't hurt five minutes ago. Give me the light, friend; ride forward at a gentler pace; and good night."

In handing up the lantern, the man necessarily cast its rays full on the speaker's face. Their eyes met at the instant. He suddenly dropped it and crushed it with his foot.

"Saw you never a locksmith before, that you start as if you had come upon a ghost?" cried the old man in the chaise, "or is this," he added hastily, thrusting his hand into the tool basket and drawing out a hammer, "a scheme for robbing me? I know these roads, friend. When I travel them, I carry nothing but a few shillings, and not a crown's worth of them. I tell you plainly, to save us both trouble, that there's nothing to be got from me, but a pretty stout arm, considering my years, and this tool which mayhap from long acquaintance with, I can use pretty briskly. You shall not have it all your own way, I promise you, if you play at that game." With these words he stood upon the defensive.

"I am not what you take me for, Gabriel Vardon," replied the other.

"Then what and who are you?" returned the locksmith.

"You know my name it seems. Let me know yours."

"I have not gained the information from any confidence of yours, but from the inscription on your cart, which tells it to all the town," replied the traveller.

"You have better eyes for that than you had for your horse, then," said Vardon, descending aimlessly from his chaise: "who are you? Let me see your face."

While the locksmith alighted, the traveller had regained his saddle, from which he now confronted the old man, who, moving as the horse moved in chafing under the tightened rein, kept close beside him.

"Let me see your face, I say."

"Stand off?"

"No masquerading tricks," said the locksmith, "and tales at the club to-morrow how Gabriel Vernon was frightened by a surly voice and a dark night. Stand—let me see your face."

Finding that further resistance would only involve him in a personal struggle with an antagonist by no means to be despised, the traveller threw back his coat, and stooping down looked steadily at the locksmith.

Perhaps two men more powerfully contrasted, never opposed each other face to face. The ruddy features of the locksmith, so set off and heightened the excessive pallor of the man on horseback that he looked like a bloodless ghost, while the moisture which hard riding had brought out upon his skin, hung there in dark and heavy drops, like the dew of agony and death. The countenance of the old locksmith was lighted up with the smile of one expecting to detect in this unpromising stranger some latent roguery of eye or lip which should reveal a familiar person in that arch disguise, and spoil his jest. The face of the other, sullen and fierce, but shrinking too, was that of a man who stood at bay; while his firmly closed jaws, his puckered mouth, and more than all a certain stealthy motion of the hand within his breast, seemed to announce a desperate purpose very foreign to acting, or child's play.

Thus they regarded each other for some time in silence.

"Humph!" he said, when he had scanned his features:

"I do n't know you."

"Do n't desire to?" returned the other, muffling himself as before.

"I do n't," said Gabriel; "to be plain with you, friend, you do n't carry in your countenance a letter of recommendation."

"It's not my wish," said the traveller. "My humor is to be avoided."

"Well," said the locksmith, bluntly, "I think you'll have your humor."

"I will, at any cost," rejoined the traveller. "In proof of it, lay this to heart—that you were never in such peril of your life as you have been within these few moments; when you are within five minutes of breathing your last, you will not be nearer death than you have been to-night!"

"Ay!" said the sturdy locksmith.

"Ay! and a violent death."

"From whose hand?"

"From mine," replied the traveller.

With that he put spurs to his horse, and rode away; at first clashing heavily through the mire at a smart trot, but gradually increasing in speed until the last sound of his horse's hoofs died away upon the wind, when he was again hurrying on at the same furious gallop which had been his pace when the locksmith first encountered him.

Gabriel Vardon remained standing in the road with the broken lantern in his hand, listening in stupefied silence until no sound reached his ear but the moaning of the wind, and the fast-falling rain, when he struck himself one or two smart blows in the breast by way of rousing himself, and broke into an exclamation of surprise.

"What is the name of wonder can this fellow be? a madman? a highwayman? a cut throat? If he had not scoured off so fast, we'd have seen who was in the most danger, he or I. I never nearer death than I have been to-night! I hope I may be no nearer to it for a score of years to come—if so, I'll be content to be no further from it. My stars!—a pretty brag this to a stout man—pooh, pooh!"

Gabriel resumed his seat, and looking wistfully upon the road by which the traveller had come, murmuring in a half whisper:

"The Maypole—two miles to the Maypole. I came the other road from the Warren after a long day's work at locks and bells, on purpose that I should not come by the Maypole and break my promise to Martha by looking in—there's resolution! It would be dangerous to go on to London without a light, and it's four miles, and a good half-mile besides, to the Halfway-House, and between this and that is the very place where one needs a light most. Two miles to the Maypole! I told Martha I would n't; I said I would n't, and I did n't—there's resolution!"

Repeating these two last words very often, as if to compensate for the little resolution he was going to show by piquing himself on the great resolution he had shown, Gabriel Vardon quietly turned back, determining to get a light at the Maypole, and to take nothing but a light.

When he got to the Maypole, however, and Joe, responding to his well known hail, came running out to the horse's head, leaving the door open behind him, and disclosing a delicious perspective of warmth and brightness—when the ruddy gleam of the fire streaming through the old red curtains of the common room, seemed to bring with it as part of itself, a pleasant hum of voices, and flaming odor of steaming grog and rare tobacco, all steeped as it were in the cheerful glow—when the shadows sitting across the curtain, showed that those inside had risen from their snug seat, and were making room in the snugest corner (how well he knew that corner!) for the honest locksmith, and a broad glare suddenly streaming up, bespoke the goodness of the crackling log from which a brilliant train of sparks was doubtless at that moment whirling up the chimney in honor of his coming—when, superadded to these enticements, there stole upon him from the distant kitchen a gentle sound of frying, with a musical clatter of plates and dishes, and a savory smell that made even the boisterous wind a perfume, Gabriel felt his firmness oozing rapidly away. He tried to look stoically at the tavern, but his features would relax into a look of fondness. He turned his head the other way, and the cold black country seemed to frown him off, and to drive him for a refuge into its hospitable arms.

"The merciful man, Joe," said the locksmith, "is merciful to his beast. I'll get out for a little while."

And how unnatural it seemed for a sober man to be plodding wearily along through miry roads, encountering the rude buffets of the wind and pelting of the rain, when there was a clean floor covered with crisp white sand, a well-swept hearth, a blazing fire, a table decorated with white cloth, bright pewter flagons, and other tempting preparations for a well-cooked meal—when there were these things, and company disposed to make the most of them, all ready to his hand, and entreating him to enjoyment!

Such were the locksmith's thoughts when first seated in the snug corner; and slowly recovering from a pleasant defect of vision—pleasant, because occasioned by the wind blowing in his eyes, which made it matter of sound policy and duty to himself that he should take refuge from the weather, and tempted him for the same reason to aggravate a slight cough, and declare he felt but poorly. Such were still his thoughts more than a full hour afterward, when, supper over, he still sat with shining jovial face in the same warm nook, listening to the cricket-like chirrup of little Solomon Daisy, and bearing no unimportant or slightly respected part in the social gossip round the Maypole fire.

"I wish he may be an honest man, that's all," said Solomon, winding up a variety of speculations relative to the stranger, concerning whom Gabriel had compared notes with the company, and so raised a grave discussion; "I wish he may be an honest man."

"So we all do, I suppose, do n't we?" observed the locksmith.

"I do n't," said Joe.

"No!" cried Gabriel.

"No. He struck me with his whip, the coward, when he was mounted and I afoot, and I should be better pleased that he turned out what I think him."

"And what may that be, Joe?"

"No good, Mr. Vardon. You may shake your head father, but I say no good, and will say no good, and I would say no good a hundred times over, if that would bring him back to have the drubbing he deserves."

"Hold your tongue sir," said John Willet.

"I won't, father. It's all along of you that he dared to do what he did. Seeing me treated like a child, and put down like a fool, he plucks up a heart and has a fling at a fellow that he thinks—and may well think too—has n't a grain of spirit. But he's mistaken as I'll show him, and as I'll show all of you before long."

"Does the boy know what he's a saying of?" cried the astonished John Willet.

"Father," returned Joe, "I know what I say and mean well—better than you do when you hear me. I can bear with you, but I cannot bear the contempt that your treating me in the way you do brings upon me from others every day. Look at other young men of my age. Have they no liberty, no will, no right to speak? Are they obliged to sit munched, and are they ordered about till they are the laughing-stock of young and old? I'm a bye-word all over Chigwell, and I say—and it's fairer my saying so now than waiting till you are dead, and I have got your money—I say that before long I shall be driven to break such bounds, and that when I do, it won't be me that you'll have to blame, but your own self, and no other."

John Willet was so amazed by the exasperation and boldness of his hopeful son, that he sat as one bewildered, staring in a ludicrous manner at the boiler, and endeavoring, but quite ineffectually, to collect his tardy thoughts, and invent an answer. The guests, scarcely less disturbed, were equally at a loss, and at length with a variety of muttered, half-expressed condolences and pieces of advice, rose to depart, being at the same time slightly muddled with liquor.

The honest locksmith alone addressed a few words of coherent and sensible advice to both parties, urging John Willet to remember that Joe was nearly arrived at man's estate, and should not be ruled with too tight a hand, and exhorting Joe himself to bear with his father's caprices, and rather endeavor to turn them aside by temperate remonstrance than by ill-timed rebellion. This advice was received as such advice usually is. On John Willet it made almost as much impression as on the sign outside the door, while Joe who took it in the best part, avowed himself more obliged than he could well express, but politely intimated his intention nevertheless of taking his own course uninfluenced by anybody.

"You have always been a very good friend to me, Mr. Vardon," he said, as they stood without the porch, and the locksmith was equipping himself for his journey home; "I take it very kind in you to say all this, but the time's nearly come when the Maypole and I must part company."

"Roving stones gather no moss, Joe," said Gabriel.

"Nor mile-stones much," replied Joe. "I'm little better than one here, and see about as much of the world."

"Then what would you do, Joe," pursued the locksmith, stroking his chin reflectively, "What would you be? where could you go, you see?"

"I must trust to chance, Mr. Vardon."

"A bad thing to trust to, Joe. I don't like it. I always tell my girl, when we talk about a husband for her, never to trust to chance, but to make sure beforehand that she has a good man and true, and then chance will neither make her nor break her. What are you fidgeting about there, Joe? Nothing gone in the harness I hope?"

"No, no," said Joe—finding, however, something very engrossing to do in the way of strapping and buckling—"Miss Dolly quite well?"

"Hearty, thanks. She looks pretty enough to be well, and good too."

"She's always both, sir."

"So she is, thank God!"

"I hope"—said Joe, after some hesitation, "that you won't tell this story against me—this of my having been beat like the boy they'd make of me—at all events, till I have met this man again and settled the account—it'll be a better story then."

"Why, who should I tell it to?" returned Gabriel. "They know it here, and I'm not likely to come across anybody else who would care about it."

"That's true enough"—said the young fellow, with a sigh. "I quite forgot that. Yes, that's true!"

So saying, he raised his face, which was very red—no doubt from the exertion of strapping and buckling as afore-said—and giving the reins to the old man, who had by this time taken his seat, sighed again and bade him good night.

"Good night!" cried Gabriel. "Now think better of what we have just been speaking of, and don't be rash, there's a good fellow; I have an interest in you and would n't have you cast yourself away. Good night!"

Returning his cheery farewell with cordial good will, Joe Willet lingered until the sound of wheels ceased to vibrate in his ears, and then shaking his head mournfully, re-entered the house.

Gabriel Vardon wended his way toward London, thinking of a great many things, and most of all of flaming terms in which to relate his adventure, and so account satisfactorily to Mrs. Vardon for visiting the Maypole, despite certain solemn covenants between himself and that lady. Thinking begets not only thought but drowsiness occasionally, and the more the locksmith thought, the more sleepy he became.

A man may be very sober—or at least firmly set upon his legs on that neutral ground which lies between the confines of perfect sobriety and slight tipsiness—and yet feel a strong tendency to mingle up present circumstances with others which have no manner of connexion with them; to confound all consideration of persons, things, times, and places; and to jumble his disjointed thoughts together in a kind of mental kaleidoscope, producing combinations as unexpected as they are transitory. This was Gabriel Vardon's state, as nodding in his dog sleep, and leaving his horse to pursue a road with which he was well acquainted, he got over the ground unconsciously, and drew nearer and nearer home. He roused himself once when the horse stopped until the turnpike gate was opened, and had cried a lusty "good night" to the toll-keeper, but then he woke out of a dream about picking a lock in the stomach of the Great Mogul, and even when he did wake, mixed up the turnpike man with his mother-in-law who had been dead twenty years. It is not surprising, therefore, that he soon relapsed, and jogged heavily along, quite insensible to his progress.

And now he approached the great city, which lay outstretched before him like a dark shadow on the ground, reddening the sluggish air with a deep, dull light, that told of labyrinths of public ways and shops, and swarms of busy people. Approaching nearer and nearer yet, this halo began to fade, and the causes which produced it slowly to develop themselves. Long lines of lighted streets might be faintly traced, with here and there a lighter spot where lamps were clustered about a square or market or round some great building; after a time these grew more distinct, and the lamps themselves visible—slight yellow specks that seemed to be rapidly snuffed out one by one as intervening obstacles hid them from the sight. Then sounds arose—the striking of church clocks, the distant bark of dogs, the hum of traffic in the streets; then outlines might be traced—tall steeples looming in the air, and piles of unequal roofs oppressed by chimneys; then the noise swelled into a louder sound, and forms grew more distinct and numerous still, and London—visible in the darkness by its own faint light, and not by that of Heaven—was at hand.

The locksmith, however, all unsuspecting of its near vicinity, still jogged on, half sleeping and half waking, when a loud cry at no great distance ahead, roused him with a start.

For a moment or two he looked about him like a man who had been transported to some strange country in his sleep, but soon recognizing familiar objects, rubbed his eyes lazily and might have relapsed again, but that the cry was repeated—not once or twice or thrice, but many times, and each time, if possible, with increased vehemence. Thoroughly aroused, Gabriel, who was a bold man and not easily daunted, made straight to the spot, urging on his stout little horse as if for life or death.

The matter indeed looked sufficiently serious, for, coming to the place whence the cries had proceeded, he descried the figure of a man extended in an apparently lifeless state upon the pathway, and hovering round him another person with a torch in his hand, which he waved in the air with a wild impatience, redoubling meanwhile those cries for help which had brought the locksmith to the spot.

"What's here to do?" said the old man, alighting.

"How's this—what—Barnaby?"

The bearer of the torch shook his long loose hair back from his eyes, and thrusting his face eagerly into that of the locksmith, fixed upon him a look which told his history at once. He was an idiot.

"You know me, Barnaby?" said Vardon.

The idiot nodded—not once or twice, but a score of times, and that with a fantastic exaggeration which would have kept his head in motion for an hour, but that the locksmith held up his finger and fixing his eye sternly upon him caused him to desist, then pointed to the body with an inquiring look.

"There's blood upon him," said Barnaby, with a shudder. "It makes me sick."

"How came it there?" demanded Vardon.

"Steel, steel, steel!" replied the idiot, fiercely, imitating with his hand the thrust of a sword.

"Is he robbed?" said the locksmith.

Barnaby caught him by the arm, and nodded "Yes;" then pointed toward the city.

"Oh!" said the old man, bending over the body, and looking round as he spoke into Barnaby's pale face, strangely lighted up by something which was not intellect. "The robber made off that way, did he? Well, well, never mind that just now. Held your torch this way—a little further off—so. Now stand quiet while I try to see what harm is done."

With these words, he applied himself to a closer examination of the prostrate form, while Barnaby, holding the torch as he had been directed, looked on in silence, fascinated by interest or curiosity, but repelled nevertheless by some strong and secret horror which convulsed him in every nerve.

As he stood at that moment, half shrinking back and half bending forward, both his face and figure were full in the strong glare of the light, and as distinctly revealed as though it had been broad day. He was about three and twenty years old, and though rather spare, of a fair height and strong make. His hair, of which he had a great profusion, was red, and, hanging in disorder about his face and shoulders, gave to his wild and restless looks an expression quite unearthly—enhanced by the paleness of his complexion and the glassy lustre of his large protruding eyes. Starting as his aspect was, the features were good, and there was something plaintive in his wan and haggard look. But the absence of the soul is far more terrible in a living man than in a dead one, and in this unfortunate being its noblest powers were wanting.

His dress was of green, clumsily trimmed here and there—apparently by his own hands—with gaudy lace; brightest where the cloth was most worn and soiled, and poorest where it was at the best. A pair of tawdry ruffles dangled at his wrists, while his throat was nearly bare. He had ornamented his hat with a cluster of peacock's feathers, but they were limp and broken and now trailed negligently down his back; girded to his side was the steel hilt of an old sword without blade or scabbard; and some parti-colored ends of ribbons and poor glass toys completed the ornamental portion of his attire. The flattered and confused disposition of all the motley scraps that formed his dress, bespoke in a scarcely less degree than his eager and unsettled manner, the disorder of his mind, and by a grotesque contrast set off and heightened the more impressive wildness of his face.

"Barnaby," said the locksmith, after a hasty but careful inspection, "this man is not dead, but he has a wound in his side, and is in a fainting fit."

"I know him, I know him!" cried Barnaby, clapping his hands.

"Know him?" repeated the locksmith.

"Hush!" said Barnaby, laying his fingers on his lips. "He went out to-day a wooing. I would n't for a light guinea that he should never go a wooing again, for if he did some eyes would grow dim that are now as bright as—see, when I talk of eyes, the stars come out. Whose eyes are they? If they are angel's eyes, why do they look down here and see good men hurt and only wink and sparkle all the night?"

"Now God help this silly fellow," murmured the perplexed locksmith, "can he know this gentleman? His mother's house is not far off; I had better see if she can tell me who he is—Barnaby, my man, help me to put him in the chaise, and we'll ride home together."

"I can't touch him!" cried the idiot, falling back, and shuddering as with a strong spasm; "he's bloody."

"It's in his nature I know," muttered the locksmith, "it's cruel to ask him, but I must have help—Barnaby—good Barnaby—dear Barnaby—if you know this gentleman, for the sake of his life and every body's life that loves him, help me to raise him and lay him down."

"Cover him up then, wrap him close—do n't let me see it—smell it—hear the word. Do n't speak the word—do n't!"

They placed him in the carriage with great ease, for Barnaby was strong and active, but all the time they were so occupied he shivered from head to foot, and evidently experienced such an ecstasy of terror that the locksmith could scarcely endure to witness his suffering.

This accomplished, and the wounded man being covered with Vardon's own great-coat, which he took off for the purpose, they proceeded onward at a brisk pace: Barnaby gaily counting the stars upon his fingers, and Gabriel inwardly congratulating himself upon having an adventure now which would silence Mrs. Vardon upon the subject of the Maypole for that night, or there was no faith in woman.

LINES

Written after a visit to the Poet Wordsworth.

O England! full of years—yet passing fair—
I drink thy beauty with a child's delight,
The tear upon my face.

Thy moss-crown'd heights,
Beneath whose base 't would seem that Time had paus'd

Like an o'erseer destroyer—and laid down
Feigning to sleep, and let their glory pass—
Thy proud, baronial mansions, deck'd with all
That wealth can win from Art—but more than these,
Thy mist enircled hills—thy crystal lakes
Glossing themselves amid the velvet meads—
Thy green, green hedges, with their tufted bloom—
Thy cottage children, playing 'mid the flowers
That make their thatch-roof'd homes so beautiful—
These well repay me, to have dared for thee
The tempest-swoln Atlantic, though unused
To perils on the deep.

But most of all,

That I have found thee, in thy rural bower,
Whose music thrill'd my heart, when life was new—
That I have seen thy face and heard thy voice,
Is glorious gain: for on the sacred walls
Of the soul's cabinet, where she retires
To muse amid her treasure'd imagery,
Henceforth shall hang thy picture—mild with thought,
And sublimed with genius—ne'er to fade,
Till Death shall darken all material things.

CURIOUS CORRESPONDENCE

Between Mr. Gibbon, author of "The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," and Dr. Priestley, author of "History of the Corruptions of Christianity."

MR. GIBBON TO DR. PRIESTLEY.

January 23, 1783.

SIR: As a mark of your esteem, I should have accepted with pleasure your History of the Corruptions of Christianity. You have been careful to inform me, that it is intended, not as a gift, but as a challenge, and such a challenge you must permit me to decline. At the same time you glory in outstripping the zeal of the Mufti and the Lama, it may be proper to declare, that I should equally refuse the defiance of these venerable divines. Once, and once only, the just defence of my own veracity provoked me to descend into the amphitheatre; but as long as you attack opinions which I have never maintained, or maintain principles which I have never denied, you may safely exult in my silence and your own victory. The difference between us, (on the credibility of miracles,) which you choose to suppose, and wish to argue, is a trite and ancient topic of controversy, and, from the opinion which you entertain of yourself and me, it does not appear probable that our disputes would either edify or enlighten the public.

The public will decide to whom the invidious name of unbeliever more justly belongs; to the historian, who, without interposing his own sentiments, has delivered a simple narrative of authentic facts, or to the disputant who proudly rejects all natural proofs of the immortality of the soul, overthrows (by circumscribing) the inspiration of the evangelists and apostles, and condemns the religion of every Christian nation, as a fable less innocent, but not less absurd, than Mahomet's journey to the third Heaven.

And now, sir, since you assume a right to determine the objects of my past and future studies, give me leave to convey to your ear the almost unanimous, and not offensive wish, of the philosophic world: that you would confine your talents and industry to those sciences in which real and useful improvements can be made. Remember the end of your predecessor Servetus, not of his life, (the Calvins of our days are restrained from the use of the same fiery arguments,) but, I mean, the end of his reputation. His theological writings are lost in oblivion; and if his book on the Trinity be still preserved, it is only because it contains the first rudiments of the discovery of the circulation of the blood. I am, sir, your obedient, humble servant.

DR. PRIESTLEY TO MR. GIBBON.

BIRMINGHAM, Feb. 3, 1783.

SIR: It would have been impertinent in me, especially considering the object of my History, to have sent you a copy of it as a mark of my esteem or friendship. What I meant was to act the part of a fair and open adversary, and I am truly sorry that you decline the discussion I proposed: for, though you are of a different opinion, I do not think that either of us could be better employed; and, should the Mufti and the Lama, whose challenge, you say, you would also decline, become parties in the business, I should reject the more. I do not well know what you can mean by intimating, that I am a greater unbeliever than yourself; that I attack opinions which you never maintained, and maintain principles which you never denied. If you mean to assert that you are a believer in Christianity, and meant to recommend it, I must say, that your mode of writing has been very ill adapted to gain your purpose. If there be any certain method of discovering a man's real object, yours has been to discredit Christianity in fact, while in words you represent yourself as a friend to it: a conduct which I scruple not to call highly unworthy and mean; an insult on the common sense of the Christian world; as a method of screening you from the notice of the law, (which is as hostile to me as it is to you,) you must know that it could avail you nothing; and though that mode of writing might be deemed ingenious and witty in the first inventor of it, it has been too often repeated to deserve that appellation now.

According to your own rule of conduct, this charge ought to provoke you to descend into the amphitheatre once more, as much as the accusation of Mr. Davis: for it is a call upon you to defend, not your principles only, but also your honor. For what can reflect greater dishonor on a man, than to say one thing and mean another? You have certainly been very far from confining yourself, as you pretend, to a simple narrative of authentic facts, without interposing your own sentiments. I hold no opinions, obnoxious as they are, that I am not ready both to avow in the most explicit manner, and also to defend with any person of competent judgement and ability. Had I not considered you in this light, and also as fairly open, by the strain of your writings, to such a challenge, I should not have called upon you as I have done. The public will form its own judgement both of that and of your silence on the occasion; and finally decide between you, the humble historian, and me, the proud disputant.

As to my reputation, for which you are so very obligingly concerned, give me leave to observe, that, as far as it is an object with any person, and a thing to be enjoyed by himself, it must depend upon his particular notions and feelings. Now, odd as it will appear to you, the esteem of a very few rational Christian friends (though I know that it will insure me the detestation of the greater part of the present nominally Christian world that happen to hear me) gives me more real satisfaction, than the applause of what you call the philosophic world. I admire Servetus, by whose example you wish me to take warning, more for his courage in dying for the cause of important truth, than I should have done it, beside the certain discovery of the circulation of the blood, he had made any other the most celebrated discovery in philosophy.

However, I do not see what my philosophical friends (of whom I have many, and whom I think I value as I ought,) have to do with my metaphysical or theological writings. They may, if they please, consider them as my particular whims or amusements, and accordingly neglect them. They have, in fact, interfered very little with my application to philosophy, since I have had the means of doing it. I was never more busy, or more successfully so, in my philosophical pursuits, than during the time I have been employed about the History of the Corruptions of Christianity. I am at this very time, totus in illis, as my friends know, and as the public will know in due time, which with me is never long; and if you had thought proper to enter into the discussion I proposed, it would not have made me neglect my laboratory, or omit a single experiment that I should otherwise have made. I am, sir, your very humble servant.

J. PRIESTLEY.

MR. GIBBON TO DR. PRIESTLEY.

BENTINCK STREET, Feb. 6, 1783.

SIR: As I do not pretend to judge of the sentiments or intentions of another, I shall not inquire how far you are inclined to suffer or inflict martyrdom. It only becomes me to say, that the style and temper of your last letter have satisfied me of the propriety of declining all farther correspondence, whether public or private, with such an adversary. I am, sir, your humble servant.

DR. PRIESTLEY TO MR. GIBBON.

BIRMINGHAM, Feb. 10, 1783.

SIR: I neither requested nor wished to have any private correspondence with you. All that my MS. card required, was a simple acknowledgment of the receipt of the copy of my work. You chose, however, to give me a specimen of your temper and feelings; and also, what I thought to be an opening to a further call upon you for a justification of yourself in public. Of this I was willing to take advantage; and at the same time to satisfy you that my philosophical pursuits, for which, whether in earnest or not, you were pleased to express some concern, would not be interrupted in consequence of it.

As this correspondence, from the origin and nature of it, cannot be deemed confidential, I may, especially if I resume my observations on your conduct as an historian, give the public an opportunity of judging of the propriety of my answer to your first extraordinary letter, and also to this last truly enigmatical one; to interpret which requires much more sagacity, than to discover your real intentions with respect to Christianity, though you might think you had carefully concealed them from all human inspection.

Wishing to hear from you just as little as you please in private, and just as much as you please in public, I am, sir, your humble servant.

MR. GIBBON TO DR. PRIESTLEY.

February 22, 1783.

If Dr. Priestley consults his friends, he will probably learn, that a single copy of a paper, addressed under a seal to a single person, and not relative to any public or official business, must always be considered as private correspondence; which a man of honor is not at liberty to print without the consent of the writer. That consent in the present instance, Mr. Gibbon thinks proper to withhold; and, as he desires to escape all further altercation, he shall not trouble Dr. Priestley or himself with explaining the motives of his refusal.

DR. PRIESTLEY TO MR. GIBBON.

BIRMINGHAM, Feb. 25, 1783.

Dr. Priestley is as unwilling to be guilty of any real impropriety as Mr. Gibbon can wish him to be: but as the correspondence between them relates not to any private, but only a public matter, he apprehends that it may, according to Mr. Gibbon's own distinction, at the pleasure of either of the parties, be laid before the public; who, in fact, are interested to know, at least, the result of it. Dr. Priestley's conduct will always be open to the animadversion of Mr. Gibbon, or of any other person. His appeal is to men of honor, and even men of the world; and he desires no favor.

Dr. Priestley has sent a single copy of the correspondence to a friend in London, with leave to show it to any other common friends, but with a prohibition to take any other copy; but between this and printing there is no difference, except in mode and extent. In the eye of the law and of reason both are equally publications; and has Mr. Gibbon never thought himself at liberty to show a copy of a letter to a third person?

Mr. Gibbon may easily escape all further altercation by discontinuing this mutually disagreeable correspondence, by leaving Dr. Priestley to act as his own discretion or indiscretion may dictate; and for this, himself only, and not Mr. Gibbon, is responsible.

ON SEEING THE STATUE OF THE SPINNING GIRL,

At the Seat of the Duke of Devonshire.

Spin on, most beautiful—

Thy simple labour here. Majestic forms
Of high renown, and brows of classic grace,
Whose sculptured features speak the breathing soul,
Rise in illustrious ranks, but not to scorn
Thy lowly toil—

Even so, it was of old,
That woman's hand, amid the elements
Of patient industry and household good,
Reproachless wrought, twining the slender thread
From the light distaff—or in skillful loom
Weaving rich tissues—or with glowing tints
Of rich embroidery, pleas'd to decorate
The mantle of her lord—And it was well—
For in such shelter'd and congenial sphere
Content, with duty dwelt—

Yet few there were,
Sweet Filatrice—who in their earnest task
Found such retreat as thine—'mid lordly halls,
And sparkling fountains, and umbrageous trees,
And parks far stretching, where the antler'd deer
Forget the hound and horn.

And we, who roam
'Mid all this grand enchantment—proud saloons,
And galleries radiant with the gems of art
And genius, ravish'd from the grasp of Time—
And princely chapel, uttering praise to God—
Or lose ourselves amid the wildering maze
Of plants, and flowers, and blossoms, breathing forth
Their eloquence to Him—delighted lay
This slight memorial at thy snowy feet.

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 20, 1841.

A LAW is wanted to control the use of steam. It is the boast of Americans that in no country is there better protection for life and property; yet in no country is there a greater recklessness in what concerns life when personal safety and the immediate exigencies of property seem to clash; in no country are vast and perilous mechanical agencies employed with less regard to the protection of the human beings who put them in motion. Steam is used throughout the land; its disastrous powers, when uncontrolled are universally known; and yet there is no law to secure the efficiency and vigilance of the control to which it should be unceasingly subjected.

To say that rail-road travelling and suicide are convertible terms, is becoming hardly an hyperbole. The papers still record "frightful accidents," "shocking and fatal collisions," by the dozen.

There must be causes for this monstrous indifference to human safety; and they do not appear obscure, nor difficult of prevention. One predisposing cause to carelessness is no doubt the very potency of the agent which destroys: the ease with which steam performs its function lull men, by the force of association, into a state of heedless repose: relieved of trouble of one sort, they look for no trouble at all, and thus are content to let their fellow creatures be crushed to atoms, or blown and scorched to a blackened cinder, for want of turning a lantern or filling up a steam-gauge of which the mercury has been blown out. Frequent as accidents are, in the vast majority of cases, and in the daily experience of most men whose business it is to deal with steam, there is impunity for negligence. The mercury may often be blown out of the steam-gauge, and the engineer "never know any harm to come of it;" the water may not often "take it into its head" just then to run low and blow up the boiler with superabundant steam: but it may, and the poor heedless engineer may be blown to a shapeless and mutilated mass, with nothing in his miserable suffering to console others for the fault which deprives them of husbands or parents. "Seeing is believing," however: daily experience of impunity, and the remoteness and uncertainty of the danger, breed a habit of heedlessness.

The want is the supply of some motive to attention and caution. Means should be devised to force upon those having the direction of enterprises in which steam power is employed, whether in ships, or railroads, that decent regard to the lives of their fellow-creatures which it appears their own good feeling cannot secure, in the selection of proper persons to overlook and manage the gigantic power now intrusted to brute ignorance. But, with the best selection, a controlling authority should be felt each instant by every hand engaged in the management of steam: if possible destruction to life is not sufficient to frighten an engineer from neglect and recklessness, something must be found out that will be sufficient. Some severe and clearly defined punishment—a hard term of imprisonment, or a heavy pecuniary mulct—is of that nature; a penalty not merely upon the completion of the remote and possible catastrophe, but upon the acts which are the first to lead to it; a penalty, for instance, upon loading the safety-valve of an engine. And the penalty should not merely be of that kind which would be, though a sacrifice, an easy sacrifice, to the offender: it should be such as to deter—to frighten him from conduct from which the chance of doing murder will not frighten him; it should be a penalty so frightful, and so certain, that the thought of it would operate each moment of his occupation.

JAMES FENIMORE COOPER AGAIN.—We beg pardon of our readers for obtruding upon them the name of this estimable personage so frequently; but really, the Boston Times is getting too insufferable on the same subject and we must exchange a parting word with it. Will the reader believe it? The worthy editor of that paper has inflicted on his subscribers, since Monday, three leaders of more than a column each in laudation and glorification of Home as Found! proving, directly, that the American public have never understood that wonderful book; and, indirectly, that they have never appreciated its wonderful author. We do not say—observe—that the editor of the Times wrote these articles; for we suspect him of no such solemn foolery; and, besides, they bear intrinsic evidence of a very different authorship. The real writer betrays the same uneasiness at the public misunderstanding of his books and misapprehension of his own personal and philosophical qualifications that shines so conspicuously in the pages of "A Letter to his Countrymen," and it seems altogether out of the question that these articles and that letter could have been written by two different persons.

Not that we would accuse Mr. Cooper of deliberately puffing his own books: he has no such intention: he despises such an imputation. But surely, when he finds that his most elaborate works do not take, and that he is himself losing ground through the misapprehension of the public, he, above all others, is the fitting person to apprise the public of their abominable stupidity, point out their innumerable errors of judgement, and lay on with a trowel the thick plaster of anonymous self-glorification.

We very much regret that our "devil" has absquatulated with the first two numbers of the Times aforesaid, because they contained some choice bits for extracting: but, as the case stands, we will make the best of the last, (mean we greatly fear that it will not be the last) and indulge our readers with a few quiet specimens.

In number two, the distinguished writer essays to prove that pride of birth in a Republic (he means, in an inhabitant of a Republic) is a proof of republicanism, and therefore a merit; but the same feeling in a monarchy (i. e., in the inhabitant or subject of a monarchy) is despicable, because such individual may happen, by reason of his birth, to receive honors of which he is unworthy. We presume he had no interested motive in going into an elaborate argument, in the columns of a newspaper, on this vitally important distinction. At the same time, we feel bound to admit our belief that the celebrated Mr. Cooper boasts of his birth, high descent and long lineage, with no remarkable meekness of manner or voice; and we are grieved to add that some very positive statements in the Courier & Enquirer have rendered his assumptions on these points somewhat debateable, in the way of abstract argument: but it does not appear from all this that there is any necessary connexion between the distinguished writer in the Times and the no less distinguished Mr. Cooper: yet it must be conceded that the distinction between pride of birth in an American and in an Englishman is a matter of no trifling importance, and we believe it is also conceded by historians that Mr. Cooper is a native of New Jersey.

We cannot discuss this matter in its length and breadth as we should be happy to do, because our columns have a limit, if these of the Times have not; yet we cannot deny our readers the gratification of inspecting a few elegant extracts from the number three before us. For instance:

"Mr. Cooper has been charged with aristocracy, for representing the Effinghams as reserved in their social intercourse; and this charge, like the one already noticed, shows how little his critics understand him. Mr. Cooper contends for no social inequalities. He is no advocate of cliques and coteries; he contends for no lines of demarkation between different portions of society, of which one is to be higher than the rest, and from which all the rest are to be excluded with jealous solicitude. Instead of this, he ridicules that ignorant, vulgar pretension which is so frequently displayed in jealousies about circles, and sects, and society, and social position, and fear of being undervalued. Every human being has a natural right to choose its own company, at least so far as concerns refusal of association. This is a democratic right, and no one contends for it more zealously or philosophically than Mr. Cooper."

There, reader! that is extract number one. Allow us to call your attention to two of its characteristics: first, the remarkable familiarity of a third person (the writer) with Mr. Cooper's peculiar views of matters and things in general; and secondly, the correctness of the writer's style. Mr. C., he says, has been charged with aristocracy. Now, a plain English scholar would probably suppose he meant loaded with aristocracy; and in this sense we apprehend the assertion would come pretty near the truth, if it were expressed in the present tense, as well as the past, i. e., he is loaded with aristocracy,—for he fires off aristocracy at a terrible rate among "his countrymen." But it is pretty obvious, from the connexion in which "aristocracy" is used, that the distinguished writer means, Mr. C. has been charged with being an aristocrat, &c. "Aristocracy" was probably used in preference to what the distinguished writer really meant, because it is more condensed. Of the same condensed style is the line, "Every human being has a right to choose its own company." But we leave the remainder of quotation, number one, with the reader, for we must hasten to a conclusion.

Quotation, number two, illustrates the distinguished writer's views of "his countrymen" and of English vulgarity, &c. It does appear to us that something very like this occurs in some one or more of Mr. Cooper's novels; but the coincidence of expression may be accidental:

"Every close observer of human nature, especially in commercial cities, where wealth is often regarded by the genteel vulgar as synonymous with moral and intellectual superiority, can bear testimony to Mr. Cooper's philosophical discrimination in these descriptions. In such cities we witness a continual struggle for social superiority; a continual and vulgar war between squads and cliques and circles, each straining and pushing and shoving to reach what is considered a greater elevation. This vile practice is of genuine English growth, and effectually stamps the Anglo-Saxon race with the deplorable distinction of being the most ill-bred people in the world. In England, where the vulgarities, the brutalities, the abominations of conventional aristocracy exist in all their horrors, this base, degrading, withering war is waged with ferocious intensity, and produces every cruel, unchristian device by which one human being can trample upon the feelings of another."

There, reader! what do you think of that? Isn't that fine? Isn't it republican independence? Isn't it "what you may call" the annihilating style? Thank fortune, we are not an Englishman!

But pause one moment, gentle reader! we will tax your patience with only one more extract; and, for the present, come to the end. And in giving you this extract, number three, we will say that we give it merely as a pleasant commentary on the spirit manifested in number two:

"What an aristocrat is this Mr. Cooper, for inculcating principles that raise all mankind to the same level of self-respect and brotherly kindness! What an aristocrat for wishing that every human being might become enlightened, refined, just and humane!"

The italicising in this extract is the aforesaid distinguished writer's own handiwork, and that is the beauty of it!

GOOD-BREEDING—says an old writer of the eighteenth century—is an amiable and persuasive thing. It beautifies the actions and looks of men. But equally odious is the grimace of good-breeding. In comparison with this, Bluntness is an accomplishment. The ape of a well-bred man is just as offensive as the well-bred man is agreeable: he is a nuisance to his acquaintance. I am frightened at the affected smile and the apish shrug. When these foul copies of gentlemen throw their civil grin in one's face, it is as much as one can do to avoid spitting in theirs. A starched rogue, forcing smiles, is a more hideous sight than a mummy. He is a fugitive from nature; and it is notable impudence in such a creature to pretend to be courteous.

NEWSPAPER READERS.—The tastes of the readers of a newspaper are sufficiently various and singular. One reads nothing but the poet's corner; another considers poetry, and all that sort of stuff, horrid trash. One deems politics the only business of life; another votes that department a bore. This one reads the deaths and marriages, and that one looks only to the advertisements. There are various other idiosyncracies too numerous to mention; but certainly the most singular one we ever heard of, was the case of the lady who was obliged to consult the celebrated Abenethy, because "for several mornings past she had not been able to relish her murders." We should like to have seen the doctor's phrenology on the occasion.

CORRECTION.—We have received a letter from the author of "Two years before the mast," requesting us to correct the statement made in the New World of last week, that his work had been offered to the Boston publishers and refused by them previously to its having been submitted to the more discerning judgement of Harper and Brothers of this city. The latter were the first and only publishers to whom the manuscript was submitted.

THE NEW DISTRICT ATTORNEY.—Ogden Hoffman, Esq., has been appointed District Attorney in the place of B. F. Butler, Esq., resigned. This is an excellent selection—one with which, we imagine, the Democrats will be no less satisfied than the Whigs. Mr. Hoffman's high talents, strict honor and chivalrous manners have won for him the esteem of both political parties—a distinction far more desirable than the renown of a noisy leader of faction. We have no doubt that Mr. Hoffman will dignify his station, and continue to adorn a profession which is sadly in want of men of scrupulous integrity and elevated worth.

Literary.

VOICES OF THE NIGHT, BY PROFESSOR LONGFELLOW It is a noteworthy circumstance in the annals of American literature, that a collection of poems, within two years from its first day of publication, reached a third edition. The booksellers tell us that poetry is a drug in the market—and we believe them. We believe that no small quantity of poems that are printed, never see any light beyond that which glimmers through the windows of a binder's attic. They wax old and dingy in the obscurity of unfolded sheets, and are never "drawn out," except by the trunkmaker. But the reason of this is different from what the booksellers suppose. The poems are not unsaleable because they are poems, but because they are bad poems—or, at all events, so middling that bad were better. The same ideas in prose would be quite as much neglected; though, perhaps, more people would be able to tell how utterly worthless they were.

Good poetry—really good—poetry which thrills the heart, makes the pulse beat faster, and the eye grow dim with tears or brighten with joy—poetry which elevates or subdues—colors external objects with the hues of imagination, and causes us to hear

"A sound that brings
The feelings of a dream—"

such poetry will always be popular, and what the publisher may consider the more acceptable word, profitable.

With the "Earlier Poems" of Professor Longfellow, contained in this volume, we cannot express ourselves especially gratified. They seem to us feeble, and written after a bad model. In most of them we can discern a mimicry of the affectations of another American versifier, to whom the imitator is vastly superior. We would not go so far as to assert that the imitation was intentional; but it is evident enough that it existed. A glaring instance will satisfy the reader:

With what a tender and expressional voice
It fills the rice and delicate ear of thought
When the fast-ushering star of morning comes
O'er-riding the grey hills with golden scarf;
Or when the cowed and dinky-maddled Eve
In mourning weeds, from out the western gate
Departs with silent pace!

Unassisted by the italics even, which we have thrown into the lines, he who remembers the quires of blank verse which used to elicit the admiration of boarding-school misses and under-graduates, will easily acknowledge their resemblance to the effusions of "Roy"—the youthful signature of Mr. N. P. Willis.

The "Voices of the Night"—poems that give a title to the volume—are so totally different from these "Earlier Poems," that we can hardly convince ourselves of the sameness of their origin. Between his early and his later years, the taste of the writer seems to have been taught in a school of chaste and severe forms of beauty. His mind grew, expanded, blossomed and bore fruit in the atmosphere of generous study. Its roots were moistened by water from "the old well of English undefiled" and its branches warmed by the rays of German genius. Indeed, so much nurture has this poet derived from the primeval authors of our Saxon tongue and the great spirits of modern Germany, that he has, with some shadow of reason, been accused of plagiarism. A single instance will suffice to illustrate the grounds upon which this poet is charged with a lack of originality.

When John Neal—himself a poet of great excellence—was connected with the critical department of this journal he quoted and "set a-going," prefaced by one of his bursts of enthusiastic eulogy, a stanza, which has since been transferred to nine-tenths of our newspapers—

"Art is long and Time is fleeting,
And our hearts, though stout and brave,
Still, like muffled drums, are beating
Funeral marches to the grave."

Straying into the alcove of a library, the other day, we lighted upon a small volume, containing among other scraps of old English poetry, these verses by King, Bishop of Ghilchester:

But hark! my pulse like a soft drum
Beats my approach to thee—I come!
And slow how'er my marches be
I shall at last lie down with thee.

It is not at all impossible that Professor Longfellow may not have seen the latter quotation; but, as the kind old toady in Miss Pickering's admirable novel, "Who shall be heir?" says, "it is a striking coincidence!"

We have rambled on to a much greater length than we intended in taking up our pen—the simple object of which was to echo the praises bestowed on these elaborate productions of a favorite author. The volume, which has been the immediate cause of this notice, is a very elegant one from the press of John Owen, Cambridge, Mass. The type really seems to luxuriate in the breadth of margin by which it is surrounded; pretty as it is, however, it is rather too small for its situation, and puts us in mind of the pet of the family seated in grandfather's beautiful, big arm-chair.

THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP AND OTHER TALES, by Charles Dickens, with numerous illustrations by Catherine and Brown.

With this title page, LEE & BLANCHARD of Philadelphia have issued in a handsome volume, all the numbers of that series of papers, which we have published under the general name of MASTER HUMPHREY'S CLOCK. The book is neatly printed in double columns, and we wish that we were not obliged to say that the wood-cuts are wretched affairs. An apprentice in his art should be heartily ashamed of such shabby work. Those who have looked over the English edition will with difficulty recognise even the subjects of these cuts to be the same. But the volume, as a whole, is one which the lovers of the beautiful and the humorous will not fail to obtain and to read, again and again, with scarcely diminished delight.

HEADS OF THE PEOPLE.—Carey and Hart, of Philadelphia, have issued, in an elegant octavo volume of 370 pages, the Heads of the People. The public are already familiar with the great merit of this series of pictures, through the English edition, which has, within two years past, appeared in numbers. When we say that the present edition is in no respect inferior, not even in the etching of the portraits and the style of their printing—the reader can easily appreciate its merits.

To us a high recommendation of this book appears in its genuineness. There is nothing "catchpenny" about it; no one can deny that it is well worth buying. It contains a vast fund of amusement. The written delineations are hardly less graphic than those which they are intended to illustrate. Upon them, the first periodical writers of the day have been engaged. To prove this, it is enough to mention the names of Douglas Jerrold, (the largest as he is the best contributor) William Thackeray, William Howitt, Mrs. Gore, Leigh Hunt, Mrs. S. C. Hall, Charles Whitehead, &c.

The only fault we have to find with the copy presented to us is its binding. The leaves are very loosely put together, and the work ill done.

JAMES MUNROE AND COMPANY, of Boston, propose to publish Biographical Memorials of James Oglethorpe, the founder of Georgia: by Thaddeus Mason Harris, D. D., Corresponding member of the Georgia Historical Society.

This work is to give an account of his early life and education—his chivalric service under the celebrated Prince Eugene of Savoy—his influence as a member of successive Parliaments in Great Britain, with extracts from his speeches—his grand undertaking in the settlement of Georgia—his defence of the Colony against the Spaniards, and devotedness to its interests for eleven years—his military engagement under Marshal Wade in 1745, against the forces of the Pretender—and details of his domestic and social relations through the latter part of his long and eventful life.

It will make an octavo volume of about three hundred and fifty pages, neatly printed, and adorned with a frontispiece full-length portrait—a plate representing the Arms of the family, the Honorary Medal, the Seal of the Trustees, and the Lighthouse of Tybee—and a Map.

PAST DAYS: A Story for Children: By Esther Whitlock. D. Appleton & Co.

The Messrs. Abbotts have, within a few years past, written a great number of books for children which have superseded almost all preceding works of the kind and attained a very extensive circulation. Those denominated "the Rollo books" have been the most popular.

"Past Days," to our mind, is superior to anything written by the Abbotts, and deserves at least equal success. Indeed, we regard it as one of the very best books for children that ever was written; and we strongly recommend all of our readers who have families to obtain it.

THE QUADROONE.—From the press of Harper and Brothers, we have a copy of this new novel, by J. H. Ingraham, Esq., a gentleman who has gained some celebrity as a novelist. There is a tendency to overdo, in his writings, which critics are bound to find fault with, but they are enjoyed and held in much regard, we believe, by a numerous class of readers. And after all, the multitude of readers constitute the tribunal whose verdict is desirable to an author.

GIBSON'S RAMBLES IN EUROPE.—Lee & Blanchard have published, in a handsome volume, "The Records of Rambles in Europe, by Dr. Gibson, Professor of Surgery in the University of Pennsylvania."

EDUCATION IN PENNSYLVANIA.—There were 282,410 pupils, in the different literary institutions of Pennsylvania, during the past year. Of this number, 1,839 pupils are in colleges and universities; 1,430 in female seminaries; 2,465 in academies; 21,968 in the public schools of Philadelphia, and 254,968 in the common schools throughout the State. In the cause of elementary education at least, it must be admitted that the Keystone State is doing well.

CUPID'S ARROW.

Young Cupid went storming to Vulcan one day
And besought him to look at his arrow:
"Tis useless," he cried; "you must mend it, I say;
'Tis fit to let fly at a sparrow.
There's something that's wrong in the shaft or the dart,
For it flutters quite false to my aim:
'Tis an age since it fairly went home to the heart,
And the world really jest at my name.
'I have straighten'd, I've bent, I've tried all, I declare,
I've perfumed it with sweetest of sighs;
'Tis feather'd with ringlets my mother might wear,
And the barb gleams with light from young eyes;
But it falls without touching—I'll break it, I vow,
For there's Hymen beginning to pout;
He's complaining his torch burns so dull and so low,
That Zephyr might puff it right out."

Little Cupid went on with his pitiful tale,
Till Vulcan the weapon restored.
"There, take it, young sir; try it now—if it fail
I will neither ask fee nor reward."
The urchin shot out, and a rare havoc he made;
The wounded and dead were untold;
But no wonder the rogue had such slaughtering trade,
For the arrow was laden with gold.

RELICS OF A LEVIATHAN.—Mr. James Bull, of Detroit, Michigan, has in his possession a fossil remain, which appears to be one of the divisions of the back bone of a monster of the past. It is a perfect specimen, and is supposed to have belonged to an animal of the whale species. It was found, several years since, on the Paw-Paw river, in Van Buren county, in the interior of the State. It measures within a fraction of twelve inches in diameter, and is nearly eighteen in length.

"My uncle was one of the framers of the Constitution," said a youth the other day of patrician blood, to another of a more plebeian origin. "Who cares for that?" quoth the latter, "My father was one of the framers of our new meeting-house."

IN WISCONSIN TERRITORY, the past winter, they have had but little extremely cold weather—not more than two or three weeks if put together. Of intense cold they have had but a few hours' duration. Many days in February the hardy people might have been seen driving team, hauling wood, &c., in "shirt sleeves." There had been but little snow, and not a drop of rain, and consequently no devastating freshets, such as we have had in the East. Cattle unprovided with shelter are said to stand the winters better in Wisconsin than in Ohio. The climate of Wisconsin, therefore, has many advantages to overbalance a few days of severe cold. These advantages are, dry, clear, bracing weather in winter, gentle showers in summer, and perhaps a greater number of corn-growing days than in the same parallels of latitude to the East.

NATIVE STEEL.—The Albany Evening Journal of Friday of last week contains a report by Prof. E. Emmons to the Legislature on the steel mine discovered in Franklin county. The Report is able, evinces a scientific investigation of the subject, and seems to prove incontestably that native steel, to an indefinite extent, can be dug "out of the bowels of the harmless earth" in our own State. This discovery is of far greater value than the finding of a hundred gold mines.

"WHAT SHADOWS WE ARE AND WHAT SHADOWS WE PURSUE."—It is stated on good authority, that Judge Barbour, whose recent decease at Washington was so sudden, wrote a letter to his family on the evening of his death. He stated to them that his health was never better, and his prospect of returning to his home in Virginia to him was delightful. The mail following the one which conveyed this letter, carried the heart-rending intelligence of his death!

JAMAICA CURRENCY.—By an act of the Colonial Legislature of the Island of Jamaica, which has received the assent of the Queen in Council, the currency of that island has been altered to correspond with the sterling money of Great Britain, and hereafter all accounts are to be kept, quotations of prices current made, &c., in sterling money. All subsisting contracts are to be settled at the rate of £100 sterling for every £166 13s. 4d. currency. The gold and silver coins of Great Britain are a legal tender in Jamaica, the Spanish dollar at 4s. 2d., and the doubloon at £3 4s.

Hudson River.—The steam boat Utica, which left here on Friday or Saturday of last week, with the intention of going through to Albany, succeeded, we are informed, in getting only as far as Hamburg, seven or eight miles below Poughkeepsie, and is there frozen fast in the ice.

LICENCES TO RETAIL INTOXICATING LIQUORS.—The Boston Mercantile Journal states that in the city of Lowell, on the question, "Shall the Mayor and Aldermen be instructed to grant no Licenses for the sale of intoxicating drinks, during the ensuing municipal year?" the vote was as follows:—Yeas, 830; Nays, 365.

Net one Baptist negro in the island of Jamaica, has been convicted of crime since the passing of the Emancipation act.

SPECIMENS OF GERMAN GENIUS.—According to the "German Pedagogic Magazine," there died a few years ago in Suabia, a schoolmaster, who, for fifty-one years, had superintended an institution with old-fashioned severity. From averages inferred by means of recorded observations, one of the ushers has calculated, that in the course of his exertions he had given 911,500 canings, 124,000 floggings, 209,000 custodes, 136,000 tips with the ruler, 10,200 boxes on the ear, and 22,700 tanks to be got by heart. It was further calculated that he had made 700 boys stand on peas, 600 kneel on a sharp edge of wood, 5,000 wear the fool's cap, and 1,708 hold the rod. There's a glutton for you! Ninety average punishments per working diem. Thank the stars we are getting out of all this.

The Mormon War has cost the State of Missouri $150,000! This is the amount in dollars and cents. The extent of the suffering which this ferocious outrage inflicted upon the poor defenceless Mormons, is incalculable. The effect of it has been, to create much public sympathy in their behalf, and their numbers and wealth have vastly increased since the persecution.

The Penny Postage in Great Britain, which it was prophesied would not pay its expenses, has yielded £441,000, net revenue in the first year of its experiment.

MURDER.—The feelings of this community have been shocked by a most horrid murder, which was perpetrated in the vicinity of this place, on Sunday evening last. Miss Rachel Whitacre, who has resided for the last twelve years with one of our citizens, was on a visit to her brother-in-law's, about two miles from this place, and on Sunday, about four o'clock, told her sister that she would take a walk. She did not return, and, although diligent search was made, her body was not discovered until Monday evening, about a fourth of a mile distant, with her skull broken. Suspicion has rested upon a young man named Kem, of a most respectable family. He is now confined in the county jail. We do not feel at liberty to give publicity to the many reports which are in circulation, as he will be tried by the laws of his country.—(Richmond (Va.) Palladium.

Twenty-Sixth Congress.

THURSDAY, MARCH 11, 1841.

After the Journal was read, the vice-president announced to the Senate that he should vacate his seat during the day, in order that the Senate might have an opportunity of electing a President pro tem.

The Senate then proceeded to the discussion of the resolution dismissing Blair and Rives as printers to the 27th Congress, when

Mr. Berrien rose and addressed the body at some length in favor of the resolution, and in reply to the several arguments urged against its adoption.

Mr. Benton made a brief remark in reply, when the question was taken on the adoption of the resolution, and decided in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clay of Ky., Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge.—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Cuthbert, Falton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Nicholson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury.—18.

Mr. Clay then rose and moved that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to deliver to Blair & Rives their official bond.

Mr. Benton asked for the yeas and nays, when there appeared as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge.—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Nicholson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury.—18.

So the motion was carried.

The Vice President then in pursuance of the notice he had previously given, withdrew from the chair as presiding officer for the residue of the present session.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the Senate proceeded to ballot for President pro tem.

On the ballot forty-six votes were cast—of which number

Mr. Southard, of New-Jersey, received.....26

Mr. King, of Alabama, received.....15

Scattering.....2

Mr. Southard having been declared duly elected, was accompanied to the chair by Messrs. Clay and Preston, when he rose and addressed the Senate.

Blair & Rives, it appears, are determined to dig in on the question of the public printing; but the Senate as also appears, treat this manifesto rather cavalierly.

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Monday, March 14, 1841.

Mr. Tappan presented the following letter of Messrs. Blair and Rives, which was read:

GLOBE OFFICE, }
WASHINGTON, March 13th, 1841.

On the 12th inst., the Secretary of the Senate, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, sent to us a letter enclosing our bond for executing the printing for that body during the 27th Congress; the contents of which letter we did not know when it was handed to us; and on examining its contents, we immediately returned it to the Secretary's office, where it was left, with a letter demanding of him all the copy that has been ordered to be printed, or that may be ordered to be printed, by the Senate, during the 27th Congress.

We now inform the Senate that we are prepared, and have been ever since our election, to execute any printing that has been ordered; and shall keep ourselves prepared to execute all the printing that may be ordered by the Senate during the 27th Congress; and we hereby respectfully demand the copy of all that has been ordered, and all that may be ordered during the 27th Congress, as fast as the orders shall be made.

Respectfully,

BLAIR &amp; RIVES.

To the Senate of the United States.

The letter was ordered to lie on the table.

Correspondence of the Journal of Commerce.

WASHINGTON, Monday, March 15.

Reconciliation between Mr. Clay and Mr. King.

After the Senate opened this morning, Mr. Preston rose and remarked upon the deep regret felt by himself and others at the collision which had lately taken place in the Senate between two of its most distinguished members. But he believed that the difficulty had arisen from a misconception on the part of the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) as to what was said by the Senator from Alabama (Mr. King). He had it from an undoubted source that there was no intention on the part of the Senator from Alabama to wound the feelings of the Senator from Kentucky. He expressed a hope, therefore, that the unhappy difference might soon be settled to the mutual satisfaction of both parties.

Mr. Clay then said that although he had misconceived the tenor of the remarks of the Senator from Alabama, and had acted on the belief that there was an intention to wound him, yet being more prompt to repair than to repel an injury, he would say that he was now convinced that the Senator from Alabama had no design to insult him; and he now cheerfully took back all that he had said in reply.

A burst of applause followed Mr. Clay's remarks.

Mr. King rose and stated, in substance, that he hoped his course here had been always marked by forbearance and courtesy; and, in reference to this matter, he would, after the frank declaration of the Senator, say that he had never meditated or uttered any thing intended to be insulting to him or disparaging of him.

Mr. Clay then advanced toward Mr. King, and offered his hand, which was most cordially received. The galleries and lobbies then set up a shout of applause, which was not checked.

FURTHER AND LATE PARTICULARS FROM FLORIDA.—

Information reached here last evening, that an express arrived at Pilatka, from Fort Russell, on the night of the 4th, bringing intelligence that Capt. Barum, with one hundred men, (including nine mounted,) came up with the Indians, (whom Lieut. Alburts had been compelled to retreat from, on account of the smallness of his force,) at the head of Orange Lake, and commenced an attack upon them. Captain B. had placed the nine mounted men in ambush, as a reserve, and led on the others; but finding the Indians in such a body, he made a signal for the mounted men to come up. No sooner was the signal made, than the Indians having cut off these men from the main body, fired upon them, killing six, and the other three retreated to the Fort, being wounded. The express was immediately sent off to Pilatka, without knowing any thing further. The wounded men state that Capt. B. was still fighting.

Capt. Carr, 2d Dragoons, with one hundred men, was sent out from Pilatka a few days previous, and returned shortly after the express had arrived from Fort Russell. He immediately supplied his men with provisions, and started for Capt. Barum's battle ground. It is impossible to give the particulars under such a circumstance. There is no knowing the loss, as yet, that Capt. B. has met with. Lieut. Alburts had lost six or seven men the day before, in his skirmish with the Indians, and was forced to retreat on account of their number. This looks very much like "peace." —[St. Augustine News, March 7.]

STEAMBOAT ACCIDENT.—The steamboat John Randolph, on her way up the river last night, struck a snag in the Bend above Carrollton, and sunk soon after. Loss of property estimated at $150,000—supposed to be mostly insured. Insurance on the boat $30,000. She had on board a large quantity of coffee and other merchandise, besides about 300 hhd's sugar. It is said 22 persons were drowned; whilst another rumor makes 8 missing. It is said that another steamboat disaster happened higher up the river.—[N. O. Free American.]

BARNABY RUDGE,

A NEW WORK BY CHARLES DICKENS, Esq., (Boz.) another of the "The old Curiosity Shop," "The Pickwick Papers," "Oliver Twist," "Nicholas Nickleby," &c.

In the present number of the New World we begin the publication of the above story, said to be the very best production of its popular author. This work was announced more than a year since; public expectation, then universally excited, will now be gratified. In consequence of the frequency of the arrivals from England, we probably shall be able to give a chapter each week, till the whole romance is concluded. Are we asking too much of the Editors, with whom we exchange, when we beg that they will announce the above work as forthcoming in the New World?

We expect that the first demand will be very great; and for that reason we are induced to solicit new subscribers to forward their orders immediately.

THE LEVIATHAN.—Orders for this beautiful sheet can yet be filled, since we have reserved a sufficient number the purpose. All new subscribers, who pay one year in advance, will have a copy sent them of the LEVIATHAN.

Postmasters who have acted as agents in the transmission of payments for the New World, and who have not already received a copy, will be entitled to a number, on apprising us of the omission.

Ten copies are sent for $1, current money, remitted free of postage, or 100 copies for eight dollars. Address the Publisher.

BACK NUMBERS

Can be furnished from the commencement of "Ten Thousand a Year," to new subscribers; or from January 1st, the beginning of the new volume. As the numbers we have on hand are fast diminishing, Agents should urge upon all who intend subscribing to do so without delay. Our pamphlet edition of Ten Thousand a Year is entirely exhausted, but in lieu of it a copy of the Leviathan will be sent to new subscribers.

THE EVERGREEN.—Back Numbers from April 1840 can be furnished to new subscribers. For $3 current money remitted without charge for postage, the work will be sent from that time (April 1840) to December 1841. Two new works, not published in the New World, were commenced in the March number, as will be seen by the prospectus.

PRINCE HOEL'S LAY OF LOVE.

[The following beautiful song, composed, in blank verse, by a writer that can never be forgotten, (while there is a vestige of English literature,) has lately been put into rhyme by Maria del Occidente, author of "Zophiel."—Ed.]

I've harnessed thee, my faithful steed,
Now, by the ocean, prove thy speed,
While, as we pass, th' advancing spray
Shall kiss thy side of glossy gray;
Oh! fairer than the ocean foam
Is that cold maid for whom we roam!

Her cheek is like the apple flower,
Or summer heavens, at evening hour,
While, in her tender bashfulness,
She starts and flies my love's excess,
Tho' dim my brow, beneath its mail,
As ocean when the sun is pale.

On! on! until my longing sight,
Can fix upon that dwelling white,
Beside a verdant bank that braves
The ocean's ever-sounding waves;—
There, all alone, she loves to sing,
Watching the silver sea-mew's wing.

In crowded halls, my spirit flies
To wait on her—and wasting sighs
Consume my nights—where'er I turn
For her I pant, for her I burn,
Who, like some timid, graceful bird,
Shrinks from my glance and fears my word.

I faint; my glow of youth is gone;
Sleepless at night and sick at morn,
My strength departs; I droop, I fade,
Yet think upon that lonely maid,
And pity her, the while I pine
That she should spurn a love like mine.

This, Madoc took the harp to play;
Cold in the earth Prince Hoel lay;
And Llaian listened, fain to speak,
But wept as if her heart would break.

REMARKS.

When a child of ten years old I could admire the poem "Madoc," such is the simplicity of its sentiments and the beauty of its delineations. Looking it over, here, (amidst the woods and canes of that island where repose the bones of Columbus,) the song of Prince Hoel attached itself to my thoughts, and has been (involuntarily) put into rhyme. This song may be found in the first part of the poem mentioned. The lyric metre in which it now appears must rather injure than improve the "beaute nature" of the original. Still I wish it to be published, as coming from my hand; because it gives me an opportunity of expressing, in some degree, my unqualified admiration of its composer. Well may he be called "THE POET AND HISTORIAN OF THE NEW WORLD." To justify this appellation, one has only to look at "Madoc" and the "History of Brazil." I have heard, from a friend, of a rumor that Southey is ill; and, as it is feared, irrecoverably.

This intelligence is unexpected as it is melancholy; for who had better reason to look forward to a protracted existence upon earth, than he who has written more than any other man except Voltaire—than Robert Southey, perfectly proportioned in person, just in mind, regular in his way of living, and benevolent in all his doings?

During that spring which hallowed the last revolution in France, (that of July, 1830,) I saw this "bard of the lakes" surrounded by his most amiable and certainly beautiful family; one only individual of which, his "Dark-eyed Birtha, maid as a dove," was then absent.

I must ever believe that a common reputation for beauty depends more on circumstances than on any particular faultlessness in the person said generally to be handsome.

Byron, in some one of the letters or conversations, written either by or for him, says, or is said to say: "I saw Southey (naming the time) at Lord Holland's, and would give Newton for his head and shoulders." This quotation is from memory, but, I trust, right, in sentiment, though it may not be perfectly so in words; but I have seen little else concerning the physique either of him "Who framed of Thalaba that wild and wondrous song," or of those to whom his blood is transmitted.

Still, at the time I have mentioned, it was impossible to look unmoved upon so much perfection of color, sound and expression as arrested my eyes at Keawick; in the tasteful and hospitable dwelling of him who brought to earth that "Glendower," "one of the fairest race of Heaven," (the Heaven of India,) who averted the designs of Arvalan, in that glowing and magnificent poem "The curse of Kama."

The "Herodotus of Brazil," himself, had seen, when I first saw him, fifty-seven winters; but his once dark locks, though sprinkled with snow, were still curling as if childhood had not passed; and looked wild and thick as those of his own "Thalaba."

A "chevelure" like this, with black eyes, aquiline features, and figure tall and slender, without attenuation, assisted in presenting such an image as is seldom viewed in reality; while the effect of the whole was enhanced by easy, unpretending and affectionate manners.

The eldest daughter of this "Minstrel of the Mountains" was called Edith May, (the name of May having been given because she was born in the month of blossoms.) This lady (now Mrs. Warton,) was the bard himself with a different sex and complexion. "Her features his, but softened." Her gentle, graceful deportment was in perfect harmony with flaxen hair tinted with gold; and the outline of her father's face was embellished by the blue eyes and other delicate colors of her too sensitive mother, (named, also, Edith,) who had been chosen for "love alone."

The second daughter, Birtha, as I have said, was absent. The third, Catherine, "between the woman and the child," had hazel eyes and fine features, altogether with a delicate shape and complexion.

Cuthbert, the only son, was a boy of eleven or twelve with an open, expressive countenance.

I could not help remarking that in the names of each individual of this pleasing group was heard that sound produced by the letter T followed by its companion H, which is so difficult to the organs of foreigners, but which, when tenderly pronounced, brings to mind the down of a swan or the wing of a dove. Edith, Birtha, Catharine, Cuthbert, Southey.

If affection and innocence can insure felicity on earth, the course of their lives must be smooth as waters where the swan reposes; for certainly all their movements seemed innocent as those of the dove.

The month of March was nearly half gone, when I reached Keswick, by the road from Edinburgh; having passed, in my way, an old stone building, pointed out to me as "Branksome Tower," known by the "Lay of the last Minstrel," who has sung the achievements of Scottish knights and ladies.

This village, at the foot of Skiddaw, though much visited in the summer, has still all the wildness of nature. Daffodils were in blossom when I walked there; and primroses, daisies and violets opened, among the trees, upon every bank and grass plat, while the mountains, clustering about "Derwent Water," assumed such tints and shades of purple and blue as are peculiar to a northern climate.

"Oh, man, thou pendulum betwixt a smile and tear!"

All these pleasing images seemed to flit before me while putting into rhyme the "Song of Prince Hoel,"—but before I could write it down, tidings reached me of the illness, (perhaps incurable,) of him who drew it from the oblivion of its native Welsh.

Death already has robbed me of so much, that I have become, as it were, insensate to grief, and accustomed, even in my least unhappy moments, to reflect on the incertitude of all earthly hopes and wishes. I can now hear of losses with melancholy rather than with horror.

So much of the soul of Robert Southey has been dispersed about the world, that a "translation" to some other state of being, (now, before time has given him any burthen to carry,) would be, perhaps, no misfortune, except to those left to sorrow. Yet to know that so benevolent a being is still existing, feeling, joying, and suffering, on the sphere of our own mortality, awakens a feeling so nearly allied to pleasure, that all who can appreciate excellence must entreat of Heaven the continuance upon earth of a cotemporary of whom it may be said:

"VIRTUE AND HE ARE ONE!"

MARIA DEL OCCIDENTE.

Island of Cuba, Cafetal Hermita, Partido Guamaeo, Jan. 20, 1841

[The following is the thrilling and effective song which was given with such splendid effect by Russell at his Concert last Tuesday evening. It is now for the first time printed. It is the production of DR. COATES.

THE GAMBLER'S WIFE.

Dark is the night! How dark! No light! No fire!
Cold, on the hearth, the last faint sparks expire!
Shivering she watches by the cradle side
For him who pledged her love—last year a bride!

"Hark! 'Tis his footstep! No!—'Tis past!—'Tis gone!"
Tick!—Tick!—How wearily the time crawls on!
Why should he leave me thus?—He once was kind!
And I believed 't would last!—How mad!—How blind!"

"Rest thee, my babe!—Rest on!—'Tis hunger's cry!
Sleep!—For there is no food!—The font is dry!
Famine and cold their wearying work have done. [one.
My heart must break!—And thou!—The clock strikes

"Hush! 'tis the dice-box! Yes! he's there! he's there!
For this!—for this he leaves me to despair!
Leaves love! leaves truth! his wife! his child! for what?
The wanton's smile—the villain—and the sot!"

"Yet I'll not curse him. No! 'tis all in vain!
'Tis long to wait, but sure he'll come again!
And I could starve and bless him but for you,
My child!—his child! Oh, fiend!" The clock strikes two.

"Hark! How the sign-board creaks! The blast howls by.
Mdan! moan! A dirge swells through the cloudy sky!
Ha! 'tis his knock! he comes!—he comes once more!"
'Tis but the lattice flaps! Thy hope is o'er!

"Can he desert us thus! He knows I stay
Night after night in loneliness to pray
For his return—and yet he sees no tear!
No! no! It cannot be! He will be here!

"Nestle more closely, dear one, to my heart!
Thou'rt cold! Thou'rt freezing! But we'll not part!
Husband!—I die!—Father!—It is not he!"
Oh, God! protect my child!" The clock strikes three.

In addition to the above the following concluding stanza, from the pen of another gentleman, himself the author of some fine songs, was sung by Mr. Russell:

They're gone, they're gone! the glimmering spark hath
The wife and child are number'd with the dead. [fled!—
On the cold earth, outstretched in solemn rest,
The babe lay frozen on its mother's breast:
The gambler came at last—but all was o'er—
Dread silence reign'd around—the clock struck four!

THE MEMBER'S LADY.

The little borough town of H— was, at the period from whence my story dates its commencement, in a state of most unusual bustle and excitement. The old member, who had quietly walked the course at every election for the last thirty years, was gathered to the vault of his forefathers; an opposition candidate had been put forward to dispute the succession with his nephew, and the little town, usually so peaceful, was all alive with preparations for a contested election. Yes; the Honorable Charles Dacre was gone to his long home, and there were actually doubts whether his nephew and heir, the Honorable Henry, would be allowed to reign in his stead! Even that minute section of the great world, that island of life in the midst of an ocean of woodland and field, and meadow, was as full of the fire and rancor of party spirit for the time being, as the largest manufacturing town in the kingdom could have been. Once it had been a united little community; every man was in the Dacre interest, every woman wore the Dacre blue, and the Dacres were universally permitted to be lords, and masters, and "monarchs of all they surveyed." But a change had been quietly going on during the latter years of the old member's life. There were many who cherished doubts whether the feeble and aged man who generally paired off in the middle of the session with some equally active member of the opposition, was as efficient a representative as their thriving little borough might have had. Moreover, radical orators, men in queer broad-skirted coats, dirty waistcoats, and low-crowned, white hats, might occasionally be seen to pay short visits to H—, and finding some sparks of discontent already kindled there, they failed not to return again and again, till the flame had spread so far that, more than once, crowds of gaping auditors assembled in the tap-room of the "Green Dragon," and listened to and wondered at the spoutings of the strangers, and who came from none knew whence, and went none knew whither. Men in paper caps, or leather aprons, might now be seen at the street corners, or by the tap-room fire, spelling over some pamphlet left by the last orator, or devouring the columns of some "liberal" print, which had found its way to the landlord of the aforesaid "Green Dragon" through the post office. There was a talk, too, of a Mechanics' Institute, which could, would, and should be established in an old house in the Market-place, shut up for years, because it was haunted; but old superstitions had the better of modern innovation in this last instance, and the palefaced youth who had been sent from some mysterious source to superintend the formation of the society in question, gave up the attempt in despair; but, being too much fascinated by the dark eyes of the barmaid at the "Swan" to think of quitting H—, he opened a school, wherein he dealt out mathematics, latin, natural history, and various other branches of useful knowledge to the youth of the place, at the charge of eight pence per week for each pupil.

All these "signs of the times" were thickening in H—, when suddenly the death of Mr. Dacre brought the latent principle of opposition into action, and now drums were beating, flags flying, and streamers fluttering from the windows of the "Green Dragon" and the "Swan" bearing the different colors and devices of the Honorable Henry Dacre, and Wilmot Frisby, Esq.

It is not my intention here to detail the humors of an election, nor should I have adverted to the subject, but that that memorable contest led to more important consequences for Henry Dacre than even his return to parliament. He had very seldom visited H— during his uncle's life, but the influence of name, property, and his excellent character ensured his triumph, though it was not achieved without a severe struggle.

He was a fine looking man of about two and thirty. His manners were perfectly polished and gentlemanly, yet scarcely prepossessing to strangers. He was naturally shy, and his shyness was accounted pride; peculiarly quiet in company, and his enemies charged his reserve upon stupidity, but nothing could be farther from the truth. He had read much, and was a vigilant observer of men and things; had a cool, clear head, great good sense, and most valuable business habits; just the man of whom a useful working member might be made, though very unlikely to shine as an orator. He had been in Parliament before, and had always proved himself a sound reasoner, and a useful man. When he spoke, which was but seldom, his speeches were clear and concise, full of plain demonstrations and solid sense, but they were delivered tamely, and were utterly unadorned. He had never personally canvassed the free and independent electors of H—, till the week preceding the election, and even then his sterling qualities might have been of little avail, but for the assistance of one, better skilled than himself to win the "golden opinions" requisite to success in the approaching contest.

Sir Arthur De Lisle was five or six years younger than Dacre, and of a far gayer and more vivacious disposition. He was just the very person to be popular on an occasion like the present; an adept in the art of pleasing, and full of animal spirits. He had engaged himself in his friend's cause, partly from real regard for him, and partly from a love of that fun and frolic which he anticipated would abound at a country election. He was naturally idle, but not indolent, very wealthy, and though sufficiently dissipated, had not yet arrived at that stage of listless satiety which prevents a man from finding amusement in the bustle and excitement of the scenes around him. He had offered to accompany Dacre from town to the scene of action, and his proposal, if not joyfully received, was at least complacently acquiesced in.

"We have got on nobly to-day, Dacre," exclaimed Sir Arthur, as on the afternoon of their third day's canvass, they emerged from the last straggling street at the outskirts of the town, and turned down a quiet green lane, by the sides of which were scattered a few dwellings of different degrees of pretension. "All have been gone through now except this handful of houses, and we may count on two-thirds as sure. We will finish our business here at once, for to-morrow will be a busy day with us."

They entered a small farm-house as they spoke, and having, through the eloquence of Sir Arthur, obtained a promise from its mistress, that her husband should vote for Mr. Dacre, "though to be sure he had been thinking Master Frisby would be a good enough man for a change," they proceeded to make memoranda of such particulars respecting the neighboring householders, as the good woman could afford them.

"Next house, Gabriel Gripp—two votes, father and son, but supposed to be pledged already to the Frisby interest; the green gate on the other side, Abel Flummy, a sure card; next to him, Mr. Longborrow, an old bachelor, politics unknown, but keeps a housekeeper—must have a word with her. White cottage, Mr. Fulham."

"Well, do you know what side Mr. Fulham is likely to take?"

"Lauk, sir, Mr. Fulham be in his grave this eight months!"

"Then there is no voter living there?"

"No, not that the worthy dame had ever heard of; but there was Giles Dingaway, the parish clerk, at the bottom of the lane, and of course he would vote for Mr. Dacre."

So bidding the woman a courteous good day, the gentlemen departed.

Of their adventures with the families of Gripp, Flummy, Longborrow, and Dingaway it boots not to tell, inasmuch as it has nothing to do with the story. But as they passed the white cottage in order to reach the residence of the "true blue" clerk, which stood a few hundred yards farther on, both paused for a minute in admiration of its beauty. It was very small, but every thing about it was in the nicest order; the little flower pots were beautifully kept, the grass had the brilliancy and smoothness of velvet, the palings that divided it from the road were snowy white, and the inner fence of sweet briar, unequalled in luxuriance and fragrance. Every thing about the dwelling was in the same style, the walls were as white as the palings, the long transom windows shone like crystal, and the porch above the door was covered with the most beautiful creepers. The little stand of green-house plants upon the grass, was filled with the very choicest kinds, and not a fallen leaf, not a broken twig had been permitted to remain upon the smooth turf around them. The casements were open to admit the soft summer air, but the blinds in the lower rooms were drawn, and there was altogether such an air of intense quiet about the place that it might have been supposed to be uninhabited, but for a form that suddenly appeared at an upper window. It was that of a young girl, apparently not more than sixteen or seventeen, dressed in the deepest mourning, yet dressed so carefully and neatly that the presiding genius of the grass plots and flower beds was at once revealed. Her complexion, though inclining to brunette, was beautifully clear; her throat and bosom formed the most perfect symmetry; and the hand with which she drew aside the curtain, was small and delicate, as a hand could be. Her dark hair was simply parted on her forehead, and twisted up behind in a knot, from which a few luxuriant tresses fell in rich waves on her shoulders. Altogether, her appearance was so singular, as well as beautiful, that Dacre and his friend gazed on her for some moments as if spell-bound, without speaking a word. If she perceived them, she gave no indication that she was conscious of their presence, for after looking for some little time toward the distant prospect of blue hills, which stretched far into the distance, she quietly let down the blind and retired.

"How very, very lovely!" said Dacre, as they pursued their way.

"Which?" interrogated Sir Arthur, "the cottage or the widow?"

"Surely that was no widow?" said Dacre; "so young, so beautiful,—besides, though she was in deep mourning, she did not wear a widow's cap."

"Very true," said Sir Arthur, as they stopped at Mr. Dingaway's door.

"Where are you going now, De Lisle?" asked Dacre, with a surprised air, as, on their return up the lane, Sir Arthur suddenly paused before the white cottage, and unlatched the little gate.

"How can you ask, man?" was the reply, "I am going to make acquaintance with Mrs. Fulham."

"But, my dear fellow, we have not the shadow of an excuse. No gentleman resides here," remonstrated Dacre.

"We are not obliged to know that, are we?" said Sir Arthur, as he rapped at the door. "Leave it all to me."

The apartment into which they were shown was small, and though the furniture was unexpensive, much taste was displayed in the arrangement of it. There were some traces of better times in a handsome piano, some valuable old china, and a few richly bound books, and there were two portraits on the wall, one of which, though of a lady of middle age, bore some resemblance to the fair apparition at the window.

"Mamma will be down immediately, gentlemen, if you can wait a few minutes," said a female voice, and the same apparition was before them. Dacre merely bowed, but Sir Arthur, who was never abashed, or at a loss for words, began at once to converse with the fair girl with all the ease imaginable.

"Miss Fulham, I presume,—pray pardon our intrusion, but we called on a little business which we shall have the honor of explaining to your mamma presently. Meanwhile, I must congratulate you in having found so beautiful a residence in this neighborhood, though I doubt not it owes most of its beauty to your influence."

"We certainly have a very fine prospect from our windows," said Ellen; and simple and common as her words were, Dacre thought he had never heard so musical a sentence issue from human lips; and as De Lisle and she talked, the discourse gradually turning on the flowers before them, and the little canary that hung in the window, and as she descanted on the culture of the one, and made the other sing his sweetest song, with all the artless enthusiasm of a very young girl, Dacre felt as if a new world of beauty had opened on his senses, as if a new existence were beginning within him. Her manner was utterly free from affectation, frank and artless as that of a little child, yet without the least taint of boldness or hoydenism. She laughed at some sally of De Lisle, and what a sweet laugh was hers! No school girl giggle, no hysterical cackinnation, but a smile made vocal, a sudden gush of music from the heart strings. I wish I could find words wherewith to portray the loveliness of Ellen Fulham, but I might as well describe the tints of a rainbow or the radiance of a meteor.

Presently Mrs. Fulham made her appearance, and while De Lisle is making the best apology he can frame for the intrusion of himself and his companion, we will retrace a little of the former history of the widow and her beautiful daughter.

When very young she had become the wife of Mr. Fulham, a man many years older than herself, and the leading banker in a flourishing provincial town. He lived in no noble style, and kept up his credit so well, that until his death, it was never suspected that his affairs were in any way involved. On examination, however, they appeared to be in the greatest confusion, and had he lived a few months longer he would have been inevitably a bankrupt. As it was, through the clemency of some of the principal creditors, a slender provision was secured to his widow for her life, but a change in her manner of living was necessary. She was a woman of a meek and chastened spirit, a sincere and humble Christian, and therefore she repined not at the loss of the luxuries and elegance which hitherto surrounded her. Her health had for many years been delicate, and even in her time of splendor, she had been so accustomed to consider "this world as all a fleeting show," that she was the better prepared to acquiesce in whatever might be the will of the Almighty concerning her. She was never heard to murmur when she left her large mansion, and retired with her only child to the small cottage, where they now resided. Yet one anxious thought did sometimes trouble her quiet and resigned spirit. What would be the fate of that child should she be deprived of her mother's fostering care? True, there were friends and relatives who would not let that fair girl absolutely want, but dependence is a bitter thing, more especially to those who have known none, save on the kindness that never disappoints—that of fond and indulgent parents.

"Very true, ma'am, exactly so; but if you have no votes connected with you, you must have interest. Miss Fulham, we called to ask for your interest; you can promise us that, at any rate."

"My daughter and myself live in such complete retirement, that we are not likely to have an opportunity of testing the strength of our influence," replied Mrs. Fulham, coldly, for she was already aware of the admiration with which De Lisle regarded Ellen, and her motherly heart took alarm.

"Well, then, your good wishes. My dear lady, you can certainly promise us your good wishes," said De Lisle, as he reluctantly rose to depart. He shook hands with both ladies, while Dacre only ventured to bow. "You will permit us to call, and tell you the event of this contest," he continued; and without waiting to hear Mrs. Fulham's answer, they hastily left the house.

"What an exceedingly intrusive and impertinent person!" exclaimed Mrs. Fulham, as soon as the door had closed upon them. "They must have known perfectly well that there were no gentlemen here."

"Oh, mamma, why should they have come then?" said Ellen, and she stopped short; the color rising in her cheek, as a suspicion of the true object of their call rushed into her mind. "Besides, I thought him such a pleasant man," she continued, though without raising her eyes.

"I know you did, Ellen; and that very circumstance gives me pain. Do not look so grave, my darling; come here and sit by me, whilst I talk to you."

Ellen sat down on a low cushion by her mother's knee, as she had done from a little child, and looked up in Mrs. Fulham's face with eyes so sweet and soft, that the mistress stooped and kissed her smooth brow before she proceeded.

"I do not see why you should be so much pleased with this Sir Arthur De Lisle, if that be his name; or I should not have said a word about it. It always grieves me, Ellen, to see you, as I sometimes fear you are, disposed to take strong likings to people at first sight. I fear this person is one who would not improve upon acquaintance."

"Dear mamma, how can you think so? He seemed to me so pleasant and gentlemanly!"

"You thought him pleasant, my Ellen, because he paid you a few idle compliments, and was evidently struck with your appearance. Ellen, you know I have never used the policy which would strive to conceal from you that you have a pretty face. I only want to teach you to rate it at its true value, and strive to let your chief attraction lie in something far better. As to calling him gentlemanly, depend on it his friend, Mr. Dacre, is ten times more of a gentleman than he."

"What! that cold, proud, silent man?"

"Even so, my dear; at any rate he was not talking nonsense or using impertinent familiarity in a house where he was an entire stranger. I could plainly see that he was vexed and embarrassed by the very free and easy bearing of his companion. But we will say no more of them; for I see a defence of Sir Arthur rising to your lips. I only hope they will come no more."

"I hope so too, mamma," said Ellen; but the deceived herself: she would have felt really disappointed if they had not called again.

Two hours indeed had scarcely elapsed before a messenger arrived from the visitants of the morning. He brought a note for Mrs. Fulham, most respectfully worded, beginning with "My dear Madam," and ending with "Yours most faithfully, Arthur De Lisle;" and accompanied by two splendid favors of the Dacre blue, richly ornamented with silver. They were sent, said the note, to remind Mrs. Fulham that she was fairly enlisted in the Dacre interest, and that she must wish them good speed with all her heart. Good Mrs. Fulham! She was not without a touch of human weakness after all; and she read the note aloud in a very complacent tone of voice, after having first perused it to herself. It was very politely turned, certainly; and there was no allusion to Ellen, except a "compts. to Miss Fulham," by way of postscript. She did not say she was pleased, but she laid the note carefully by with the favors, and wondered whether the opposition candidate had any chance.

The nomination of the candidates was appointed for the following day, and of course the bustle in the town was increased tenfold; but the white cottage was as quiet as ever—nay, it seemed even quieter than usual, as the distant sounds of noisy music and loud voices were borne past it on the wind.

That day Sir Arthur de Lisle was just in his element, in the centre of noise and excitement; speechifying, coaxing, cajoling, dazzling all with his brilliancy, and confounding those whom he did not convince with his rapid and witty eloquence. The heats about H— were famous for the breeding of a remarkably strong and useful species of donkeys, and the donkey owners were rather an influential body. The Frisbyites had marked them for their own; for one or two elders of the tribe were known to be "liberally" inclined; but the eloquence of Sir Arthur prevailed even in this instance, and the donkey owners of H— went over in a body to the Dacre interest. I do not think the image of Ellen Fulham ever troubled the mind of De Lisle during that eventful day; though when its business was concluded, he gallantly drank her health in a bumper of Burgundy. But with Dacre it was otherwise. The fair face of our heroine had beamed on him amidst all the crowd and confusion, like that of a guardian angel! and her sweet voice was still lingering about his memory, apart from and unmingled with the harsher sounds that forced themselves on his outward sense. Let no sceptic insinuate that love at first sight is an impossible thing. Dacre had seen Ellen Fulham but once, but he felt that she could never—never be forgotten.

In the times of which I write, an election was a very different thing to the business-like affairs of these degenerate days. All the tradespeople who sold any article liable to an extra consumption at such a time—all the voters whose residences were at some distance—all the idle boys, and almost all the women, felt it to be their interest to keep the poll open as long as possible. It was a holiday—a jubilee—a time to eat, drink, and be merry, for every body except the quiet householders, and the unfortunate candidates themselves. Therefore, when, at the end of the ninth day, Mr. Frisby resigned, having only three more men to poll, and Mr. Dacre was declared duly elected, all the interested parties aforesaid felt disappointed and annoyed, as they surely had a right to be. For once the successful candidate did not rejoice over the comparatively early settlement of the contest, for his business called him at once to London, and Ellen Fulham had to be parted with. Both he and De Lisle had made many opportunities of seeing her during the last week of their stay, for perseverance effects wonders; and Sir Arthur had made good his footing at the White Cottage, and went in and out just as he pleased, before worthy Mrs. Fulham could devise means to prevent it. Her dislike to him was fast giving way before his powers of pleasing. She had learnt to be amused with his brilliant conversation, and to feel disappointed when his call was made at a later hour than usual. Both Dacre and De Lisle regarded Ellen as the loveliest creature on earth, yet their feelings about her were as different as possible. De Lisle never for an instant dreamed of marrying the beautiful recluse. He intended that his wife should possess rank and wealth, as well as beauty; and Ellen had neither. He told Dacre, indeed, that he adored her, but that whatever the sacrifice might cost him, he must resign her; and immediately after this confidential communication, he went whistling down stairs to give some order respecting their next day's journey.

Dacre's love for Ellen was such as a man of high and lofty feelings and unblemished honor was likely to entertain for a beautiful and innocent girl; and loving her thus honorably, he was resolved, could he win her, to make her his wife. He had secretly dreaded the superior tact and accomplishments of De Lisle, and it was an infinite relief to him to find he need have no serious apprehensions of a rival in his friend. Still he was a prudent man, and before making Ellen a regular offer, he determined to see some friends of Mrs. Fulham, residing in London, of whose respectability he was aware, and from them ascertain if the representations she made of her situation were correct. Should his inquiries prove satisfactory, he resolved at once to learn his fate from Ellen herself. He and De Lisle went together to take leave of the Fulhams, and Dacre was pained to see that Ellen appeared surprised and hurt at the unabated good spirits of Sir Arthur. The fact was, he had flirted with her, was leaving her, might never see her again, and was already anticipating new pleasures in London; therefore he showed as little emotion as he felt. She had gathered two beautiful roses, and gave one to De Lisle, which he received with the most fluent expressions of gratitude; she offered the other to Dacre, and—though his thanks were less fervently expressed, she could not but see how real was the pleasure with which he took it from her hand. In a few minutes, De Lisle had inadvertently twisted his flower to pieces, but Dacre's was held as carefully as if it had been a fairy treasure. Weeks afterward the circumstance was recalled to her mind, and the withered rose produced in at-testation of how dearly it had been prized.

"This place really does seem duller than it used to be," said Mrs. Fulham, one hot drowsy afternoon about a week or ten days after the departure of Dacre and De Lisle; "I am sorry now for your sake, Ellen, that these people ever came for you miss them sadly I am sure."

"Oh, mamma, you know we have just the same sources of amusement we had before we knew them, and besides, you have often said it is wrong to repine when Providence withdraws a pleasure or a blessing;" and she stopped and turned away, for her eyes were filled with tears, and she did not wish her mother to see them. She was often sad now, and wherefore? Was she in love? and was it with Sir Arthur De Lisle? Not exactly; he had not the noble qualities that awaken that deep and undying attachment of which a girl, such as Ellen Fulham was then, is capable; but he had excited, dazzled, and flattered her, and she had learned to look forward to his coming with trembling eagerness, and to feel a gentle regret when he left her. Then there was Dacre, whose good sense and richly stored mind had inspired her with a sort of reverence for him; yet she was certain she was not in love with him—he was too old, too grave, too silent. Yet she was sorry, very sorry to lose his society, for he could tell her every thing she wanted to know, and she felt a kind of reliance on all he said, which she would have been puzzled to describe or account for. Now they were both gone—should they ever meet her again? But who is that tall, gentlemanly man coming down the lane? Not De Lisle—he was more stately of bearing. Nearer and nearer he came—it was Dacre—certainly it was Dacre! That it was he, and the reason of his early return to their neighborhood, flashed over her mind with the rapidity of lightning. The "oh, mother! there is Mr. Dacre!" which informed Mrs. Fulham of his approach, was followed by a hasty retreat to her chamber; and before Ellen had arranged her hair to her mind, and effected all the changes in her attire which she deemed needful, Dacre was in the house, quietly but fervently revealing to Mrs. Fulham the love with which her daughter had inspired him, and offering the most liberal settlements in case she should consent to become his wife.

The gratitude of Mrs. Fulham on the prospect of such an advantageous marriage for her beautiful child, may be easily conceived. It was splendid beyond her most sanguine hopes. She was not naturally an ambitious or an avaricious woman, but she could not be blind to the advantages of such a union, and joyfully commiserated Dacre's proposal to Ellen. Before the trembling girl could collect her ideas, or fairly balance in her mind the question of whether she really loved or not, she was his betrothed bride, and he had pressed her to his heart, and saluted her as his own beloved Ellen.

The inhabitants of H— had scarcely subsided into tolerable calmness after the election, when they were called upon to gossip and wonder over the approaching marriage of their new member. Amongst the young ladies, indeed, the astonishment was boundless. Who was this Ellen Fulham? Nobody knew any thing of her or her mother; they never visited, they had not attended the election-ball, or joined the canvassing party for Mr. Dacre, formed by the more vivacious ladies in the little town. Where on earth had he picked up so obscure a bride? There was one young lady who had three votes in her household, which she had teased her father and brothers into bestowing on Mr. Dacre, because Sir Arthur De Lisle had assured her that Dacre remembered her as a child, and had spoken with delight of the prospect of seeing her again! There were others similarly situated, who were all astonished beyond measure; and each secretly holding herself to be ill-used and deceived, resolved never to put faith in a baronet again. Still the preparations for the wedding went on. It was understood that the principal part of the bridal paraphernalia was to come from London, but the orders given to the artistes of H— were so ample, that many doubted if any thing more could possibly be required.

At length the eventful morning dawned. The bishop of the diocese attended at the parish church, and pronounced the nuptial benediction. The bride looked lovelier than ever; for lace, satin, and pearls, beautified even such beauty as hers. Bells rang, children shouted, horses pranced, banners waved; and amidst all the joyful tumult called forth by the occasion, the young bride was borne away toward the metropolis in her husband's splendid traveling carriage. Alas! of all those who gazed on the member's lady with looks of envy and admiration, there was, perhaps, not one—no, not the poorest in the throng—who would have changed places with her, could the veil of the future have been raised before their eyes!

If ever woman on earth was happy, surely Mrs. Dacre was so during the first years of her married life: yet, perhaps, her happiness was not altogether derived from the mere indulgence of affection. She was mistress of a princely establishment; she was permitted to receive her mother as an inmate whenever and for as long as she pleased, and to add to her comforts by many valuable presents; she had not a wish ungratified, and might indulge at will in all the gaities that women, especially very young women, are fond of. If she had been very deeply in love with her husband, she would, perhaps, have seen that he would have been as well content had she devoted more of her time to home and its quiet pleasures; but though she loved him dearly in some sort, I will not affirm that he really constituted the principal source of her happiness. Dress, jewels, furniture; these had become her delight. She had an exquisite taste, and her house, her furniture, and her equipage, were all allowed to be unexceptionable. She delighted in inventing new costumes, peculiarly becoming to her style of beauty; though to give her her due, she always ran first to her husband when she had any thing new or pretty to display. For his part, he looked on dress as so very childish and trifling an affair, that he would scarcely have noticed the fashion of her garments, if she had not called his attention to them herself. He looked at her with mingled pleasure and pain on such occasions;—pleasure, that she looked so lovely, and was desirous to please him—pain, that her mind was so much directed to such insignificant matters. Perhaps he did not understand her either; he did not see how completely her happiness was nurtured in excitement. He had a proud, deep love for her; he was proud of her beauty and her elegance—proud to see her admired, and to hear her spoken of in terms of glowing praise; and he loved her tenderly as his wife and the mother of his child. But his was not the lip-love that is forever flowing forth in rhapsodies about itself or its object. He seldom said anything about it, while every day, every hour, it shone conspicuous in contrivances to give her pleasure, or to add to the luxuries that surrounded her. Now, her affection, less profound in kind, and more completely the creature of circumstances, had a great inclination for display—not, indeed, before others—her sense of propriety would have forbidden that; but she would steal into his study when he was alone and busy, and really tease him with the expressions of her affection. She had a hundred pretty phrases of love on her tongue, and a playful tenderness of manner, that to any one less grave than Dacre would have been bewitching; but to say nothing of the difference of their years, that of their dispositions prevented her fascinations being fully appreciated. There was no response in his manner to hers. At the time he was receiving her caresses, an observer would have thought him cold and unfeeling; but it was not so. His heart was fuller of love than even her own, but his quiet and somewhat formal manner prevented the utterance of it.

If Ellen had been beautiful as a girl, she was endued with tenfold loveliness as a wife and mother. The tastefulness of her dress, and the constant serenity of a mind that had nothing to oppose its will or ruffle its peace, had their due effect in improving her appearance. She retained all the freshness of childhood and elasticity of youth, while her manner was refined, and her enthusiastic spirit directed toward the most graceful pursuits by the example of those among whom she dwelt. To see her bending over her embroidery frame, her delicate fingers busy among the brightest silks and richest satins, was to look on a personification of luxury. She retained all her fondness for flowers and birds, and her conservatory was filled with the rarest exotics, and cages of bright-plumed prisoners from all quarters of the world. Her child was a beautiful creature, bearing a marked resemblance to herself, and she loved him with a feeling more resembling a passion than the calm steady depths of maternal affection; and it was in such a home, thus surrounded by every thing that can "minister delight unto the sense," that Sir Arthur De Lisle found her on his return from a lengthened sojourn on the Continent.

He had not seen Ellen since the day of her marriage, when he himself had given her away; and though he had always thought her pretty, he really felt surprised at finding her much more beautiful than he formerly supposed her to be. Whether he saw her in her graceful morning attire, surrounded by all the elegancies that set off female loveliness to the best advantage, and playing the mother so prettily as she fondled her beautiful child, or in her rich evening dress, the centre of some group of admirers, the life and light of her husband's stately mansion, he decided her to be the loveliest creature under heaven, and marvelled at his own stupidity in not discerning the germs of all her perfections in the fair young girl who had caught his fickle fancy in days gone by—who had been so lightly resigned and so easily forgotten. Less innocent thoughts and feelings than had been awakened by her beauty before, were aroused within him, for he had undergone even a greater change than herself. The gay youth, whose errors had seemed to spring more from thoughtlessness than premeditation, had become a dissipated man of the world. His manners were more conspicuous than before; but three years' residence on the Continent had destroyed the small influence that moral principle had ever possessed over his mind, and imbued it with that intense selfishness in the pursuit of his pleasures, which is the inseparable companion of unrestrained indulgence. Moreover, the refined loveliness of Ellen, her winning manner, her polished elegance, had kindled in his breast a feeling more nearly akin to real attachment than any he had ever experienced; and, with a strange inconsistency, he soon began to regard Dacre as one that had in some sort defrauded him of this beautiful prize.

Had Mr. Dacre been less occupied with public affairs, and had circumstances permitted him to spend as much time in the society of De Lisle as he had formerly done, it is more than probable that the material change in the character of the latter would not have escaped his observation. An hour occasionally passed with him while others were present, did not afford him much opportunity for detecting the real state of De Lisle's feelings; and on the whole, he thought him rather improved than otherwise. Therefore it was, that Sir Arthur was permitted to pass hours and hours with Mrs. Dacre; therefore it was, that her long morning and her noontide drive or ride were shared with him; and the world, the Argus-eyed world of fashion, was making its comments and whispering its suspicions, long before Dacre dreamed that cause for suspicion existed.

It could serve no useful purpose to detail the process by which Sir Arthur De Lisle succeeded in weaning Mrs. Dacre's affections from her husband, and fixing them on himself. I might probably render my tale more interesting by describing the allurements to which she was exposed, and the many struggles of her own mind before she yielded to their influence; but I much doubt the goodness of the effect produced by such displays of human weakness. Suffice it that she imagined she found in De Lisle all that she missed in Dacre—affection that was eloquent as well as deep, attention to her every caprice, unwearied devotion, that flattered her vanity and fed her fanciful craving for excitement; and for this, these vain and deceptive appearances, she put away the faith of her wedded love, nor doubted that the sterling qualities on which she had leaned in Dacre, whose real worth she had never known, because their support had never been withdrawn from her for a moment, would be also in De Lisle.

I have said that Dacre was long before he had even suspected that any thing unusual was going on in his house. The town had been talking of Mrs. Dacre's strange conduct for weeks before Dacre himself had observed any thing strange in it. How his jealousy became aroused I know not, but it was at one of their country seats that Ellen received the first intimation of his uneasiness.

Dacre had not invited De Lisle to accompany them to H—; nevertheless, the second day of their sojourn there witnessed the arrival of Sir Arthur at the Swan Hotel, and the next morning brought him to Dacre's house. He declined staying to dinner, however, a circumstance which, as it will presently be seen, served to increase Mr. Dacre's suspicions.

"Ellen," said he to his wife, on the following day, "I want to say a few words to you." The color left her cheek in an instant, and her heart beat so violently that she could scarcely stand.

"Why do you tremble so?" said he, with a searching look; "I am only going to ask where you walked last evening after you left me in the dining-room?"

She saw that evasion would avail her nothing, and she falteringly answered, "through the shrubberies."

"And who did you chance to meet there, Ellen? Who brought you back as far as the green gate, and was so long in taking leave?"

Again she felt compelled to answer truly, and she replied, "Sir Arthur De Lisle."

"Then, in future, Ellen, I expect that you will oblige me by remaining within doors after sunset, unless I am with you. Ellen, Ellen," he continued, after a moment's pause, "you do not know what thorns you are planting in my heart!"

She was silent, but the color returned vividly to her cheek—then left it pale as before, and she leaned against a chair for support.

"I am not naturally of a jealous temper," said Dacre, in a softened tone. "Ellen, you cannot say that I have ever exhibited that peevish watchfulness which some call a proof of love; and yet the Almighty only knows how deeply and entirely I have loved you! I believe you yet love me. I do not accuse you of crime, my dear Ellen, but I have lately observed some imprudence in your conduct—imprudence utterly unworthy of you as a wife, a mother, and a lady of high station. Abjure this folly, dearest; I know you have but to be convinced of your error to resign it; assume that proper dignity which will be a wall and bulwark to you, and all will yet be well."

What a multitude of feelings rushed through Ellen's heart, what thoughts crowded on her brain, as the words of her husband reached her ears. He did not know the worst then; did not even suspect it; knew not that her whole heart (so she vainly deemed) was given up to the idol of her fancy! Well, it was a momentary relief—a breathing time—yet she felt ready to sink beneath the burden of her secret shame and remorse! In the depth of her infatuation she had persuaded herself that Dacre was cold and insensible, and that his indifference in some degree justified her in her devotion to the enthusiastic De Lisle; yet, now he showed himself all that was affectionate, and mild, and generous. What should she do? She felt that things could not be allowed to continue in their present position much longer. Must she fall at Dacre's feet, and confess all the guilt and agony that was at work within her? How could she make so mighty an effort! Yet to feel herself reinstated in his favor, to continue to share his wealth and honors, knowing that he blindly believed her innocent—oh, that could never be! She put her hand to her forehead, and felt for a moment as if she were going mad.

Dacre drew nearer to her side, and evidently touched by her emotion, continued thus: "I see, dearest, that you are bewildered and terrified at the sudden idea that any conduct of yours could ever lay you open to animadversion; I did not for an instant imagine that you knew you were doing wrong; the very innocence of your mind might blind you as to the possible effect of your behavior; but believe me, sweet, we live in a censorious world, and the very appearance of evil must be avoided. Putting aside my own feelings in the case, it was surely my part, as your nearest and truest friend, to warn you of the error you were falling into." He put his arm round her waist and kissed her, but started back as he felt the icy coldness of her cheek. At the same moment she slid from his embrace, and sank senseless at his feet.

"The time has arrived, adorable Ellen, when you must make trial of the strength of that love in which you have so often professed your entire confidence. The tranquillity of your life has been broken, and the suspicion once awakened, will never be satisfied until all is revealed. How much better, then, that the scene, which must come sooner or later, should be enacted in your absence? Every arrangement for our flight and for our future happiness is already made, and I wait with impatience for the sign of assent that shall make you mine for ever. Delay no longer, beloved love! I assure you it is useless torture. What you have endured already is not a hundredth part of the suffering that awaits us both if you remain where you are. Exactly at three o'clock to-morrow morning I shall have a carriage waiting at the end of the path through the copse. You can easily reach it with the assistance of Jackson, who is true as steel. God bless you—send me one word—one line—but no refusal, or you will drive me frantic. God bless you!"

A. DE L—.

Such was the note which Mrs. Jackson delivered into her lady's hand, as she reclined languidly on a sofa three days after the memorable interview with her husband. She read it, and, wringing her hands, addressed herself to her maid, as if that worthy personage were already apprised of its contents, as there is little doubt she was—"Oh, Jackson, what must I do?"

"Why, ma'am, in course you will do just what you think best," replied the maid, pertly; "but after all that's come and gone, I think you had far best try 'all for love or the world well lost,' as my poor mother used to say. You may depend on it master has been looking uncommon curious and cross-grained ever since you took ill, and it's my solemn opinion he's only waiting till you're better, to examine into every thing; and though I'm sure he shall cut out my tongue before he gets a word from me, there's others who might speak, both what they know and what they do n't, which is worse; and then he might find the letters, too, if he took it into his head to search the cabinet, and I can't well take 'em without being seen, because he or his valet keeps in that anti-room every hour of the day."

"This is most dreadful," groaned Ellen, "Is there no escape—no alternative?"

"Why, ma'am, if you don't consider Sir Arthur's proposal as an escape, I don't know what is one," quoth Jackson. "I'm sure we may as well go with him at once, and far better too, for what's done can't be undone; and to my mind, Sir Arthur was the man you ought to have married all along, so after all 't is no great harm to nobody."

"But, my child, Jackson! Oh, I could never, never leave my own only child!" cried Ellen, passionately.

"Why so, ma'am? I am sure he'll be taken all care of, and he is not old enough to feel the miss of you very much, and we could do no good with him on the journey." But though the wife's sense of duty was blunted and perverted, the mother's love was yet keenly alive; and the miserable and guilty Ellen, while she made up her mind to forsake the husband of her youth, was resolute not to move one step from her home unless her child bore her company.

It was a moonless night, but the sky was thickly studded with stars, looking as purely and calmly down as if no scene of human guilt or agony were going on beneath them. The trembling Ellen, supported by Jackson, who carried a small bundle, stole noiselessly forth, and her child slept soundly under the influence of a soporific draught in the arms of De Lisle's valet, who had been sent to meet them. They reached the appointed spot without discovery, and Mrs. Dacre, more dead than alive, was assisted into the carriage by De Lisle, the child being placed on her lap.

"What is this?" cried De Lisle, as the soft hand of the little innocent brushed his cheek as it was lifted in.

"My child" murmured Ellen, faintly—"Oh, Arthur, I could not leave my child!"

"This was more than I bargained for!" muttered the baronet to himself, "but no matter now!"

The door closed—the postillions mounted.

"Won't us cut a figure in the papers?" quoth Mr. Crimpe, the valet, as he climbed into the rumble behind, and gallantly drew Mrs. Jackson beneath his ample cloak to shield her from the cold. The whips cracked, the horses sprang forward, and Ellen Dacre was an exile from her home forever.

We must now change the scene to Switzerland, and introduce our readers to the retreat of the guilty fugitives, which was a small but pretty cottage in the neighborhood of Chamouni. A lovelier summer residence could scarcely have been chosen. It stood on a gentle declivity at the foot of a lofty mountain, whose noble summit, "built as for eternity," rose protectively behind it. The former occupier had taken much pleasure in improving it, and it stood half embowered in evergreens and flowering shrubs, its rustic porches and verandah being covered with the choicest climbing plants. The interior was handsomely furnished, and with more attention to comfort than is usually found in a continental residence. In addition to this, De Lisle had spared no expense on any alteration that could add to Ellen's convenience or pleasure. Both pictures and musical instruments had been transported there as if by magic. And in the midst of all this luxury and beauty, if I were drawing a fancy picture, I should represent my heroine as gloomy and dispirited, tortured with the horrors of remorse, and vainly longing after the home she had left for ever. But I tell an over true tale, and it was not yet that Ellen felt the bitterness of the lot she had chosen for herself. As yet it realised her visions of romantic happiness to the uttermost. She had persuaded herself that Dacre did not love her with the intense and passionate devotion which she was entitled to receive, and which she felt she did receive from De Lisle. If a rising thought of pity and sorrow for what she had caused him to suffer clouded her mind, she put it away, and assured herself that he would not feel it very keenly, at least not for long, and that amidst the business and bustle of the world he would soon forget her. On gloomy days, when De Lisle was not with her, as was sometimes the case, or in the dead of night, when she suddenly started up, awakening from some dream of old times, a deep sharp pang would momentarily pierce her heart; but the spell, the infatuation was still upon her, and its breaking was yet to come. There was yet no retribution manifested, and her conscience slept that enchanted sleep, from whence the awakening is unspeakably terrible.

It was summer-time then, and she was happy. Let me not be misunderstood—her happiness was not an enviable one. With that deep, chastened peace which pervades the mind of the Christian, with that calm and tranquil happiness which is the result of high and holy principle, she had nothing to do. But she was happy so far as the absence of want, or sickness, or unkindness, and the presence of a devoted lover and her own beautiful child could make her. That child was just beginning to speak, to lispen her name, to take delight in flowers and birds, and all beautiful things. Her maid, Mrs. Jackson, who, presuming on her mistress's situation, had grown insolent and tyrannical, had been dismissed by Sir Arthur, and the Swiss servants about her treated her with the utmost deference. All things were submitted to her will—all things were at her command, and therefore she esteemed herself happy.

It was a lovely summer evening; Sir Arthur was absent, having gone to the next town to transact some business at his banker's, and Ellen sat by the window watching for his return, but meanwhile occupied in observing the beautiful effect of the sunset light on the opposite range of snow-capped mountains. Her child reposed at her feet on a velvet cushion—she had laid him there in preference to sending him to bed, for amidst all her happiness she had a lurking dislike to entire loneliness, and the tears swelled into her eyes as something like a vague thought of the time when she so rested by her mother passed over her mind.

That mother was now no more. She had died rather suddenly whilst on a visit at Dacre's, during the second year of her daughter's marriage; and for the first time since her elopement, the thought of how her mother would have felt, had she been living, came into her mind. And that thought once awakened, how many other and darker ones might have followed—it was but one linked unto many; but her meditations were interrupted by the approach of two persons by the same road on which she expected to see De Lisle. They stopped before the gate of the cottage, then went a few steps farther—passed again—returned and entered. A feeling of unaccountable terror seized her mind. She trembled excessively, and almost shrieked as they knocked at the door, although both were entire strangers to her, and she had no idea of the real object of their visit. The door was opened to them by the valet, Mr. Crimpe, and one of them addressed him in French, but the other impatiently interrupted him, exclaiming in English, "We are all right—this is the valet I know—is Mrs. Dacre at home, my friend?" The man stammered out a denial, and asserted that the house was inhabited only by a Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, which was the name the guilty fugitives had assumed. But the gentleman pushed him aside, and opening the door of the sitting-room, presented himself before Ellen. "Mrs. Dacre, I believe," said he, bowing to the object of his search, who had risen and stood before him, mute and pale as a statue. "I beg your pardon, madam, I have no wish to alarm you, but we come from Mr. Dacre." If a thunderbolt had fallen and rent the earth at her feet, the startled cry of Ellen could scarcely have been more full of terror. She replied not, but she stood with her lips apart, her cheek blanched to the hue of death, and her hand lifted and extended, gazing on the speaker in silent alarm. "We have undertaken a very unpleasant task, Mrs. Dacre," continued the spokesman, "but having undertaken it, we must perform it, and I am glad on the whole that we find you alone." Rousing herself in some degree from her trance of surprise and terror, Ellen motioned to the strangers to be seated, and sank back herself on the sofa. "It is only natural that Mr. Dacre should try to regain possession of a treasure so very dear to him as that he has been robbed of—he is resolved on its restoration, and you cannot blame us if"—"Must I go with you at once," said Ellen, faintly, "Must I?"—"Our commission does not extend to you, madam," was the reply; "Mr. Dacre never spoke of recalling you, nor will he attempt to do so, but we have orders, by any means, to take with us his son and heir, the child who accompanied your flight."

The shriek that Ellen Dacre gave at that moment was so unearthly, so appalling, that even the strong hearts of the men before her quailed and sank as it reached their ears. Its piercing tones resounded through every corner of the house, and immediately drew the servants to the apartment. She had now started from the couch, and was clasping the child to her bosom, and he had awakened, and clinging around her neck was crying bitterly. The strangers were not unmoved, but their orders were positive, and one of them advancing toward her endeavored to induce her to be calm. But she heard and heeded him not; still retaining her convulsive hold of the child, she sprang toward the door, and finding herself intercepted by the other unwelcome visitor, she sank suddenly down in helpless insensibility. It was long before she returned to consciousness, and when she was in some degree restored, she found that her child had been taken away during her swoon, and that the strangers had departed with it. Many days elapsed ere she regained any degree of tranquillity; and Sir Arthur's consolations, when she was sufficiently composed to listen to them, were not exactly of the kind she required. He, who could not appreciate the beauty of a pure and virtuous attachment—how could he enter into the holy depths of a mother's love and sorrow? The words "Do not fret so sadly, my sweet Ellen; you are more my own than ever; I have no rival now!" fell coldly on her ears, for she felt that they contained no sign of sympathy in her sufferings. All things around her seemed changed—a vast revulsion of feeling had come upon her. Her child had possessed far more of her real affection than her husband had ever received, even in their happiest days, and in taking him with her she thought she had secured her principal source of happiness. With him, and with the devoted lover who seemed so well to appreciate the sacrifices she had made for him, her life had been like a fairy dream; but her idol was wrested from her, and her heart went with it. Her health began to be impaired by her mental suffering, and the more so that she felt herself compelled to avoid alluding to her loss before Sir Arthur; for she soon found he was impatient of hearing of it: her lamentations implied a reproach to him, and she forbore them, but her pale and sunken cheek soon upbraided him more eloquently than words. He perceived her declining health, but he chose to attribute it to some unwholesome miasma from the neighboring lake, and proposed a change of residence. To this Ellen made no objection; nay, she felt it would be a relief, for here the face of her child looked up to her from every object she gazed upon.

Paris! They were in that centre of all that is gay and dissipated; and Ellen's beautiful figure, set off by the most splendid dresses, and her lovely face, whose paleness was disguised by art, were to be seen in every public place of amusement, and in not a few private houses, where the wealth and rank of Sir Arthur procured them admission; and despite the sorrow that was corroding her heart, she had hours of triumph and of gratification—the gratification of vanity, for her beauty and her doubtful position drew trains of admirers around her. And yet, when she returned to the magnificent hotel where they resided, she would weep bitterly as she laid aside her gorgeous ornaments, and wonder how she could have been gay. She felt, too, that Sir Arthur was changed; he was not less attentive to her wants and wishes; he treated her still with the same marked devotion; but she felt in her inmost soul that there was less of his heart in this outward show than there had formerly been. Yes! he was wearying of her, and the bare supposition was too dreadful to be contemplated: yet what right had she to complain? Her child! oh, could she but once more hear his prattling voice, and feel his little arms around her neck, what balm—what blessedness would it bring to her troubled mind! So she thought one evening as she sat in her splendid drawing-room, ready dressed for a large party, and only awaiting Sir Arthur's leisure to accompany him thither.

He entered—her eyes were full of tears; he spoke—and they overflowed in spite of her efforts to subdue the emotion which she knew from experience he disliked to witness. He asked her the cause of her grief, and she flung herself into his arms, and sobbed in agony. "My child, my child!" was all she could utter. He half pushed her from him, with a sudden gesture of vexation, and then asked, somewhat sternly—"What of that child, Ellen? Have you heard any bad news of him? Is he sick or dead?" "No, no," she murmured; "but indeed I cannot help it; thoughts—terrible thoughts will come to me as I sit alone. But do not be angry with me; I am weak and foolish, and I will strive against it—I will, indeed!" and as she made this promise, she sank on the sofa, and sobbed more violently than ever.

"Really, Ellen," said Sir Arthur, "this is too preposterous; what could you do with your child now, if you had him here? Depend on it, he will be better brought up than he could be by us; and I really think you ought to feel grateful to Dacre for relieving you of any further care about him." It was the first time he had named Dacre voluntarily since their fatal elopement, and the name did not soothe Ellen's ruffled feelings. "Oh, that I was with him once more—that I had never left him!" was her mental ejaculation; but she dared not for the world have given it utterance, for she had already found that De Lisle could frown even upon her, and her own wicked folly had cast from her every other being to whom she could look for kindness. She had been his mistress—she was fast verging into his slave.

From that evening Sir Arthur's attachment to his victim visibly declined, and he no longer took pains to conceal that such was the case. Her beauty was sadly impaired already, and her depression of spirits increased day by day. Sir Arthur accused her of ill temper, of want of affection, of useless repinings and discontent, and, finally—proposed a separation, promising to make ample provision for her support. This, however was still deferred; for heartless and selfish as De Lisle really was, he could not be unmoved by her agonised prayers that he would not forsake her—her humble supplications to continue with him still. "We have sinned," she would say, "woefully, fatally have we sinned, and it is just that we should suffer, but oh, let it be together!"

One night—oh, what a night of terrible anxiety and suspense to that trembling, sinful woman!—Sir Arthur did not return home, and the next morning a small parcel was delivered to her by a porter. It contained bills for five hundred pounds, and a note which ran as follows:

"You seem completely set against our parting, Ellen; and indeed a formal parting is a thing more to be dreaded than desired: I shall therefore continue to consider you as much mine as ever. But I am obliged to go to England on business, and my return is quite uncertain. Amuse yourself as well as you can during my absence, and consider yourself free to act as you please in every way. When the money now enclosed to you is expended, write to me, and you shall have more. Do not think I cease to love you—I assure you I entertain the sincerest regard for you, and it is this that prompts me to my present course of action. Our tempers are unsuited to each other, and though we may still be really attached, it is better we should not reside together in future. Of course you will not think of coming to England. When I revisit Paris, believe me my first object will be to see you, and it will rejoice me much to find you well and happy.—Yours, devotedly as ever,

"A. DE LISLE."

Fallen and disgraced as Ellen Dacre was, she was not without some remains of pride. She saw the professions of esteem in Sir Arthur's letter meant nothing, and she felt at once that she was discarded and forsaken. The thought of plunging deeper and deeper into the abyss of guilt she had entered did not dwell on her mind for an instant. What could she do? Paris was no place for her now: her position there, and the insult to which she might be exposed in consequence of it, was too degrading to be borne. She paid her few debts—Sir Arthur's liberality had left her very few, and prepared to leave Paris. She had never traveled twenty miles alone in her life, and the only path left for her seemed to be that which led to England. Yes! she would go there; make one effort to see her child and her husband, to ask and obtain forgiveness, and then pray to be laid early beside her departed mother.

She landed at Dover. She had been there twice before—once as the bride of Dacre, and once when flying with Sir Arthur; and now she was there again, separated for ever from them both! She rested but a single night, and then proceeded to London. She did not distinctly know where she should go, and left the decision to the post-boy, who drove her to an obscure hotel not far from Covent Garden. Here she chanced to take up a paper, and the first article that met her eye was the "great cause of Dacre versus De Lisle." She eagerly ran her eye over it—this then was the business which had brought De Lisle to England! She looked to the end with breathless anxiety—the paper was only of that morning; the case had been left undecided on account of the lateness of the hour, and her head whirled round as she thought it might be closing even then.

How dreadfully black did her conduct seem according to the evidence brought forward there! In her romantic dreams how different she had thought it, and while she acknowledged the truth of each separate allegation against her, she shuddered with a strange unbelief that she could be the vile and worthless being whose portrait she now looked upon! Then the defence—she could herself have exclaimed against it! It was filled with insinuations against Dacre, and it asserted that he had treated her with unkindness, had thrown her in the way of temptation, and that she had been the victim of a scheme to get rid of her! Oh, how utterly false she felt it was!

How should she ascertain the event of the trial? She felt as if every one must know that she who inquired was the guilty cause of the proceedings, and she trembled even as she begged the waiter to procure her a copy of that evening's paper, which she concluded would contain the information she sought. It came, and all that had hitherto seemed a horrible dream glared on her in frightful reality; her husband had gained his cause, and she was branded for ever as a vile and degraded creature, a traitress to all the purest and holiest ties of life. There was an eloquent reply to the defence that had been set up, wherein all the allegations against Dacre were triumphantly refuted, and her own iniquity and falsehood were unsparingly commented upon. Her breach of faith to the kind and affectionate husband who had so raised her in the scale of society at her marriage—her cruelty toward him and toward her only child were portrayed in their true colors—and all ended with the verdict of the jury in her husband's favor, awarding him heavy damages. She was glad, actually glad. For a moment she seemed separated from her own identity, and enjoying the triumph of the right. Then with a sudden consciousness of the real state of the case, she buried her face in her hands and wept.

And now she began to ask herself why had she come to London? Surely she had no lurking wish to force herself back on him who had destroyed and forsaken her? No—her child was the magnet that had drawn her there—could she but see him once more! She dared not hope that Dacre would see her—she dared not think it possible he could ever forgive her—but if he could! oh, what rapture to receive his forgiveness and die!

It was twilight; Mr. Dacre's splendid mansion looked dull and deserted, for no merry party was there—no gay throng ever assembled in its wide saloons now. There was a light in the drawing-room, but all was hushed within! A female paced backward and forward before the house, her form concealed by a cloak, and her face hidden in a deep mourning bonnet, and ever and anon she paused and gazed wistfully at the solitary light. It was Ellen; she was hovering about the scene of her former happiness, and desolate and wretched as she was, she clung to that place as to the last wreck of home that remained to her. She had taken lodgings in a small quiet street at no great distance, and never ventured out till twilight, when she constantly promenaded the square where her husband resided. She had as yet never seen her child but once, for, as she concluded, it was usually put to bed before the hour at which she dared go out; but once she had caught a glimpse of it at the window, in the arms of a niece of Dacre, who she concluded was now his guest. Once, too, she had seen Dacre himself as he stepped from the door to his carriage; she could not see his face, but she thought he looked thinner. And now she had watched for many weary evenings, and her child had not appeared, and the mother's agonized yearnings could no longer be subdued. She resolved upon one mighty effort, one struggle to see her child, and, if possible, her husband, for she knew he was already seeking to be divorced from her, and while yet his wife, she longed to implore his forgiveness. It was only by an extraordinary exercise of resolution that she ventured with trembling hand to knock at the door that had once unclosed at her approach as if by magic. To her great relief it was opened by a strange servant, for all those whom she had personally known had been discharged since her flight. She inquired feebly for Mr. Dacre, and was informed he was at home, for Dacre never suffered himself to be denied to the meanest comer, if he were in the house. But the servant said it was a strange time to call on business—could she not come in the morning?

"No—her business was most urgent," and she sank half fainting upon a bench.

The porter happened to have a compassionate heart, and gathering from her manner that she was agitated and distressed, he hastened to procure her a glass of water, and then having ushered her into a small study, proceeded to inform his master that his presence was required there. That room was only too familiar to her. It was here that Dacre had been accustomed to write his letters, and here she had broken in upon him time after time, to show him some splendid toy or some new fancy in her dress. She felt as if a weight were upon her and around her, that must crush her to death.

A few minutes passed; a well-known footstep was in the passage, and Dacre entered. He did not recognise her, for the room was imperfectly lighted, and her bonnet and veil almost hid her face. She could not speak—she could not even rise to return his bow, but sat cold and motionless.

"You wish to speak to me, madam," said Dacre in a tone that thrilled her very soul. "You did not send up your name, but I imagine I speak to that unhappy lady, Mrs. Spearman, of whom my niece, Lady Denham, was speaking a few days since."

Ellen could not reply, but her tears began to flow in spite of her efforts to restrain them, and her low suppressed sobs reached Dacre's ear.

"Be comforted, my dear madam," he continued, in a kind and cordial tone, "we have all our afflictions, but he who sends them can give us strength to bear them. If I am rightly informed, your husband was a brave man and fell gallantly in a good cause; how much better that he should so have perished than that he should ever have proved himself unworthy of your affections."

There was a mournful cadence in his voice, and abstraction in his manner, as he uttered the last words of the sentence. He seemed to be thinking aloud—but after a moment he resumed:—

"Pray be composed—I doubt not that Lady Denham will be able to procure you a comfortable situation, such as you desire; and I will attend to the interests of your son. If he be only trustworthy I think I can promise."

But trust Ellen's feelings utterly overcame her. She threw herself at his feet, and clasping her hands, exclaimed—"Oh, Dacre, Dacre, only forgive me!"

Pale and speechless Dacre gazed for some moments on the suppliant—his gasping lips scarcely able to frame the words, which at length came slowly forth.

"Ellen—unfortunate, wretched woman, why, oh why are you here?"

"I know I have no right here—I know you ought to spurn me away—I am wretched, and vile, and lost, yet listen to me for a moment, only a moment, Dacre, and I will go away and never trouble you again. Only tell me of my child, only let me see him—I will not touch him—I will not contaminate him; let me see him, if it is only in his sleep."

Dacre did not immediately reply. He was gazing on the emaciated form and altered dress of the speaker; he was recalling all she had been, and contrasting it with what she was, and the tears swelled to his eyes, but he made an effort to command himself, and he succeeded.

"Ellen," he said, "this is foolish and useless; your child is not here, he was removed some days since into the country, and even were he here, what right have you to see him now? I cannot permit it—it is best he should forget you, and never hear even your name if I can prevent it, for why should his young days be shadowed with the cloud that has fallen so darkly upon mine? I forgive you, from my very heart, I forgive you, but you have chosen your own path, and a very little time will take from me all right to interfere with you, and deprive you of all claim on me. Nevertheless—" He paused, for the unhappy girl, who had been growing paler and paler as he spoke, fell heavily at his feet, as she had once done before—and how vividly that time came back upon him.

Dacre was extremely distressed, not only by the sudden re-appearance of Ellen, but by her illness, for he feared to call in the servants, lest his agitation should betray how strong an interest he felt in her. He raised her in his arms, loosed her bonnet to give her air, and chafed her cold hands between his own. Whilst performing these offices for her, it seemed as if the old times had come back, and that he was but exercising that tender care which he had shown her during her temporary indispositions in days gone by. She gave a long drawn sigh, and the reality of their position was again before him, but still his heart was softened toward the lovely and helpless outcast. He placed her in a large chair, and sat down near her, and though he was silent for some minutes, he addressed her at last, and spoke both calmly and kindly.

"Ellen, you have wrung my heart sorely, but now it bleeds most for you. I can read your story at once. You have indeed sown the wind and have reaped the whirlwind. You betrayed the trust I placed in you, and in your turn you have been betrayed. But I cannot bear to contemplate the utter ruin that lies before you if you are thrown friendless on the world. How you are supported now I dare scarcely ask."

"I understand you," said Ellen, with something like the pride of the days gone by; "I am living on the wages of sin, but I never received them but from one, nor will I from another, though I should lie down and perish from actual want."

"Send all that you have left back to him from whom you received it," said Dacre, hastily, "send it to the uttermost farthing. You shall not want, Ellen, if you will do this; I will see that a shelter and a home is provided for you; for even yet, you had better owe it to me than to any one else on earth."

He would not permit her even to return to her lodging, but delivered her to the care of the housekeeper, as a lady who was to receive every attention at her hands, and promising to see her on the morrow, bade her good night.

It was not in the room she used to occupy that Ellen passed the night. The mansion where she once reigned mistress was no more at her control, or she felt she would have chosen her own room beyond all the rest. But she was placed in the apartment which her mother had occupied when in town, and in which she had breathed her last, thanking God for all his mercy to herself and to her child, and little foreseeing that that child would herself destroy the happiness by which she saw her surrounded. Of all the nights Ellen had spent since her flight, that was the most insupportable.

They met once more, the wretched wife and the scarcely less wretched husband, and, heart-broken as both felt, they talked calmly and collectedly together; yet while outwardly composed, Ellen felt as if she were the actor in a dream. Was not this her own husband? Why did he sit so far away from her, with such mournful eyes, and such a pale, cold brow? Why did she not dare to fling herself on his neck, and weep? What spell was around her, what magic held back her bursting heart—bursting now, as it seemed to her, as much with its old affection as with its sorrow? How natural it would have seemed to feel his arm around her waist, and to see his eyes looking into hers as of old! But she knew this could not be—she could no more stir or ease her heart by impassioned expressions of her agony, than the troubled dreamer whose eyes are open, who sees all that is real around him, yet cannot make the movement of hand or foot which he feels would at once relieve him. God help her! She felt as if reason must have deserted her.

All was arranged in that interview. Dacre proposed to withdraw her from London, and convey her to a small seaport town at a considerable distance, where, under a feigned name, he knew he should be able to place her as a boarder in a respectable family. She was not to attempt to write to him, or see him again. He promised that every quarter a sufficient sum for her wants, far more, indeed, than she really needed, should be forwarded to her, and that when she received this, she should also be informed of his welfare, and that of her child. He proposed that she should leave town immediately, and resolved himself to be her escort during the journey. She was passive as an infant, and quietly agreed to all, for she felt she had no right of choice now, and she had a mournful pleasure in acceding thus far to his wishes. The carriage was soon at the door; he placed her in it, mounted the box himself, and they departed. During the day, he never spoke to her, except to inquire if she needed refreshment, and late in the evening they reached their destination.

Dacre bestowed his unhappy wife in the best hotel that the place afforded, and left her whilst he went to make arrangements with the person with whom he wished to place her. He had known the family long ago, and therefore needed no introduction. He simply described Ellen as a Miss Meadows—a lady, who had lost her friends, (ah, she had not utterly lost the best, even then!) and represented himself as her guardian. Money can achieve wonders—it overcame at once all the surprise and scruples, and want of preparation in Mrs. Ashford's dwelling, and she agreed to receive her new inmate that very night. Miss Meadows was to have every indulgence that money could procure, and no attempt was to be made to pry into her history, or start conjectures respecting her. If Mrs. Ashford ever suspected her to be the guilty wife of Dacre, she never breathed her suspicion to any one.

The parting hour came. Ellen stood as in a trance, when Dacre entered her apartment to bid her farewell. He took her hand in his—it was cold as marble; he yielded to the impulse of the moment, and impressed one fervent kiss upon her chilly forehead. The next moment he was gone; but he had forgiven her—she was sure now he had forgiven her, and that that one kiss was the seal of her pardon. Wild and vain was the hope that arose in her mind that even yet there were happy days in store for her, and that in some foreign land, or in some remote corner of her own, she might yet be permitted to spend at least a portion of her time beside him. She knew that she was no more his wife by law, for the sentence of divorce was obtained very shortly after her arrival in S—. But still she dreamed and hoped—she scarcely knew what; and amidst all her desolate wretchedness, her fancy clung to the one gleam of sunshine that she herself had conjured up. She framed her life as she thought Dacre would wish her to do; she read, she prayed, she shrank from observation as much as she could, and her charities to the poor were extensive and well-directed. She forebore to trouble him with letter or token, and for some years she received a few lines each quarter from his man of business, formally announcing that Mr. Dacre and his son continued in their usual health. Often, too, the public prints conveyed to her the news of the political triumph of Dacre's party, and spoke enthusiastically of the coolness, the usefulness, the many excellent qualities which had at last won for him a distinguished place amongst the ministry. And in all this honor and distinction she might have shared, had she not herself flung away her right to partake of it! But yet her heart warmed as she read, and thought, and hoped, that perhaps, even whilst he was involved in the turmoils and triumphs of his position, she was yet remembered with regret in some secret corner of his heart—happy delusion!

But this was not to last. The quiet that had been gradually gathering around her spirit was too great a boon to be long enjoyed by such an one as she was. Mrs. Ashford was one evening dozing forth the contents of an ancient newspaper, for the benefit of Miss Meadows, her own daughter, and one or two neighbors who were drinking tea with her. Poor Ellen was lying listlessly on the sofa, lending a sort of languid attention to the scraps of slip-slop it contained, and her worthy hostess's comments thereon, when she began to read the list of recent marriages:

"Sir Stephen Harding to Miss Wetherby."

"Edward Longford, Esq., to Clarissa, only daughter—"

"Why, bless me, Miss Meadows, what's this?—here's an old friend of yours married again, and to think we never heard of it!"

"On Tuesday last, at the residence of the Earl of Barsbury, by special license, the Honorable Henry Dacre, Esq., M. P., to the Lady Amelia Elizabeth Dunsley, only daughter of the late Earl of Dunningford."

But ere the sentence was concluded, Ellen had started from the sofa, and snatched the fatal paper from the astonished Mrs. Ashford. It was no mistake—no error—there it stood glaring, as it seemed to her, into her very soul, and the vague and unfounded hope that she had so long secretly cherished was swept away for ever! She was forgotten—utterly forgotten; what more had she to do with life?

She fell with a heavy groan upon the seat from which she had arisen, her face buried in the pillow. Her companions looked at each other in astonishment, for her strange and sudden emotion had startled them from their presence of mind. When they approached the sofa they perceived a small, dark red stream trickling over the pillow; they lifted her head from its resting-place, and saw that the lower part of her face was covered with the same fearful hue. She had burst a blood-vessel.

She never spoke again, although she lingered for a few days. The news of her illness was transmitted to Mr. Dacre's agent, and through him to his employer; but long before it reached him in the distant county where he was spending the honeymoon with his young and beautiful bride, the grave had closed over the emaciated form of the guilty and unhappy divorcee.

THE TRAVELER AT THE RED SEA.

BY MISS HANNAH F. GOULD.

At last have I found thee, thou dark rolling sea!—
I gaze on thy face, and I listen to thee,
With a spirit o'erawed by the sight and the sound,
While mountain and desert frown gloomy around.

And thee, mighty deep, from afar I behold,
Which God swept apart for his people of old,
That Egypt's proud army, unstained by their blood,
Received on thy bed to entomb in thy flood.

I cast my eye out, where the cohorts went down;
A throng of pale spectres no waters can drown,
With banner and blades seem surmounting the waves,
As Pharaoh's bold hosts sunk in arms to their graves.

But quick from the light of the skies they withdraw,
At silent Omnipotence shrinking with awe:
And each shrinks away in his billowy shroud,
From Him who walked here, clothed in fire and a cloud.

I stand by the pass the freed Hebrews then trod,
Sustained by the hand of Jehovah, dry-shod;
And think how the song of salvation they sang,
With praise to His name, through the wilderness rang.

Our Father, who then didst Thine Israel guide,
Rebuke and console in their wanderings wide,
From these gloomy waters, through this desert drear,
O, still in life's maze to thy pilgrim be near.

Whilst Thou, day by day, wilt thy manna bestow,
And make, for my thirst, the rock-fountain to flow,
Refreshed by the way, will I speed to the clime
Of rest for the weary, beyond earth and time.

A ROYAL FATHER'S EYE!—A gentleman who has the honor of assisting Prince Albert in his English studies, being at the Palace, was asked by his Royal Highness if he would like to see the Princess. The answer may be guessed. The Prince immediately proceeded to the nursery, and brought the infant in his own arms to the gentleman. "To you," his Royal Highness affably remarked, "I suppose children seem all alike; but to my eye this little girl appears more beautiful than any other infant I have ever seen!"—[Court Journal.]

SIR ASTLEY P. COOPER, BART.

It is with regret that we have to announce the decease of this distinguished surgeon, which took place on the 14th of February at his house in Conduit-street, after a short illness. The following brief sketch will not be unacceptable to our readers, to many of whom he was personally known, and to all of whom his reputation must have rendered his name familiar:—

He was the fourth son of the Rev. Dr. Cooper, of Great Yarmouth, Norfolk, by a co-heiress descended from the family of Paston, Earls of Yarmouth; and from this lady, whose attainments were of no common order, he derived many of those qualities of mind that raised him to the highest professional eminence. His career commenced under the guidance of the late Mr. Cline, of whom he long continued the distinguished pupil, and for whose character and memory he always entertained the warmest regard and respect. The period of his pupilage was not marked by close application to his pursuits; nor was it until he was joined with Mr. Cline as a lecturer on anatomy that he became conscious of his great natural powers, and brought them into exercise by the aid of unceasing industry and perseverance. His brilliant and perspicuous mode of lecturing soon attracted the largest number of students that had ever been collected within the walls of an anatomical theatre, conferring a degree of celebrity on the surgical schools of London that before his time they had never enjoyed. His reputation as an anatomist was soon surpassed by his rising fame as a skilful and accomplished surgeon; and the appointment of surgeon to Guy's Hospital, which he obtained in the year 1800, gave him the opportunity of displaying his extraordinary tact in the detection and treatment of disease, and obtained for him an extent of private practice far surpassing that of any surgeon of past or present times. The pecuniary independence which he thus acquired, and which would have disposed most to the enjoyment of repose, served to him but as the means of more extensively following his favorite pursuit of anatomy and pathology, and drew from his pen those splendid works in surgery, which, however the science may advance, will always continue to hold their rank as the text-books of the student and the guide of the practising surgeon.

The reputation which he had earned for himself, and which, from being confined to the British dominions, soon became European, was appropriately acknowledged by the reigning Sovereign, George the Fourth, and honored by the appointment of Sergeant-Surgeon and a Baronetcy, the highest honors which his profession have reached. Subsequently his late Majesty William the Fourth conferred on him the distinction of Grand Cross of the Royal Guelphic Order. Of both these Sovereigns, and of the late Duke of York, he enjoyed the regard and confidence, attending them professionally during the latter years of their lives to the time of their decease.

Arrived at the middle period of life, Sir Astley found himself at the head of his profession, in the enjoyment of an unrivalled and unsullied character, and of the confidence of the large body of English surgeons. The profession on the Continent were not slow to recognise him as the acknowledged leader of English surgery. No surgeon of distinction arrived from the Continent without an introduction to him, and paying him the tribute of respect due no less to his talents than to his position. The French Institute and several learned societies in Germany and America enrolled him as a member of their bodies. The high promise which he gave at the commencement of his career was fully sustained throughout the whole of his life. His popularity (a term that ill expresses the universal feeling entertained toward him), not founded on the temporary caprices of the public or profession, attended him to the last. The zeal that marked his earlier years continued to keep him in a course of vigorous activity at a time of life when others would have sought repose from the fatiguing calls of a laborious profession; and his whole leisure, up to the commencement of his illness, was unceasingly devoted to professional pursuits. It is well to state, for the example of his professional brethren, that at the age of 71 he gave to the profession a pathological work equal in research and correctness to those of his best days.

The person of Sir Astley was distinguished for manly beauty as his manner was for an engaging frankness that won the hearts of all who were within its influence. The expression of his countenance gave a lustre to features remarkable for their proportion and outline. His kindness of heart and liberality of feeling never allowed him to forgo an opportunity of doing an act of kindness to any that applied for his assistance; and the calls upon him were both numerous and heavy. His professional income was such, that, had he been bent on the accumulation of money, to the neglect of the ties of consanguinity and friendship, he might have lived and died a millionaire. But he preferred the nobler part of aiding those of his own family who needed his assistance, and those friends who were reduced by misfortune. His conduct was marked by the absence of all intrigue, and by a spirit of liberality toward the members of his profession almost without a parallel. No instance can be adduced of his aggrandising his own fame by the depression of that of others, or of his omitting to raise the character of the junior members of his profession on every occasion that offered. The qualities of his mind were proportioned to those of his heart. His understanding was peculiarly clear and active. His views on all subjects simple but comprehensive, his memory most retentive, and his energy unbounded. These qualities, joined to a strong physical frame, enabled him to withstand the fatigues of an arduous profession, and to raise himself to a position as a scientific surgeon that left him without a rival. The united voices of the profession, we conscientiously believe, will confirm these sentiments, and will not be slow in testifying that in Sir Astley Cooper they have lost the representative of British surgery.

The complaint of which he died was effusion on the chest, occasioned by an affection of the heart, of the existence of which disease he had for some time entertained a presentiment. The first serious symptom he experienced was walking to church at Strathfieldsaye with his Grace the Duke of Wellington, who had honored him with a large measure of his regard and confidence, and for whom Sir Astley entertained the deepest respect and esteem. Among the consoling incidents of his last illness were the affectionate inquiries made by his Grace personally in Conduit-street. His sufferings were not acute, though his breathing was much oppressed, and his rest much disturbed by a troublesome cough. He gradually became weaker, until death found him calm and resigned.

Sir Astley dying without issue, the bulk of his property descends, with the title and estates, to his nephew, Sir Astley Paston Cooper, the present baronet, married to Elizabeth, the only child of William Rickford, Esq., M. P., by whom he has a large family.

CHRISTENING OF THE PRINCESS ROYAL.

The Princess Royal was on Wednesday admitted a member of the Christian church, and though perhaps some disappointment may have been felt that a ceremony so interesting and important should not have been solemnized in a more public manner, yet, as it was decided to have it performed within the precincts of Buckingham Palace, nothing was left undone that could at all contribute to its splendor or effect. The ceremony was in every respect what in Court parlance is called state, that is to say, all the splendor and resources of the Royal Household were put in requisition, and the same forms and etiquette were observed as when the Queen performs any public act as Sovereign. The christening took place in the throne-room, the throne being removed and an altar erected in its stead, covered with crimson velvet, and having the sacred insignia of Christian faith embroidered in gold. On it were placed the massive silver gilt communion service of the Chapel Royal, lighted with gold candelabra. The railing enclosing the altar was covered with crimson velvet trimmed with gold lace, and in front, and spread over the rich and costly carpet of the room, was a large square of crimson velvet, beautifully embroidered in the centre and at the four corners in gold, and trimmed all round with gold lace. On this was the font, and round it were assembled the Queen, Prince Albert, the sponsors, and the officiating prelates and clergyman. In front of the altar stood the Archbishop of Canterbury, having on one side the Archbishop of York, and on the other the Bishop of London; the Bishop of Norwich and the Dean of Carlisle being in a little behind. The Queen and Prince Albert took their stations on the left of the Archbishop. The sponsors were the Queen Dowager, the Duchess of Gloucester, the Duchess of Kent, the King of the Belgians, the Duke of Sussex, and the Duke of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, who appeared by proxy, the proxy being the Duke of Wellington. The Queen Dowager, the King of the Belgians, the Duchess of Kent, and the Duchess of Gloucester, were seated in front of the Archbishop, and facing the altar; the Duke of Sussex and the Duke of Wellington being opposite to the Queen and Prince Albert, and thus the whole group formed a square, of which the font was the centre. The Duke of Cambridge, Prince George of Cambridge, and Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, stood behind the Queen Dowager, and the rest of the guests ranged themselves around. The Queen was dressed in white, and looked cheerful and in excellent health. Her Majesty wore a deep and splendid tiara of diamonds, of which the Maltese cross and the fleur de lis were the principal ornaments, large diamond earrings, and a diamond stomacher, and the riband and star of the order of the Garter; as did the Duke of Wellington, and also his Waterloo medal. The Duke of Sussex appeared in the uniform of Captain-General of the Hon. Artillery Company, and wore the uniform of Field Marshal, and the Order of the Garter. Prince George wore the uniform of his regiment, with the Order of the Garter. The Queen Dowager, the Duchess of Gloucester, and the Duchess of Kent wore white satin and diamonds. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, who has suffered lately from the severity of the weather, enveloped herself in a magnificent mantle of ermine. The appearance of the Duke of Wellington excited the greatest interest in the illustrious circle; his Grace appeared to have recovered completely from his late indisposition, and looked tolerably well; but it is useless to conceal, that age and infirmity have made fearful inroads upon his constitution. Surely the compliment of selecting his Grace from among all the subjects of Great Britain, to be the representative of Prince Albert's father on this occasion, could not have been better bestowed, or better deserved, and so every one of the illustrious guests seemed to think; even the band of the Coldstreams seemed influenced by the general feeling; for though in the middle of the performance of some other piece of music on the Duke's arrival at the Palace, they immediately left off, and saluted him with "See the conquering hero comes," until he had fairly entered the state apartments.

The font, which was made expressly for the occasion, showed a great deal of elegant fancy in the design, and the most consummate skill in the execution. First, there was a triangular plinth, on the sides of which were the arms of the Queen, Prince Albert, and the infant Princess, embossed, the latter borne on a lozenge, and surmounted by a coronet. On the plinth where three cherubs, who united in supporting a large water lily, which contained the water. The whole of this was of silver gilt, and had a very beautiful effect. It was placed on a marble table, on which were the Royal arms of England in Mosaic. The water in the font, had wherewith the Royal child was christened, came from the River Jordan, having been sent to Her Majesty as a present for this especial purpose.

Everything was in readiness, and waited only the appearance of the Queen Dowager, who arrived at 20 minutes to 7 o'clock. The sacred rite then commenced, the Archbishop receiving the infant Princess from the hands of her nurse, and held her during the whole ceremony. Whether the ample and flowing robes of the Archbishop deceived the child, or whether the kind tenderness of manner of the excellent prelate prevented the infant from discovering any difference, certain it is, that Her Royal Highness reposed in the arms of the spiritual head of the church with as much contentment as though she had been in the arms of her own nurse. At the appointed place the Queen Dowager named the Royal child—"Victoria Adelaide Mary Louisa," and she received the baptismal sign, and what is more, the caresses of her illustrious godfathers and godmothers, without even a whimper. Her Royal Highness was then handed over to the care of her nurse, and retired to her own apartments.

The ceremony being concluded, the illustrious and noble assembly proceeded to the banquet, which was laid out in the Picture Gallery. The King of the Belgians led in the Queen, Prince Albert, the Queen Dowager, the Duke of Sussex, the Duchess of Gloucester, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duchess of Kent, and Prince George of Cambridge, the Duchess of Sutherland.

The number of guests who sat down to dinner was 71, and, with the exception of a few of the Foreign Ministers, consisted only of the Prelates who performed the ceremony, the Cabinet Ministers, the Great Officers of State, the Hereditary Great Officers of State, the Officers of Her Majesty's Household, the Commanding Officers of the Regiment of Household Cavalry on duty, the Queen's Suite, the Queen Dowager's Suite, Prince Albert's Suite, and the attendants on the Royal personages present at the ceremony. The only exceptions to this list were the Duke of Wellington and Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar; the one, however, was a proxy of a sponsor, and the other nephew to the Queen Dowager. Her Majesty took her seat in the middle of the table, and the only difference in her seat from any of the others was a low ottoman for the feet.

There can scarcely be a greater contrast than the state banquets given in the Picture-gallery at Buckingham Palace, and those that were given by George IV. and William IV. in the Banqueting-room in St. James's, considering that the same materials are employed; for though it must be confessed, from the vastness and grandeur of proportion of the banqueting-room, a certain degree of magnificence was obtained, yet from its peculiar and beautiful roof, the style of its decoration, and, more than all, the pictorial treasures that adorn its walls, there is a degree of elegance about the Picture-gallery, when fitted up for a state banquet, that renders it one of the most beautiful sights that can well be witnessed. On this occasion, the table was magnificently ornamented with silver gilt plate, consisting of a plateau, with epergnes, candelabra, wine-coolers of the most exquisite designs and finished workmanship, and of great variety. Many of them were the designs of Flaxman, and the artificers in the precious metals have succeeded admirably in many instances in transferring all the grace and beauty of the model of the sculptor into their more durable but intractable material. Some of the wine-coolers were small copies of the Warwick vase, others of the Greek vases, having on them most beautifully executed bas-reliefs.

Here might be seen a beautiful and graceful group of bacchantes dancing round a palm tree; there a group of sturdy tritons laboring at the oar; then a Venus floating in a shell; then a subject from the Greek mythology; and in all these the beauty of the design, and the skill of the workmanship, are such, that the costliness of the material is quite lost sight of. The table was lighted with 28 candelabra, holding from four to six wax lights each. At each end of the gallery an artificial screen was erected, to shorten its length, and on each of these were displayed on a background of crimson cloth, some of the choicest specimens of the Royal Treasury—vases, censers, shields, salvers, cups, chalices, of every size and of every description, from the squat massive tankard of days of yore, when the Sovereign might have refreshed himself on a hunting morning with a draught of a homely beverage, to some of the most elegant and graceful cups of the purest crystal, in the most elaborate setting of gold filigree, and flashing, too, with diamonds and other precious stones with which they are studded. Of cups, vases, and tankards, ornamented with precious stones, there were a great number. Some with amethysts, some with turquoises, and sapphires, opals, and emeralds; and some had small enamelled paintings let into them of sacred subjects, having evidently been formerly employed in the services of the church of Rome. The screens on which these were displayed were lighted each with 22 candelabra, holding from four to six wax lights each; and when to these are added three large chandeliers blazing away from the roof, some idea may be formed of the brilliant appearance of this apartment.

The service which the guests used at the banquet was of silver, the ornamental pieces only being silver gilt.

In the middle of this table, and immediately before the Queen, was the christening cake, of the most enormous dimensions; round it was a wreath of flowers; on the top of it a rock, surmounting which Neptune, driving his hippocampi, and in the car a figure of Britannia, holding in her arms the infant Princess Royal, the whole being executed in sugar, and being a very fair specimen of the confectioner's skill.

Immediately after the dinner, "Health and Happiness" was drunk to the young Princess, and duly honored.

In the evening there was a concert in the Grand Saloon by her Majesty's private band.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

SIR ASTLEY COOPER.—A remarkable anecdote is recorded of this eminent surgeon, which, fortunately for science and mankind, led the way to the general extension of that skill and ability which have so largely benefited both.—A boy was thrown from a cart in young Cooper's presence, and wounded in the femoral artery. Great hemorrhage ensued. Cooper immediately went to his relief, and, with great presence of mind, instantly made his handkerchief into a tourniquet, and applied it so scientifically to the thigh, as to succeed effectually in stopping the further flow of blood, which would otherwise in a few minutes have proved fatal. Sir A. Cooper has been often heard to declare that the mental gratification which resulted from having thus saved the life of a fellow-creature inspired him at once with an almost romantic desire to become a surgeon.—[Times.]

HER MAJESTY.—It is stated in circles likely to be acquainted with the fact, that her Majesty is again in an "interesting situation," at once exciting the hopes and sympathies of her loyal subjects.—[Globe (ministerial paper).]

The old names in law processes of John Doe and Richard Roe, we find, by announcements in some Irish papers, are likely to yield to the more popular modern names of "Samuel Weller, lessee, &c. v. Samuel Slick, the casual executor."

WINTER'S FETE.

BY MRS. LYDIA H. SIGOURNEY.

I woke, and every lordling of the grove
Was clad in diamonds, and the lowliest shrub
Did wear its crest of brilliants gallantly;
The swelling hillocks, with their woven vines,
The far-seen forest, and the broken hedge,
Yea, every thicket gleam'd in bright array,
As for some gorgeous fête of fairy-land.
—Ho!—jewel-keeper of the hoary North, [mines
Whence hast thou all these treasures? Why, the
Of rich Golconda, since the world was young,
Would scarcely furnish such a glorious shew.
The Queen, who to her coronation comes,
With half a realm's exchequer on her head,
Dazzleth the shouting crowd. But all the queens,
Who, since old Egypt's buried dynasty,
Have here and there, amid the mists of time,
Lifted their tiny sceptres—all the throng
Of peeresses, who at some birth-night flaunt,
Might boast no moiety of the gems thy hand
So lavishly hath strewn o'er this old tree
Fast by my window.

Every noteless spray,
Even the coarse sumach, and the bramble-bush,
Do sport their diadems, as if, forsooth,
Our plain republic, in a single night,
Put forth such growth of aristocracy,
That no plebein in the land was left
Uncoronated. Broader'd frost-work wraps
Yon stunted pear-tree, whose ne'er ripened fruit,
Acid and bitter, every truant-boy
Blam'd, with set teeth. Lo! while I speak, its crown
Kindleth in bossy crimson, and a stream
Of Tyrian purple, blent with emerald spark,
Floats round its rugged arms:—while, here and there,
Gleams out a living sapphire, 'mid a knot
Of trembling rubies, whose exquisite lay
O'erpowers the astonish'd sight.

One Arctic queen,
For one ice-palace, rear'd with fearful toil,
And soon dissolving, scrupled not to pay
Her vassal's life—and emperors of old
Have drained their coffers for the people's gaze,
Though but a single amphitheatre
Compress'd the crowd. But thou, whose potent wand
Call'd forth such grand enchantment, swift as thought,
And silent as a vision, and canst spread
Its wondrous beauty to each gazing eye,
Nor be the poorer, thou art scorn'd and bann'd,
'Mid all thy beauty. Summer scantily sheds
A few brief dew-drops, for the sun to dry,
And wins loud praise from every piping swain
For the proud fête.

Yet, certes, in these days,
When Wealth is so esteemed, that he who boasts
The largest purse, is sure the wisest man,
Winter, who thus affords to sprinkle gems,
Mile after mile, on all the landscape round,
And decks his new made peers in richer robes
Than monarchs ever gave, deserves more thanks
Than to be called rude churl, and miser old.
—I tell thee he's a friend—and Love, who sits
So quiet in the corner, whispering long
In Beauty's ear, by the bright evening fire,
Shall join my verdict. Yes, the King of Storms,
So long denied, hath revenue more rich
Than sparkling diamonds.

Look within thy heart,
When the poor shiver in their snow-wreath'd cell,
Or the sad orphan mourns: and if thou find
An answering pity, and a fervent deed
Done in Christ's name, doubt not to be an heir
Of that true wealth, which Winter hoardeth up,
To buy the soul a mansion with the blest.

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

He was now about his forty-second year, had been handsome, was of bland and fascinating address, variously accomplished, of exquisite tact, of most refined taste; there was a slight fulness and puffiness about his features, an expression in his eye, which spoke of satiety—and the fact was so. He was a very proud, selfish, heartless, person; but these qualities he contrived to disguise from many of even his most intimate associates. An object of constant anxiety to him was, to ingratiate himself with the younger and weaker branches of the aristocracy, in order to secure a distinguished status in society; and he succeeded. To gain this point, he taxed all his resources: never were so exquisitely blended, as in his instance, with a view to securing his influence, the qualities of dictator and parasite; he always appeared the agreeable equal of those whom, for his life, he dared not seriously have offended. He had no fortune; no visible means of making money—did not sensibly sponge upon his friends—nor fall into conspicuous embarrassments; yet he always lived in luxury—without money, he in some inconceivable manner always contrived to be in the possession of money's worth. He had a magical power of soothing querulous tradesmen. He had a knack of always keeping himself, his clique, his sayings and doings, before the eye of the public in such a manner as to satisfy it that he was the acknowledged leader of fashion; yet it was really no such thing, it was a false fashion—there being all the difference between him and a man of real consequence in society, that there is between mock and real pearl, between paste and diamond. It was true that young men of sounding name and title were ever to be found in his train, thereby giving real countenance to one from whom they fancied that they themselves derived celebrity; thus enabling him to effect a lodgement in the outskirts of aristocracy; but he could not penetrate inland, so to speak, any more than foreign merchants could advance further than to Canton, in the dominions of the Emperor of China. He was only tolerated in the regions of real aristocracy—a fact of which he had a very galling consciousness, though it did not apparently disturb his equanimity, or interrupt the systematic and refined sycophancy by which alone he could secure his precarious position. With some sad exceptions, I think that Great Britain has reason to be proud of her aristocracy; I do not speak now of those gaudy flaunting personages, of either sex, who, by their excesses or eccentricities, are eternally obtruding themselves, their manners, dress, and equipage, upon the ear and eye of the public; but of those who occupy their exalted sphere in simplicity, in calmness, and in unobtrusive dignity and virtue. I am no flatterer or idolater of the aristocracy. I have a profound sense of the necessity and advantage of the institution: but I could pay its members, personally, an honest homage only, after a stern and keen scrutiny into their personal pretensions; thinking of them ever in the spirit of those memorable words of Scripture—"Unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required," and that not hereafter only, but here also. No one would visit their faults and follies with a more unsparing severity than I; yet, making all just allowances for their peculiar perils and temptations, exposed as they are, especially at the period of their entrance upon life, to sedulous and systematic sycophancy, too often also to artful and designing profligacy, can any thing excite greater indignation and disgust in the mind of a thoughtful and independent observer, than those instances, occasionally exhibited, of persons imagining that the possessors of rank enjoy a sort of prescriptive immunity from the consequences of misconduct?

"—Si præcipitem rapit ambitus atque libido—
Incipit ipsorum contra te stare parentum
Nobilitas, clarumque faciem præferre pudendis.
Omne animi vitium tantò conspectus in se
Crimen habet, quantò major qui peccat habetur."

To a thoughtless, an insolent, a profligate nobleman, I choose to address the dignified reproofs of the same stern satirist—

"—Tumes alto Drusorum sanguine tanquam
Feceris ipse aliquid propter quod nobilis esses.
—Miserum est aliene incumbere famæ,
Ne collapsa ruant subductis tecta columnis.
—Ergo, ut miremur te, non tua, primum aliquid da,
Quod possim titulis incidere, præter honores,
Quos illis damus, et dedimus, quibus omnia debes.
—Malo pater tibi sit Thersites, dummodo tu sis
Æacida similis, Vulcanique arma capessas,
Quam te, Thersita similem, producat Achilles."

And I shall sum up what I have to say upon this head, in the notable language of the fine old Bishop Hall:—

"I confess I cannot honour blood without good qualities; nor spare it with ill. There is nothing that I do more desire to be taught, than what is true nobility; what thanks it is to you that you are born well? If you could have lost this privilege of nature, I fear you had not been thus far noble: that you may not plead desert, you had this before you were: long ere you could either know or prevent it. You are deceived if you think this any other than the body of gentility. The life and soul of it is in noble and virtuous dispositions, in gallantness of spirit without haughtiness, without insolence, without scornful overlineness; shortly, in generous qualities, carriage, actions. See your error, and know that this demeanour doth not answer an honest birth."

Such are my sentiments—those of a contented member of the middle classes, with whom are all his best and dearest sympathies; and who feels as stern a pride in his "Order," and determination to "stand by it," as ever was felt or avowed by the haughtiest aristocrat for his; of one who with very little personal acquaintance with the aristocracy, has yet had many opportunities of observing their conduct; and sincerely and cheerfully expresses his belief, that very many of them are worthy of all that they enjoy—are bright patterns of honor, generosity, loyalty, and virtue; that indeed, of by far the greater proportion of them, it may be said that they "Have borne their faculties so meek—have been

So clear in their great office, that their virtues
Will plead like angels;"

and finally, I say these are the sentiments of one who, if their order were in jeopardy, would, with the immense majority of his brethren of the middle classes, freely shed his blood in defence of that order; for their preservation is essential to the well-being of society, and their privileges are really ours.

To return, however, to the Marquis. The means to which, as I have above explained, he resorted for the purpose, secured him a certain species of permanent popularity. In matters of dress and equipage, he could really set the fashion: and being something of a practical humorist, and desirous of frequent exhibitions of his power, in order to enhance his pretensions with his patrons—and also greatly applauded and indulged by the trades-people profiting by the vagaries of fashion, he was very capricious in the exercise of his influence. He seized the opportunity of the advent of my little hero, to display his powers very decisively. He waved his wand over Titmouse, and instantly transformed a little ass into a great lion. 'Twas the Marquis, who with his own hand sketched off, from fancy, the portrait of Titmouse, causing it to be exhibited in almost every bookseller's shop window. He knew that, if he chose to make his appearance once or twice in the Parks, and leading streets and squares, in—for instance—the full and imposing evening costume of the clown at the theatre, with painted face, capacious white inexpressibles, and tasteful jacket—within a few days' time several thousands of clowns would make their appearance about town, turning it into a vast pantomime. Could a more striking instance of the Marquis's power in such matters have been exhibited, than that which had actually occurred in the case of Titmouse? Soon after the novel of Tippiwink had rendered our friend an object of public interest, the Marquis happened, somewhere or other, to catch a glimpse of the preposterous little ape. His keen eye caught all Titmouse's personal peculiarities at a glance; and a day or two afterward appeared in public, a sort of splendid edition of Titmouse—with quizzing-glass stuck in his eye and cigar in his mouth; taper ebony cane; tight surtout, with the snowy corner of a white handkerchief peeping out of the outside breast-pocket; hat with scarce any rim, perched slantingly on his head; satin stock bespangled with inwrought gold flowers; and that inimitable strut of his!—'Twas enough; the thoughtful young men about town were staggered for a moment; but their senses soon returned. The Marquis had set the thing going; and within three days' time, that bitter wag had called forth a flight of Titmice that would have reminded you, for a moment, of the visitation of locusts brought upon Egypt by Moses. Thus was brought about the state of things recorded toward the close of the last portion of this history. As soon as the Marquis had seen a few of the leading fools about town fairly in the fashion, he resumed his former rigid simplicity of attire, and, accompanied by a friend or two in his confidence, walked about the town enjoying his triumph; witnessing his trophies—"Tittlebats" and "Titmouse-ties" filling the shop windows on the week-days, and peopling the streets on Sundays. The Marquis was not long in obtaining an introduction to the quaint little millionaire, whose reputation he had, conjointly with his distinguished friend Mr. Bladdery Pip, contributed so greatly to extend. Titmouse, who had often heard of him, looked upon him with inconceivable reverence, and accepted an invitation to one of the Marquis's recherché Sunday dinners, with a sort of tremulous ecstasy. Thither, on the appointed day, he went accordingly, and, by his original humor, afforded infinite amusement to the Marquis's other guests. 'Twas lucky for Titmouse that, getting dreadfully drunk very early in the evening, he was quite incapacitated from accompanying his brilliant and good-natured host to one or two scenes of fashionable entertainment, as had been arranged, in St. James's Street.

Juv. Sat. VIII. passim.

† Epistles, VI.—"A Complaint of the Mis-education of our Gen-try."

Now, do let us pause to ask whether this poor little creature was not to be pitied? Did he not seem to have been plucked out of his own sphere of safe and comparatively happy obscurity, only in order to become every one's game—an object of everybody's cupidity and cruelty? May he not be compared to the flying fish, who, springing out of the water to avoid his deadly pursuer there, is instantly pounced upon by his ravenous assailants in the air? In the lower, and in the upper regions of society, was not this the condition of poor Tittlebat Titmouse? Was not his long-coveted advancement merely a transition from scenes of vulgar to refined rapacity? Had he, ever since "luck" had happened to him," had one single friend to whisper in his ear one word of pity and of disinterested counsel? In the splendid regions which he had entered, who regarded him otherwise than as a legitimate object for plunder or ridicule, the latter disguised by the designing only? Was not even his dignified and exemplary old kinsman, the Earl of Dreddlington, Right Honorable as he was, influenced solely by considerations of paltry self-interest? Had he not his own ridiculous and mercenary designs to accomplish, amidst all the attentions he vouchsafed to bestow upon Titmouse? 'Twas, I think, old Hobbes of Malmesbury who held, that the natural state of mankind was one of war with each other. One really sees a good deal in life, especially after tracing the progress of society, that would seem to give some color to so strange a notion. 'Twas, of course, at first a matter of downright fisticuffs—of physical strife, occasioned, in a great measure, by our natural tendencies, according to him of Malmesbury; and aggravated by the desire everybody had, to take away from everybody else what he had. Have you ever seen a drop of unclean water through the medium of the astounding hydro-oxygen microscope, and shuddered at sight of the frightful creatures there made apparent—a spectacle which must have brought tears of delight into the eyes of the old philosopher I have mentioned, on account of the vivid illustration it would have afforded of his theory? I have several times witnessed what I am alluding to, and I always think, when I see the direful conflict that goes on in these drops of water "when Greek meets Greek," of Titmouse and his enemies. In the progress of society we have, in a measure, dropped the physical part of the business; and instead of punching, scratching, kicking, biting, and knocking down one another, true to the original principles of our nature, we are all endeavoring to circumvent one another; everybody is trying to take everybody in; the moment that one of us has got together a thing or two, he is pounced upon by his neighbor, who in his turn falls a prey to another, and so on in endless succession. We cannot help ourselves, though we are splitting our heads to discover devices, by way of laws, to restrain this propensity of our nature: it will not do; we are all overreaching, cheating, swindling, robbing one another, and, if necessary, are ready to maim and murder one another in the prosecution of our designs. So is it with nations as with individuals, and minor collections of individuals. Truly, truly, we are a precious set, whether the sage of Malmesbury be right or wrong in his speculations.

The more that the Earl and Lady Cecilia perceived of Titmouse's popularity, the more eager were they in parading their connection with him, and openly investing him with the character of a protégé. In addition to this, the Lady Cecilia had begun to have now and then a glimmering notion of the objects which the earl was contemplating. If the earl took him down to the House of Lords, and having secured him a place at the bar, would, immediately on entering, walk up to him, and be seen for some time condescendingly pointing out to him, the different peers by name, as they entered, and explaining to his intelligent auditor the period, and mode, and cause, of the creation and accession of many of them to their honors, and also the forms, ceremonies, and routine of business in the House; so Lady Cecilia was not remiss in availing herself, in her way, of the little opportunities which presented themselves. She invited him, for instance, one day early in the week to accompany them to church on the ensuing Sunday, and during the interval gave out amongst her intimate friends that they might expect to see Mr. Titmouse in her papa's pew. He accepted the invitation; and, on the arrival of the appointed hour, might have been seen in the earl's carriage, driving to afternoon service at the Reverend MORPHINE

VELVET's chapel—Rosemary Chapel, near St. James's Square. "It was a fashionable chapel, a chapel of Eve; rightly so called, for it was a very easy mode of worship, discipline, and doctrine that was there practised and inculcated. If I may not irreverently adopt the language of Scripture, but apply it very differently, I should say that Mr. Morphine Velvet's yoke was very 'easy,' his burden very 'light.' He was a popular preacher; middle-aged; sleek, serene, solemn in his person and demeanor. He had a very gentlemanlike appearance in the pulpit and reading-desk. There was a sort of soothing, winning, elegance and tenderness in the tone and manner in which he prayed and taught his dearly-beloved brethren, as many as were there present, to accompany him, their bland and graceful pastor, to the throne of the heavenly grace. Fit leader was he of such a flock! He read the prayers remarkably well, in a quiet and subdued tone, very distinctly, and with marked emphasis and intonation, having sedulously studied how to read the service under a crack theatrical teacher of elocution, who had given him several 'points'—in fact, a new reading entirely—of one of the clauses in the Lord's prayer, and which, he had the gratification of perceiving, produced a striking, if not, indeed, a startling effect. On the little finger of the hand which he used most, was to be observed the sparkle of a diamond ring; and there was a sort of careless grace in the curl of his hair, which it had taken his hair-dresser at least half an hour, before Mr. Morphine's leaving home for his chapel, to effect. In the pulpit he was calm and fluent. He rightly considered that the pulpit ought not to be the scene for attempting intellectual display; he took care, therefore, that there should be nothing in his sermons to arrest the understanding, or unprofitably occupy it, addressing himself entirely to the feelings and fancy of his cultivated audience, in frequently interesting compositions. On the occasion I am speaking of, he took for his text a fearful passage of Scripture, 2 Cor. iv. 3.—"But if our gospel be hid it is hid to them that are lost." If any words were calculated to startle such a congregation as was arrayed before Mr. Velvet, out of their guilty and fatal apathy, were not these? Ought not their minister to have looked round him and trembled? So one would have thought; but "dear Mr. Velvet" knew his mission and his flock better.

He presented them with an elegant description of heaven, with its crystal battlements, its jasper walls, its buildings of pure gold, its foundations of precious stones; its balmy air, its sounds of mysterious melody, its overflowing fullness of everlasting happiness—amidst which friends, parted upon earth by the cruel stroke of death, recognise and are reunited to each other, never more to pronounce the agonizing word "adieu!" And would his dear hearers be content to lose all this—content to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season? Forbid it, eternal mercy! But lest he should alarm his hearers, he took the opportunity to enforce and illustrate the consolatory truth, that "Religion never was designed To make our pleasures less;"

and presently resuming the thread of his discourse, went on to speak of the really serious consequences attending a persevering indifference to religion; and he went on to give striking instances of it in the merchant in his counting-house and on 'change; the lawyer in his office; the tradesman in his shop; the operative in the manufactory; showing how each was absorbed in his calling—laboring for the meat which perisheth, till they had lost all appetite and relish for spiritual food, and never once troubled themselves about "the momentous concerns of hereafter." Upon these topics he dwelt with such force and feeling, that he sent his distinguished congregation away—those of them, at least, who could retain any recollection of what they heard for five minutes after entering their carriages—fearing that there was a very black look-out, indeed, for the kind of persons that Mr. Velvet had mentioned—tailors, milliners, mercers, jewellers, and so forth; and who added graver offences, and of a more positive character, to the misconduct which had been pointed out—in their extortion and their rapacity! Would that some of them had been present! Thus was it that Mr. Velvet sent away his hearers overflowing with Christian sympathy; very well pleased with Mr. Velvet, but infinitely better pleased with themselves. The deep impression which he had made was evidenced by a note he received that evening from the Duchess of Broadacre, most earnestly begging permission to copy his "beautiful sermon," in order to send it to her sister, Lady Belle Almacks, who was ill of a decline at Naples. About that time, I may as well here mention, there came out an engraved portrait of "the Rev. Morphine Velvet, M. A. Minister, Rosemary Chapel, St. James's"—a charming picture it was, representing Mr. Morphine in pulpit costume and attitude, with hands gracefully outstretched, and his face directed upward with a heavenly expression, suggesting to you the possibility that some fine day, when his hearers least expected it, he might gently rise out of his pulpit into the air, like Stephen, with heaven open before him, and be no more seen of men! Happy is that people that is in such a case; yea, happy is that people whose minister is the Rev. Morphine Velvet!

Four or five carriages had to set down before that containing the Earl of Dreddlington, Lady Cecilia, and Mr. Titmouse could draw up; by which time there had accumulated as many in its rear, so eager were the pious aristocrats to get into this holy retreat. As Titmouse, holding his hat and cane in one hand, while with the other he arranged his hair, strutted up the centre aisle, following the Earl and Lady Cecilia, he could hardly repress the exultation with which he thought of a former visit of his to that very chapel some two years before. Then, on attempting to enter the body of the chapel, the vergers had politely but firmly repulsed him; on which, swelling with vexation, he had ascended to the gallery, where, after being kept standing for ten minutes at least, he had been beckoned by the pew-opener toward, and squeezed into, the furthestmost pew, close at the back of the organ, and in which said pew were only four footmen beside himself; and if he was disgusted with his mere contiguity, guess what must have been his feelings when the footman nearest to him good-naturedly forced upon him a part of his prayer-book, which Titmouse, ready to spit in his face, held with his finger and thumb, as though it had been the tail of a snake. Now, how changed was all! He had become an aristocrat; in his veins ran some of the richest and oldest blood in the country; his row might ere long be graced by the coronet which King Henry II. had placed upon the brow of the founder of his family, some seven hundred years before; and a tall footman, with powdered head, glistening silver shoulder-knot, and sky-blue livery, and carrying in a bag the gilded implements of devotion, be humbly following behind him! What a remarkable and vivid contrast between his present and his former circumstances, was present at that moment to his reflecting mind! As he stood, his hat covering his face, in an attitude of devotion—"I wonder," thought he, "what all these nobles and awells would say, if they knew how I had worshipped here on the last time; and again—"Pon my life, what would I give for—say Huckaback—to see me just now!" What an elegant and fashionable air the congregation wore! Surely there must be something in religion when people such as were around him came so punctually to church, and behaved so seriously! The members of that congregation were, indeed, exemplary in their strict discharge of public religious duties. Scarce one of them was there that had not been at the opera till half-past twelve over night; the dulcet notes of the singers still thrilling in their ears, the graceful attitudes of the dancers still present to their eyes; every previous night of the week had they been engaged in the brilliant ball-room, and whirled in the mazes of the voluptuous waltz, or glittering in the picturesque splendor of fancy dress, till three, four and five o'clock in the morning; yet here they were, in spite of all their exhaustion, testified by the heavy eye, the ill-suppressed yawns, the languor and ennui visible in their countenances, prepared to accompany their gentle pastor, "with a pure heart and humble voice," unto the throne of the heavenly grace, to acknowledge, with lively emotion, that they "had followed too much the devices and desires of their own hearts;" praying for "mercy upon them, miserable offenders," that God would "restore them, being penitent," so that "they might thereafter lead a godly, righteous, and sober life." Here they were, punctual to their time, decorous in manners, devout in spirit, earnest and sincere in repentance and good resolutions—knowing the while, how would be spent the remainder of the season of their lives; and yet resolving to attend to the affectionate entreaties of Mr. Velvet, to be "not hearers only, but doers of the word." Generally, I should say that the state of mind of most, if not all of those present, was analogous to that of persons who go and sit in the pump-room, to drink the Bath or Cheltenham waters. Every body did the same thing; and each hoped that, while sitting in his pew, what he heard would, like what he drunk at the pump-room, in some secret mode of operation, insensibly benefit the hearer, without subjecting him to any unpleasant restraint or discipline—without requiring active exertion, or inconvenience, or sacrifice. This will give you a pretty accurate notion of Lord Dreddlington's state of mind upon the present occasion. With his gold glasses on, he followed with his eye, and also with his voice, every word of the prayers with rigid accuracy and unwavering earnestness; but as soon as Mr. Velvet had mounted the pulpit, and risen to deliver his discourse, the Earl quietly folded his arms, closed his eyes, and, in an attentive posture, composed himself to sleep. Lady Cecilia sat beside him perfectly motionless during the whole sermon, her eyes fixed languidly upon the preacher. As for Titmouse, he bore it pretty well for about five minutes; then he pulled his gloves off and on at least twenty times; then he twisted his handkerchief round his fingers; then he looked with a vexed air at his watch; then he stuck his glass in his eye, and stared about him. By the time that Mr. Velvet had ceased, Titmouse had conceived a very great dislike to him, and was indeed in a fretful humor. But when the organ struck up, and they rose to go; when he mingled with the soft, crushing, fluttering, rustling satin-clad throng—nodding to one, bowing to another, and shaking hands with a third, he felt "himself again." The only difference between him and those around him was, that they had learned to bear with calm fortitude what had so severely tried his temper. All were glad to get out: the crash of carriages at the door was music in their ears—the throng of servants' delightful objects to their eyes—they were, in short, in the dear world again, and breathed as freely as ever.

Mr. Titmouse took leave of the Earl and Lady Cecilia at their carriage-door, having ordered his cab to be in waiting—as it was; and entering it, he drove about leisurely till it was time to think of dressing for dinner. He had accepted an invitation to dine with a party of officers in the Guards, and a merry time they had on't. Titmouse in due time got blind drunk; and then one of his companions, rapidly advancing towards the same happy state, seized the opportunity, with a burned cork, to blacken poor Titmouse's face all over—who, therefore, was pronounced to bear a very close resemblance to one of the black boys belonging to the band of the regiment, and afforded as much fun to his friends when dead drunk as when sober. As he was quite incapable of taking care of himself, they put a servant with him into his cab, (judging his little tiger to be unequal to the responsibility.)

Titmouse passed a sad night, but got better toward the middle of the ensuing day; when he was sufficiently recovered to receive two visitors. One of them was young Lord Frederic Feather, (accompanied by a friend,) both of whom had dined in company with Titmouse over night; and his lordship it was, who, having decorated Titmouse's countenance in the way I have described—so as to throw his valet almost into fits on seeing him brought home—imagining it might possibly come to his ears who it was that had done him such a favor, had come to acknowledge and apologise for it frankly and promptly. When, however, he perceived what a fool he had got to deal with, he suddenly changed his course—declared that Titmouse had not only done it himself, but had there presumed to act similarly toward his lordship, whose friend corroborated the charge—and they had called to receive, in private, an apology. Titmouse's breath seemed taken away on first hearing this astounding version of the affair. He swore he had done nothing of the sort, but had suffered a good deal; then, dropping a little on observing the stern looks of his companions, protested "he did not recollect" any thing of the sort; on which they smiled good-naturedly, and said that that was very possible. Then Titmouse made the requisite apology; and thus this awkward affair ended. Lord Frederic continued for some time with Titmouse in pleasant chat; for he foresaw that "hard-up" as he frequently was, Mr. Titmouse was a friend who might be exceedingly serviceable. In fact, poor Lord Frederic could, on that very occasion, have almost gone on his knees for a cheque of Mr. Titmouse upon his bankers, for three or four hundred pounds. Oh, thought Lord Frederic, what would he have given to be in Titmouse's position, with his twenty thousand a-year, and a hundred thousand pounds of hard cash! But, as the reader well knows, poor Titmouse's resources, ample as they were, were upon a far less splendid scale than was supposed. Partly from inclination, and partly through a temporary sense of embarrassment, occasioned by the want of ready money, Titmouse did not spend a tenth part of the sum which it had been every where supposed he could disburse freely on all hands, which occasioned him to be given credit for possessing all that rumor assigned to him; and, moreover, for a disposition not to squander it. He had on several occasions been induced to try his hand at ecarté, rouge et noir, and hazard; and had, on the first occasion or two, been a little hurried away through deference to his distinguished associates, and bled rather freely; but when he found that it was a matter of business—that he must pay—and felt his purse growing lighter, and his pocket-book, in which he kept his bank-notes, rapidly shrinking in dimensions as the evening wore on, he experienced vivid alarm and disgust, and an increasing disinclination to be victimized; and his aversion to play was infinitely strengthened by the frequent cautions of the Earl of Dreddlington.

But there was one step in Mr. Titmouse's upward progress which he presently took, and which is worthy of special mention; I mean his presentation at court by the Earl of Dreddlington. The necessity for such a step was explained to Titmouse, by his illustrious kinsman, a day or two after the appearance of the ordinary official announcement of the next levee. This momentous affair was broached by the Earl, one day after dinner, with an air of deep anxiety and interest. Indeed, had that stately and solemn old simpleton been instructing his gaping protégé in the minutely-awful etiquette requisite for the due discharge of his duties as an ambassador sent upon a delicate and embarrassing mission to the court of his Sacred Majesty the King of Sulkypunctilio, he could not have appeared more penetrated by a sense of the responsibility he was incurring. He commenced by giving Titmouse a very long history of the origin and progress of such ceremonies, and a minute account of the practical manner of their observance, all of which, however, was to Titmouse only like breathing upon a mirror—passing as quickly out of one ear as it had entered into the other. When, however, the Earl came to the point of dress, Titmouse was indeed "a thing all ear, all eye," his faculties being stimulated to their utmost. The next morning he hurried off to his tailor, to order a court dress. When it had been brought to his rooms, and he had put it on, upon returning to his room in his new and imposing costume, and glancing at his figure in the glass, his face fell; he felt infinitely disappointed. It is to be remembered that he had not on lace ruffles at his coat-cuffs, nor on his shirt front. After gazing at himself for a few moments in silence, he suddenly snapped his fingers, and exclaimed to the tailor, who, with the valet, was standing beside him, "Curse me if I like this thing at all!" "Not like it, sir!" exclaimed Mr. Clipclose, with astonishment.

"No, I don't, demme! Is this a court dress? It's a quaker's made into a footman's! 'Pon my soul, I look the exact image of a footman; and a devilish vulgar one, too!" The two individuals beside him turned suddenly away from him, and from one another, and from their noses there issued the sounds of ill-suppressed laughter.

"Oh, sir—I beg a thousand pardons!"—quickly exclaimed Mr. Clipclose, "what can I have been thinking about? There's the sword—we've quite forgot it!"

"Ah—'pon my life, I thought there was something wrong!" quoth Titmouse, as Mr. Clipclose, having brought the sword from the other end of the room, where he had laid it upon entering, buckled it on.

"I flatter myself that now, sir"—commenced he.

"Ye—as—Quite the correct thing! 'Pon my soul, most uncommon striking!"—exclaimed Titmouse, glancing at his figure in the glass with a triumphant smile. "Isn't it odd, now, that this sword should make all the difference between me and a footman, by Jove?" Here his two companions were seized with a simultaneous fit of coughing.

"Ah, ha—it's so, a 'nt it?" continued Titmouse, his eyes glued to the glass.

"Certainly, sir: it undoubtedly gives—what shall I call it? a grace—a finish—a sort of commanding—especially to a figure that becomes it"—he continued, with cool assurance, observing that the valet understood him. "But—may I, sir, take so great a liberty? If you are not accustomed to wear a sword—as I think you said you had not been at court before—I beg to remind you that it will require particular care to manage it, and prevent it from getting between"—

"Demme, sir!" exclaimed Titmouse, starting aside with an offended air—"dye think I don't know how to manage a sword? By all that's tremendous"—and plucking the taper weapon out of its scabbard, he waved it over his head, and throwing himself into the first position—he had latterly paid a good deal of attention to fencing—and with rather an excited air, went through several of the preliminary movements. 'Twas a subject for a painter, and exhibited a very striking spectacle—as an instance of power silently concentrated, and ready to be put forth upon an adequate occasion. The tailor and the valet, who stood separate from each other, and at a safe distance from Mr. Titmouse, gazed with silent admiration at him.

When the great day arrived—Titmouse having thought of scarce any thing else in the interval, and teased every one he met with his endless questions and childish observations on the subject—he drove up, at the appointed hour, to the Earl of Dreddlington's, whose carriage, with an appearance of greater state than usual about it, was standing at the door. On alighting from his cab, he skipped so nimbly up stairs, that he could not have had time to observe the amusement which his figure occasioned even to the well-disciplined servants of the Earl of Dreddlington. Much allowance ought to have been made for them. Think of Mr. Titmouse's little knee-breeches, white silks, silver shoe-buckles, shirt-ruffles and frills, coat, bag, and sword; and his hair, plastered up with bear's grease, parted down the middle of his head, and curling out boldly over each temple; and his open countenance irradiated with a subdued smile of triumph and excitement.

On entering the drawing-room, he beheld a really striking object—the Earl in court costume, wearing his general's uniform, with all his glistening orders, standing in readiness to set off, and holding in his hand his cap, with its snowy plume. His posture was at once easy and commanding. Had he been standing to Sir Thomas Laurence, he could not have disposed himself more effectively. Lady Cecilia was sitting on the sofa, leaning back, and languidly talking to him; and, from the start they both gave on Titmouse's entrance, it was plain that they could not have calculated upon the extraordinary transfiguration he must have undergone, in assuming court costume. For a moment or two, each was severely shocked as when his absurd figure had first presented itself in that drawing-room. "Oh, heavens!" murmured Lady Cecilia; while the Earl seemed struck dumb by the approaching figure of Titmouse. That gentleman, however, was totally changed from the Titmouse of a former day. He had now acquired a due sense of his personal importance, a just confidence in himself. Greatness had lost its former petrifying influence over him. And as for his appearance on the present occasion, he had grown so familiar with it, as reflected in his glass, that it never occurred to him as being different with others who beheld him for the first time. At the same time, that candor upon which I pride myself urges me to state, that when Titmouse beheld the military air and superb equipments of the Earl—notwithstanding that Titmouse, too, wore a sword—he felt himself done. He advanced, however, pretty confidently—bobbing about, first to Lady Cecilia, and then to the Earl; and after a hasty salutation—"Pon my life, my lord, I hope it's no offence, but your lordship does look most particular fine." The Earl made no reply, but inclined toward him magnificently—not seeing the meaning and intention of Titmouse, but affronted by his words.

"May I ask what your lordship thinks of me? First time I ever appeared in this kind of thing, my lord—ha! ha, your lordship sees!"—As he spoke, his look and voice betrayed the overawing effects of the earl's splendid appearance—which was rapidly freezing up the springs of familiarity, if not indeed of flattery, which were bubbling up within the little bosom of Titmouse, on his entering the room. His manner became involuntarily subdued and reverential. The Earl of Dreddington in plain clothes, and in full court costume, were two very different persons; though his lordship would have been mortally affronted if he had known that any one thought so. However he now regretted having offered to take Titmouse to the levee, there was no escape from the calamity; so, after a few minutes' pause, he rang the bell, and announced his readiness to set off. Followed by Mr. Titmouse, his lordship slowly descended the stairs; and when he was within two or three steps of the hall floor, it distressed me to relate, that he fell nearly flat upon his face, and, but for his servants' rushing up, would have been seriously hurt. Poor Titmouse had been the occasion of this disaster; for his sword getting between his legs, down he went against the earl, who went naturally down upon the floor, as I have mentioned. Titmouse was not much hurt, but terribly frightened, and went as pale as death when he looked at the earl, who appeared a little agitated, but, not having been really injured, soon recovered his self-possession. Profuse were poor Titmouse's apologies, as may be supposed; but much as he was distressed at what had taken place, a glance at the angry countenances with which the servants regarded him, as if inwardly cursing his stupidity and clumsiness, stirred up his spirit a little, and restored him to a measure of self-possession. He would have given a hundred pounds to have been able to discharge every one of them on the spot.

"Sir—enough has been said," quoth the earl, rather coldly and haughtily, tired of the multiplied apologies and excuses of Titmouse. "I thank God, sir, that I am not hurt, though, at any time of life, a fall is not a slight matter. Sir," continued the earl, bitterly, "you are not so much to blame as your tailor; he should have explained to you how to wear your sword!" With this, having cut Titmouse to the very quick, the earl motioned him toward the door: they soon entered the carriage; the door was closed; and, with a brace of footmen behind, away rolled these two truly distinguished subjects to pay their homage to majesty—which might well be proud of such homage. They both sat in silence for some time. At length—"Beg your lordship's pardon," quoth Titmouse, with some energy: "but I wish your lordship only knew how I hate this cursed skewer that's pinned to me;"—and he looked at his sword, as if he could have snapped it into halves, and thrown them through the window.

"Sir, I can appreciate your feelings. The sword was not to blame; and you have my forgiveness," replied the still ruffled earl.

"Much obliged to your lordship," replied Titmouse, in a somewhat different tone from any in which he had ever ventured to address his august companion; for he was beginning to feel confoundedly nettled at the bitter, contemptuous manner which the earl observed toward him. He was also not a little enraged with himself; for he knew he had been in fault, and thought of the neglected advice of his tailor. So his natural insolence, like a reptile just beginning to recover from its long torpor, made a faint struggle to show itself—but in vain; he was quite cowed and overpowered by the presence in which he was, and he wished heartily that he could have recalled even the few last words he had ventured to utter. The Earl had observed it, though without appearing to do so. He was accustomed to control his feelings; and on the present occasion he exerted himself to do so, for fear of alienating Titmouse from him by any display of offended dignity.

"Sir, it is a very fine day," he observed, in a kind manner, after a stern silence of at least five minutes.

"Remarkable fine, my lord. I was just going to say so," replied Titmouse, greatly relieved; and presently they fell into their usual strain of conversation.

"We must learn to bear these little annoyances calmly," said the Earl, graciously, on Titmouse's again alluding to his mishap—"as for me, sir, a person in the station to which it has pleased Heaven to call me, for purposes of its own, has his peculiar and very grave anxieties—substantial

He ceased suddenly. The carriage of his old rival, the Earl of Fitz-Warren, passed him; the latter waved his hand courteously; the former, with a bitter smile, was forced to do the same; and then relapsing into silence, showed that the iron was entering his very soul, affording a striking illustration of the truth of the observation he had been making to Titmouse. Soon, however, they had entered the scene of splendid hubbub, which at once occupied and excited both their minds. Without, was the eager crowd, gazing with admiration and awe at each equipage, with its brilliant occupants, that dashed past them:—then the life-guardsmen, in glittering and formidable array, their long gleaming swords and polished helmets glancing and flashing in the sunlight. Within, were the tall yeomen of the guard, in velvet caps and scarlet uniforms, and with ponderous partisans, lining each side of the staircase—and who, being in the exact military costume of the time of Henry the Eighth, forcibly recalled those days of pomp and pageantry to the well-informed mind of Mr. Titmouse. In short, there were all the grandeur, state, and ceremony that fence in the dread approaches to majesty. Fortunately, Titmouse was infinitely too much bewildered and flustered by the novel splendor around him, to be aware of the ill-concealed laughter which his appearance excited on all hands. In due course he was borne on, and issued in due form into the presence-chamber—into the immediate presence of majesty. His heart palpitated: his dazzled eye caught a hasty glimpse of a tall magnificent figure standing before a throne. Advancing—scarce aware whether on his head or his heels—he reverently paid his homage—then rising, was promptly ushered out through a different door; with no distinct impression of anything that he had passed;—'twas all a dazzling blaze of glory—a dim vision of awe! Little was he aware, poor soul, that the king had required him to be pointed out upon his approach, having heard of his celebrity in society, and that he had the distinguished honor of occasioning to majesty a very great effort to keep its countenance. It was not till after he had quitted the palace for some time, that he breathed freely again. Then he began to feel as if a vast change had been effected in him by some mysterious and awful agency—that he was penetrated and pervaded, as it were, by the subtle essence of royalty—like one that had experienced the sudden, strange, thrilling, potent, influence of electricity. He imagined that now the stamp of greatness had been impressed upon him; his pretensions ratified by the highest authority upon earth. 'Twas as if wine had been poured into a stream, intoxicating the titlilubs swimming about in it. As for me, seriously speaking, I question whether it was any thing more than an imaginary change that had come over my friend. Though I should be sorry to cite against him an authority, couched in a language with which I have reason to believe he was not critically acquainted, I cannot help thinking that Horace must have had in his eye a Roman Titmouse, when he penned those bitter lines—

"Licet superbus ambules pecuniâ
Fortuna non mutat genus,
—Videsne Sacram metiente te Viam
Cum bis ter unarum togâ,
Ut ora vertat huc et huc euntium,
Liberrima indignatio?
—Sectus flagellis hic triumphalibus
Præconis ad fastidium,
Arat Falerni mille fundi jugera,
Et Apian mannis terit!"

While Titmouse was making this splendid figure in the upper regions of society, and forming there every hour new and brilliant connections and associations—in a perfect whirl of pleasure from morning to night—he did not ungratefully manifest a total forgetfulness of the amiable persons with whom he had been so familiar, and from whom he had received so many good offices in his earlier days and humbler circumstances. Had it not, however,—to give the devil his due—been for Gammon, (who was ever beside him, like a mysterious pilot, secretly steering his little bark amidst the strange, splendid, but dangerous seas which it had now to navigate,) I fear that, with Titmouse, it would have been—out of sight out of mind. But Gammon, ever watchful over the real interests of his charge, and also delighted to become the medium of conferring favors upon others, conveyed from time to time, to the interesting family of the Tag-rags, special marks of Mr. Titmouse's courtesy and gratitude. At one time, a haunch of doe venison would find its way to Mr. Tag-rag, to whom Gammon justly considered that the distinction between buck and doe was unknown; at another, a fine work-box and a beautifully bound Bible found its way to good Mrs. Tag-rag; and, lastly, a gay guitar to Miss Tag-rag, who forthwith began twang-twang, tang-a-tang tang-it, from morning to night, thinking with ecstasy of its dear distinguished donor; who, together with Mr. Gammon, had, some time afterward, the unspeakable gratification, on occasion of their being invited to dine at Satin Lodge, of hearing her perform the following exquisite composition, for both the words and air of which she had been indebted to her music-master, a youth with black mustaches, long dark hair parted on his head, shirt collars à la Byron, and eyes full of inspiration:

TO HIM I LOVE.
Ah me! I feel the smart
Of Cupid's cruel dart
Affectua-mente. Quivering in my heart,
Heigho, ah! whew!
With him I love
Swiftly time would move;
Allegro. With his cigar,
And my guitar,
We'd smoke and play
The livelong day,
Merrily, merrily!
Puff—puff—puff,
Tang-a, tang, tang!
When he's not near me,
O! of life I'm weary—
The world is dreary—
Adagio, et con molto
espressioni. Mystic spirits of song,
Wreathed with cypresses, come along!
And hear me! hear me!

* Hor. Carm. V., iv.

Teneramente.

Singing,
Heigho, heigho—
Tootle, tootle, too,
A—lackaday!

Such were the tender and melting strains which this fair creature (her voice a little reedy and squeaking, to be sure,) poured into the sensitive ear of Titmouse; and such are the strains by means of which many and many a Miss Tag-rag has captivated many and many a Titmouse; so that sentimental compositions of this sort are deservedly popular, and do honor to our musical and poetical character as a nation. I said that it was on the occasion of a dinner at Satin Lodge, that Mr. Titmouse and Mr. Gammon were favored by hearing Miss Tag-rag's voice, accompanying her guitar; for when Mr. Tag-rag had sounded Mr. Gammon, and found that both he and Titmouse would be only too proud and happy to partake of his hospitality, they were invited. A very crack affair it was, (though I have not time to describe it)—given on a more splendid scale than Mr. Tag-rag had ever ventured upon before. He brought a bottle of champagne all the way from town with his own hands, and kept it nice and cool in the kitchen cistern for three days beforehand; and there was fish, soup, roast mutton, and roast ducks, roast fowls, peas, cabbage, cauliflowers, potatoes, vegetable marrow; there was an apple-pie, a plumb-pudding, custards, creams, jelly, and a man to wait, hired from the tavern at the corner of the hill. It had not occurred to them to provide themselves with champagne glasses, so they managed as well as they could with the common ones—all but Titmouse, who, with a sort of fashionable recklessness, to show how little he thought of it, poured out his champagne into his tumbler, which he two-thirds filled, and drank it off at a draught, Mr. Tag-rag trying to disguise the inward spasm it occasioned him, by a grievous smile. He and Mrs. Tag-rag exchanged anxious looks; the whole of their sole bottle of champagne was gone already—almost as soon as it had been opened!

"I always drink champagne out of a tumbler; I do—'pon my life," said Titmouse, carelessly; "it's a devilish deal more pleasant."

"Ye-es—Of course it is, sir," said Mr. Tag-rag, rather faintly. Shortly afterward, Titmouse offered to take a glass of champagne with Miss Tag-rag:—Her father's face flashed; and at length, with a bold effort, "Why Mr. Titmouse," said he, trying desperately to look unconcerned—"the—the fact is, I never keep more than a dozen or so in my cellar—and most unfortunately I found this afternoon that six bottles had—burst—I assure you."

"'Pon my soul, sorry to hear it," quoth Titmouse; "must send you a dozen of my own—I always keep about fifty or a hundred dozen. Oh, I'll send you half-a-dozen!"

Tag-rag scarcely knew, for a moment, whether he felt pleased or mortified at this stroke of delicate generosity. Thus it was that Titmouse evinced a disposition to shower marks of his favor and attachment upon the Tag-rags, in obedience to the injunctions of Gammon, who assured him that it was of very great importance for him to secure the good graces of Mr. Tag-rag.

So Mr. Titmouse now drove up to Satin Lodge in his cab, and then rode thither, followed by his stylish groom; and on one occasion, a trifling scamp! happening to find no one at home but Miss Tag-rag, he nevertheless alighted, and stayed for nearly ten minutes, behaving precisely in the manner of an accepted suitor, aware that he might do so with impunity since there was no witness present; a little matter which had been suggested to him by Mr. Gammon. Poor Miss Tag-rag's cheek he kissed with every appearance of ardor, protesting that she was a monstrous lovely creature; and he left her in a state of delightful excitement, imagining herself the fated mistress of ten thousand a-year, and the blooming bride of the gay and fashionable Mr. Titmouse. When her excellent parents heard of what had that day occurred between Mr. Titmouse and their daughter, they also looked upon the thing as quite settled. In the meanwhile, the stream of prosperity flowed steadily in upon Mr. Tag-rag, his shop continuing crowded; his shopmen doubled in number; in fact, he at length actually received, instead of giving payment, for allowing young men to serve a short time in so celebrated an establishment, in order that they might learn the first-rate style of doing business, and when established on their own account, write up over their doors—"Peter Tape, late from Tag-rag & Co., Oxford street."

Determined to make hay while the sun shone, he resorted to several little devices for that purpose, such as a shir front with frills in the shape of a capital "T," and which, under the name of "Tittier," he sold immense numbers amongst the inferior swells of London. At length it occurred to Gammon to suggest to Titmouse a mode of conferring upon his old friend and master a mark of permanent, public, and substantial distinction; and this was, the obtaining for him, through the Earl of Dreddington, an appointment as one of the royal tradesmen—namely, draper and hosier to the King. When Mr. Tag-rag's disinterested and indefatigable benefactor, Gammon, called one day in Oxford street, and calling him for a moment out of the bustle of his crowded shop, mentioned the honor which Mr. Titmouse was bent upon doing his utmost, at Mr. Gammon's instance, to procure for Mr. Tag-rag, that respectable person was quite at a loss for terms in which adequately to express his gratitude. Titmouse readily consented to name the thing to the great man, and urge it in the best way he could; and he performed his promise. The Earl listened to his application with an air of anxiety. "Sir," said he, "the world is acquainted with my reluctance to ask favors of these in office. When I was in office myself, I felt the inconvenience of such applications abundantly. Beside, the appointment you have named, happens to be one of considerable importance, and requiring great influence to procure it. Consider, sir, the immense number of tradesmen there are of every description, of whom drapers and hosiers (according to the last returns laid before Parliament at the instance of my friend Lord Goose,) are by far the most numerous. All of them are naturally ambitious of so high a distinction: yet, sir, observe, that there is only one king and one royal family to serve. My Lord Chamberlain is, I have no doubt, harassed by applicants for such honors as you have mentioned."

Hereat Titmouse got startled at the unexpected magnitude of the favor he had applied for; and, declaring that he did not care a curse for Tag-rag, begged to withdraw.

his application. But the Earl, with a mighty fine air, interrupted him—"Sir, you are not in the least presuming upon your relationship with me, nor do I think you overrate the influence I may happen—in short, sir, I will make it my business to see my lord Ko-too this very day, and sound him upon the subject."

That same day an interview took place between the two distinguished noblemen, Lord Dreddlington and Lord Ko-too. Each approached the other upon silts. After a display of the most delicate tact on the part of Lord Dreddlington, Lord Ko-too, who made a mighty piece of work of it, promised to consider of the application.

Within a day or two afterward, Mr. Tag-rag received a letter from the Lord Chamberlain's office, notifying that his Majesty had been graciously pleased to appoint him draper and hosier to his Majesty! It occasioned him similar feelings of tumultuous pride and pleasure to that with which the Earl of Dreddlington would have received tidings of his long-coveted marquise having been conferred upon him. He started off, within a quarter of an hour after the receipt of the letter, to a carver and gilder a few doors off, and gave orders for the immediate preparation of a first-rate cast, gilded, of the royal arms; which, in about a week's time, might be seen, a truly resplendent object, dazzlingly conspicuous over the central door of Mr. Tag-rag's establishment, inspiring awe into the minds of passers-by, and envy into Mr. Tag-rag's neighbors and rivals. He immediately sent off letters of gratitude to Mr. Titmouse, and to "the Right Honorable, the Most Noble the Earl of Dreddlington;" to the latter personage, at the same time, forwarding a most splendid crimson satin flowered dressing-gown, as "an humble token of his gratitude for his lordship's mark of condescension."

Both the letter and the dressing-gown gave great satisfaction to the Earl's valet, (than whom they never got any further,) and who, having tried on the dressing-gown, forthwith sat down and wrote a very fine reply, in his lordship's name, to the note which had accompanied it, taking an opportunity to satisfy his conscience, by stating to the Earl the next morning that a Mr. Tag-rag had "called" to express his humble thanks for his lordship's goodness. He was, moreover, so well satisfied with this specimen of Mr. Tag-rag's articles, that he forthwith opened an account with him, and sent a very liberal order to start with. The same thing occurred with several of the subordinate functionaries at the palace; and—to let my reader, a little prematurely however, into the secret—this was the extent of the additional custom which Mr. Tag-rag's appointment secured him; and, even for these supplies, I never heard of his getting paid. But it did wonders with him in the estimation of the world. 'Twas evident that he was in a fair way of becoming the head house in the trade. His appointment caused no little ferment in that nook of the city with which he was connected.

MR. BUCKINGHAM'S AMERICAN TOUR.

Mr. Buckingham, since his return to England, has written for a society in London engaged in the temperance cause, a small tract, presenting a view of his exertions during the last three years in America, in behalf of the principles of "Temperance, Education, Benevolence, and Peace." This gentleman is regarded, we fear, by a considerable portion of the British public, as a visionary; we never can forget the reception experienced in the House of Commons by a proposal of his to institute recreation-grounds for the people of our large towns. We cannot, however, doubt that men like him, possessed of lively and versatile talents, powers of attractive public speaking, enterprise, perseverance, and genuinely good intentions toward his fellow-creatures, must prove of immense influence in introducing improvements, and generally meliorating the condition of society. Thus thinking, we deem it a duty we owe to the public to aid in diffusing the account of Mr. Buckingham's tour.

"It was," says he, "in the month of October, 1837, that I first landed in New York; and the object of my visit soon becoming known, I was speedily surrounded by some of the most philanthropic and influential individuals with which that city happily abounds. The period of my first stay there embraced about four months—from October, 1837, to February, 1838; and during that time I devoted the mornings of my days to the careful investigation of every thing of interest that this enterprising and opulent city contained, in which I was most cordially assisted by the ready access with which I was favored to every kind of information that I sought. My evenings were partly devoted to the delivery of my public lectures on the Scriptural and Classical Regions of the Oriental World, which were repeated in six separate and successive courses, in six different quarters of the city, and attended by nearly all the most respectable and educated classes of the community.

"These labors, as may well be conceived, brought me into close personal communion with some of all ranks of society; and gave me ample opportunities to form a tolerably correct estimate of the actual condition of each. In addition to this, I visited personally, and examined carefully, the various benevolent institutions with which the city and its environs abound, especially those for the reformation of criminals, juvenile and adult—those for the education of the deaf and dumb, and blind—and those for the shelter, sustenance, and protection of the diseased, infirm, and insane. In each of these new facts were learned, of great value to the statistics of intemperance, illustrative of the powerful operation of intoxicating drinks in producing at least three-fourths of all the poverty, disease, insanity, and crime—for the support, and protection, and punishment of which, so many millions of expenditure are required, to maintain the asylums, hospitals, and prisons to which the unhappy victims of intemperance are driven, and in which they are supported by the contributions of others; thus taxing the worthy members of society to pay the penalties which the unworthy inflict upon themselves, and compelling the sober and industrious classes of the community to support the drunken and the dissolute, who, had they been temperate and careful, might have avoided both poverty and crime, and, if afflicted with infirmity or old age, have realized a fund from their earnings, by which they might have supported themselves.

"From New York I proceeded to Philadelphia; and here the kindness and hospitality of the inhabitants was manifested toward myself and my family, by whom I was every where accompanied, in a manner at once new, brilliant, and effective. The friends of temperance in this "City of Brotherly love" determined to honor us with a public welcome; and to give it increased popularity, the day chosen for the purpose was February 22, the anniversary of the birth-day of their great hero and statesman—to whom the whole world now pays the homage of admiration—General Washington.

"For this festival of welcome, one of the largest theatres in Philadelphia was engaged, and the pit being floored over on a level with the stage, this united space was converted into a saloon, in which were placed tables, covered with an ample supply of the most elegant and agreeable refreshments that the culinary and confectionary arts could supply, but with an entire absence of all intoxicating drinks. The visitors occupied the three tiers of boxes and galleries; the stewards of the entertainment superintended the tables in the saloon; while the directors of the festival, with the speakers and musical choir, occupied the stage. The price of admission was limited to a dollar each; but long before the hour of opening came, the full number of tickets that the theatre would contain was issued; and such was the eagerness to join the party, that those who were too late could only purchase tickets of early buyers, which was done at premiums of five and ten dollars in advance—sums that were freely given. The result was far beyond the expectations of the most sanguine. Never had there been before, within the walls of the building, so large a number of persons—2000 was the lowest estimate of those present, and they were said to include among them members of nearly all the first families in the city. The scene was brilliant and animating in the highest degree; the proceedings evidently in accordance with the feelings of those present; the expressions of pleasure enthusiastic; and the order and decorum of the meeting never for a moment disturbed; while, at the same time, three great and important ends had been achieved:—First, it had been proved, by this experiment, that a large assembly might be entertained for many hours, with great elegance and unflinching interest and cheerfulness, without the use of wine. Secondly, a mass of useful information connected with the temperance reform had been spread before the most intellectual and influential portion of the community, which, through the agency of their personal communications, and the still more extended agency of the public press, could hardly fail to produce a large amount of good. And, thirdly, by the voluntary contributions of those who paid for their admission to this festival, and the donations subsequently given, an amount of 2500 dollars, or £500 sterling was, raised, to be added to the temperance funds. From Philadelphia I proceeded to Baltimore, and there also a very crowded assembly greeted my arrival, at a great temperance meeting held in the Methodist Church, at which most of the leading families of this beautiful and hospitable city were present, and where several of the clergy of different denominations rendered the aid of their valuable services to the cause."

The next scene of Mr. Buckingham's labors was Washington, where he also awakened new attention to the objects he had in view, those matters that had been laughed at in England being here investigated with patience and courtesy. He then proceeded northward, and visited various places, among others, Lowell, the Manchester of America; after which he went to Boston. "In this noble city, the early abode of some of the pilgrim fathers, and the Athens of the west, we passed several months, and those full of interest and pleasure. My lectures were delivered here in four successive courses, morning and evening, to crowded and brilliant audiences; and here, as in all other cities we had yet visited, every source of information as to matters of public interest was freely opened, without reserve; and of this advantage I availed myself fully. Among the public meetings that I had the pleasure to attend in Boston, were two splendid assemblages called together for the purpose of forming and supporting establishments for seamen, to protect them from the intemperance, dissipation, and consequent want and destitution, into which they are drawn, by the arts of those who beset them on their landing, lure them to the brothel and the tavern, and there plunder them in a few days of all the hard-earned wages of months and sometimes years. These meetings were among the most effective of any that I remember to have addressed, both in the feeling created on behalf of the object proposed, and the large amount of funds raised to sustain the "Sailors' Home," for which this aid was required.

"The interesting cities of Salem, New Bedford, and Providence, were next visited in succession: and in each lectures were delivered and public meetings held, to promote the great objects of my tour: those at New Bedford, on behalf of the seamen of the port, ending in the adoption of a plan to raise a fund of several thousand dollars, by a small tax of a penny per ton on all the shipping belonging to the port, which was readily acquiesced in by the shipowners, to be devoted to the building and support of a Sailors' Home; and the meetings at Providence leading to an animated and protracted discussion, before the most crowded assemblies, on the great question of how far it was proper to call in the aid of legislation to restrain men from the indulgence of intemperance and the commission of crime—a triumphant majority being obtained in favor of such legislation, on the just and humane principle that "Prevention is better than cure."

"Our next visit was to the ancient and interesting city of Plymouth, founded more than two centuries ago by the pilgrim fathers, who sought an asylum of religious freedom in the new world from the intolerance and persecution of the old. We attended here the whole of the festivities observed on the occasion of the anniversary of the landing of the pilgrims, December 22; and here also I was invited to deliver a temperance address, which was given in one of the churches, and attended by large numbers. My lectures were given in the Pilgrim Hall; and this ancient seat of the learning and piety of the first founders of the colonies on the American continent, could boast, during my stay in it, that it did not contain a single dram-shop, or place where ardent spirits are sold; that it had not had a dwelling destroyed by fire for nearly a century past; that it had no poor to sustain, and not a single occupant in its jail, which had been empty many months, and was soon about to be let for some other purpose. This concluded my first year's labor in America, which was confined to the Atlantic and New-England States. In the second year, a new sphere of observation and occupation was opened to us in the south. We made our voyage from New-York to Charleston, in South Carolina by sea, in January, 1838; and the reception I met with here was even still more enthusiastic than in the cities of the north." After visiting Charleston and various other towns, he passed on to New Orleans, where he held sundry public meetings. One of these "was indeed a splendid meeting, in its numbers, its brilliancy, its enthusiasm, and its result. At the close of my address, a wealthy merchant of the city rose, and stated to the audience that, after the details he had heard of the ravages of intemperance, and of the strong claims of the seamen, especially to the aid and protection of those who reaped their fortunes by their labors, he could not remain a silent spectator of the scene, nor refuse to follow up, and go beyond, the example of New-Bedford, Charleston, and Savannah, in providing Sailors' Homes, for the rescue of the ill-used mariner from the snares of his betrayers. He said he had just purchased 600 bales of cotton, and was about to ship them for Europe; and he would agree to pay five dollars per bale on his entire shipment, or 3000 dollars in the whole, if all the other merchants and shippers of cotton in New-Orleans would consent to pay one cent per bale on every bale shipped by them for the remainder of the year. This was hailed with general acclamation, when, after a short pause, a gentleman rose to ask whether, in the event of there being any individuals so mean and ungenerous as not to come into the arrangement, the worthy merchant would still adhere to his offer; on which another inhabitant of the city rose, and said, that to remove all doubt on this subject, he was so satisfied that few or none of this description of persons could be found in New-Orleans, that he would undertake to make up the amount of all who should refuse or be deficient. The spark soon kindled into a flame, and the warm hearts of the southerners gradually opened and expanded with every successive offer.

"Some, not dealing in cotton, but shipping sugar largely, agreed to pay five cents per hoghead on all exported for the year. Others, having steamboats employed in towing vessels in and out of port, agreed to give twenty-five cents for every brig, and a dollar for every ship towed up or down the Mississippi by their steam-tugs throughout the season. Thus, before the meeting closed, a fund was guaranteed, amply sufficient to accomplish all our wishes; and to the worthy collector of customs at New Orleans, who occupied the chair of the meeting, was confided the task of collecting these sums, which his official situation would so well enable him to do. The officers and sailors in the gallery and aisles, joined as loudly as the rest of the audience in the expression of their joy at the full tide of benevolence which had been made to flow on that night, not merely on behalf of themselves, but also of all their worthy, though neglected and injured, shipmates and brother seamen ever visiting the port."

We have not space to follow the tourist up the Mississippi and the Ohio, of whose forest-clad banks he presents some vivid descriptions. He now passes into British America, lectures right through Canada, descends the St. Lawrence, and gets to Halifax, in Nova Scotia; afterward we find him in New Brunswick, raising the banner of the temperance cause; and, finally, he returns to Boston, which terminated his three years' travel. He now sums up as follows:—"I gave my gratuitous services at about 150 meetings, for the promotion of 'Temperance, Education, Benevolence and Peace,' and was instrumental to the raising, by these means, of scarcely less than 100,000 dollars, in collections and subscriptions, emanating from these meetings, for various philanthropic purposes, the custody and administration of which were confided to other hands. The more minute details of all the many varied and interesting scenes and events presented by this extensive tour, will soon be submitted to the public, in the volumes now preparing for the press; and in these, of course, will be embodied all the general observations on other topics, which have been thought worthy of record. I cannot, however, conclude, without expressing my high gratification at the healthy and vigorous aspect and condition of the temperance cause in Britain, and its progress during my absence from home. It is now about ten years since I first publicly proclaimed the principle, that 'Total Abstinence from all that can intoxicate is the only safe ground of hope for the cure of intemperance in the mass of the community, and that it is as necessary to enforce this by example as by precept.' All is now cheering and encouraging in the highest degree, and affords me an ample reward for the calumny and sneers—the ribaldry and insinuations—with which my first attempts to arouse the attention of the legislature and the nation to this great question, were assailed; and the success with which my humble labors of the past have been crowned, will stimulate me to fresh exertions for the future."

SONG.

Thou'rt sair altered now, May,
Thou'rt sair altered now,
The rose is withered frae thy cheek,
The wrinkle's on thy brow;
And grey hath grown the locks o' jet,
Sae shining wont to be,
Thou'rt altered sair—but May, thou'rt yet
The May o' yore to me.

Thy voice is faint and low, May,
That aft in former time
Hath woke the wild bird's envious chant,
The echo's amorous chime;
Thy e'e hath lost its early light,
My star in iher years,
That aye hath beamed sae kindly bright,
To me thro' smiles and tears.

For a' the signs that shew, May,
The gloomin' o' our day,
I lo'e thee young—I lo'e thee yet,
My ain auld wife, May;
Nae dearer hope hae I than this;
Beyond the day we die;
Thy charms shall bloom again to bless
My halidome on hie!

BARNABY RUDGE

BY CHARLES DICKENS, ESQ.

CHAPTER IV.

In the venerable suburb—it was a suburb once—of Clerkenwell, toward that part of its confines which is nearest to the Charter House, and in one of those cool, shady streets, of which a few, widely scattered and dispersed, yet remain in such old parts of the metropolis—each tenement quietly vegetating like an ancient citizen who long ago retired from business, and dozing on in its infirmity until in course of time it tumbles down, and is replaced by some extravagant young heir, flaunting in stucco and ornamental work, and all the vanities of modern days—in this quarter, and in a street of this description, the business of the present chapter lies.

At the time of which it treats, though only six-and-sixty years ago, a very large part of what is London now had no existence. Even in the brains of the wildest speculators, there had sprung up no long rows of streets connecting Highgate with Whitechapel, no assemblages of palaces in the swampy levels, nor little cities in the open fields. Although this part of town was then, as now, parcelled out in streets and plentifully peopled, it wore a different aspect. There were gardens to many of the houses, and trees by the pavement side; with an air freshness breathing up and down, which in these days would be sought in vain. Fields were nigh at hand, through which the New River took its winding course, and where there was merry hay-making in the summer time. Nature was not so far removed or hard to get at, as in these days; and although there were busy trades in Clerkenwell, and working jewellers by scores, it was a purer place, with farm-houses nearer to it than many modern Londoners would readily believe; and lovers' walks at no great distance, which turned into squalid courts, long before the lovers of this age were born, or, as the phrase goes, thought of.

In one of these streets, the cleanest of them all, and on the shady side of the way—for good housewives know that sunlight damages their cherished furniture, and so choose the shade rather than its intrusive glare—there stood the house with which we have to deal. It was a modest building, not over-newly fashioned, not very straight, not large, not tall; not bold-faced, with great staring windows, but a shy, blinking house, with a conical roof going up into a peak over its garret windows of four small panes of glass, like a cocked hat on the head of an elderly gentleman with one eye. It was not built of brick or lofty stone, but of wood and plaster; it was not planned with a dull and wearisome regard to regularity, for no one window matched the other, or seemed to have the slightest reference to anything beside itself.

The shop—for it had a shop—was, with reference to the first floor, where shops usually are; and there all resemblance between it and any other shop stopped short and ceased. People who went in and out did not go up a flight of steps to it, or walk easily in upon a level with the street, but dived down three steep stairs, as into a cellar. Its floor was paved with stone and brick, as that of any other cellar might be; and in lieu of window framed and glazed it had a great black wooden flap or shutter, nearly breast high from the ground, which turned back in the day-time, admitting as much cold air as light, and very often more. Behind this shop was a wainscoted parlor, looking first into a paved yard, and beyond that again into a little terrace garden, raised some few feet above it. Any stranger would have supposed that this wainscoted parlor, saving for the door of communication by which he had entered, was cut off and detached from all the world; and indeed most strangers on their first entrance were observed to grow extremely thoughtful, as weighing and pondering in their minds whether the upper rooms were only approachable by ladders from without; never suspecting that two of the most unassuming and unlikely doors in existence, which the most ingenious mechanic on earth must of necessity have supposed to be the doors of closets, opened out of this room—each without the smallest preparation, or so much as a quarter of an inch of passage—upon two dark winding flights of stairs, the one upward, the other downward; which were the sole means of communication between that chamber and the other portions of the house.

With all these oddities, there was not a neater, more scrupulously tidy, or more punctiliously ordered house, in Clerkenwell, in London, in all England. There were not cleaner windows, or whiter floors, or brighter stoves, or more highly shining articles of furniture in old mahogany; there was not more rubbing, scrubbing, burnishing, and polishing, in the whole street put together. Nor was this excellence attained without some cost and trouble and great expenditure of voice, as the neighbors were frequently reminded when the good lady of the house overlooked and assisted in its being put to rights on cleaning days; which were usually from Monday morning till Saturday night, both days inclusive.

Leaning against the door-post of this, his dwelling, the locksmith stood early on the morning after he had met with the wounded man, gazing disconsolately at a great wooden emblem of a key, painted in vivid yellow to resemble gold, which dangled from the house-front, and swung to and fro with a mournful creaking noise, as if complaining that it had nothing to unlock. Sometimes he looked over his shoulder into the shop, which was so dark and dingy with numerous tokens of his trade, and so blackened by the smoke of a little forge, near which his 'prentice was at work, that it would have been difficult for one unused to such espials to have distinguished anything but various tools of uncouth make and shape, great bunches of rusty keys, fragments of iron, half-finished locks, and such-like things, which garnished the walls and hung in clusters from the ceiling.

After a long and patient contemplation of the golden key, and many such backward glances, Gabriel stepped into the road, and stole a look at the upper windows. One of them chanced to be thrown open at the moment, and a roguish face met his; a face lighted up by the loveliest pair of sparkling eyes that ever locksmith looked upon; the face of a pretty laughing, girl; dimpled and fresh, and healthful—the very impersonation of good-humor and blooming beauty.

"Hush!" she whispered, bending forward, and pointing archly to the window underneath. "Mother is still asleep."

"Still, my dear?" returned the locksmith, in the same tone. "You talk as if she had been asleep all night, instead of little more than half an hour. But I'm very thankful. Sleep's a blessing—no doubt about it." The last few words he muttered to himself.

"How cruel of you to keep us up so late this morning, and never tell us where you were, or send us word!" said the girl.

"Ah Dolly, Dolly!" returned the locksmith, shaking his head, and smiling, "how cruel of you to run up stairs to bed! Come down to breakfast, madcap, and come down lightly, or you'll wake your mother. She must be tired, I am sure—I am!"

Keeping these latter words to himself, and returning his daughter's nod, he was passing into the workshop, with the smile she had awakened still beaming on his face, when he just caught sight of his 'prentice's brown paper cap ducking down to avoid observation, and shrinking from the window back to its former place, which the wearer no sooner reached than he began to hammer lustily.

"Listening again, Simon!" said Gabriel, to himself. "That's bad. What in the name of wonder does he expect the girl to say, that I always catch him listening when she speaks, and never at any other time! A bad habit, Sim, a sneaking, underhanded way. Ah! you may hammer, but you won't beat that out of me, if you work at it till your time's up!"

So saying, and shaking his head gravely, he re-entered the workshop, and confronted the subject of these remarks.

"There's enough of that just now," said the locksmith. "You need n't make any more of that confounded clatter. Breakfast's ready."

"Sir," said Sim, looking up with amazing politeness, and a peculiar little bow cut short off at the neck, "I shall attend you immediately."

"I suppose," muttered Gabriel, "that's out of the 'Prentice's Garland, or the 'Prentice's Delight, or the 'Prentice's Warbler, or the 'Prentice's Guide to the Gallows, or some such improving text-book. Now he's going to beautify himself—here's a precious locksmith!"

Quite unconscious that his master was looking on from the dark corner by the parlor door, Sim threw off the paper cap, sprang from his seat, and in two extraordinary steps, something between skating and minuet dancing, bounded to a washing place at the other end of the shop, and there removed from his face and hands all traces of his previous work—practising the same step all the time with the utmost gravity. This done, he drew from some concealed place a little scrap of looking-glass, and with its assistance arranged his hair, and ascertained the exact state of a little carbuncle on his nose. Having now completed his toilet, he placed the fragment of mirror on a low bench, and looked over his shoulder at so much of his legs as could be reflected in that small compass, with the greatest possible complacency and satisfaction.

Sim, as he was called in the locksmith's family, or Mr. Simon Tappertit, as he called himself, and required all men to style him out of doors, on holidays, and Sundays out,—was an old-fashioned, thin-faced, sleek-haired, sharp-nosed, small-eyed little fellow, very little more than five feet high, and thoroughly convinced in his own mind that he was above the middle size; rather tall, in fact, than otherwise. Of his figure, which was well enough formed, though somewhat of the leanest, he entertained the highest admiration; and with his legs, which, in knee-breeches, were perfect curiosities of littleness, he was enraptured to a degree amounting to enthusiasm. He also had some majestic, shadowy ideas, which had never been quite fathomed by his most intimate friends, concerning the power of his eye. Indeed he had been known to go so far as to boast that he could utterly quell and subdue the haughtiest beauty by a simple process, which he termed "eyeing her over;" but it must be added, that neither of this faculty, nor of the power he claimed to have, through the same gift, of vanquishing and heaving down dumb animals, even in a rabid state, had he ever furnished evidence which could be deemed quite satisfactory and conclusive.

It may be inferred from these premises, that in the small body of Mr. Tappertit there was locked up an ambitious and aspiring soul. As certain liquors confined in casks too cramped in their dimensions, will ferment, and fret, and chafe in their imprisonment, so the spiritual essence or soul of Mr. Tappertit would sometimes fume within that precious cask, his body, until, with great foam and froth and splutter, it would force a vent, and carry all before it. It was his custom to remark, in reference to any of these occasions, that his soul had got into his head; and in this novel kind of intoxication many scraps and mishaps befel him, which he had frequently concealed with no small difficulty from his worthy master.

Sim Tappertit, among the other fancies upon which his before-mentioned soul was forever feasting and regaling itself (and which fancies, like the liver of Prometheus, grew as they were fed upon), had a mighty notion of his order; and had been heard by the servant-maid openly expressing his regret that the 'prentices no longer carried clubs wherewith to mace the citizens: that was his strong expression. He was likewise reported to have said that in former times a stigma had been cast upon the body by the execution of George Barnwell, to which they should not have basely submitted, but should have demanded him of the legislature—temperately at first: then to appeal to arms, if necessary—to be dealt with as they in their wisdom should think fit. These thoughts always led him to consider what a glorious engine the 'prentices might yet become if they had but a master spirit at their head; and then he would darkly, and to the terror of his hearers, hint at certain reckless fellows that he knew of, and at a certain Lion Heart ready to become their captain, who, once afoot, would make the Lord Mayor tremble on his throne.

In respect of dress and personal decorations, Sim Tappertit was no less of an adventurous and enterprising character. He had been seen, beyond dispute, to pull off ruffles of the finest quality at the corner of the street on Sunday nights, and to put them carefully in his pockets before returning home; and it was quite notorious that on all great holiday occasions it was his habit to exchange his plain steel knee-buckles for a pair of glittering paste, under cover of a friendly post, planted most conveniently in that same spot. Add to this that he was in years just twenty, in his looks much older, and in conceit at least two hundred: that he had no objection to be jested with touching his admiration of his master's daughter; and had even, when called upon at a certain obscure tavern to pledge the lady whom he honored with his love, toasted, with many winks and leers, a fair creature, whose Christian name, he said, began with a D—;—and as much is known of Sim Tappertit, who has by this time followed the locksmith in to breakfast, as is necessary to be known in making his acquaintance.

It was a substantial meal; for over and above the ordinary tea equipage, the board creaked beneath the weight of a jolly round of beef, a ham of the first magnitude, and sundry towers of buttered Yorkshire cake, piled slice upon slice in most alluring order. There was also a goodly jug of well-browned clay, fashioned into the form of an old gentleman, not by any means unlike the locksmith, atop of whose bald head was a fine white froth answering to his wig, indicative, beyond dispute, of sparkling home-brewed ale. But better far than fair home-brewed, or Yorkshire cake, or ham, or beef, or anything to eat or drink that earth or air or water can supply, there sat, presiding over all, the locksmith's rosy daughter, before whose dark eyes even beef grew insignificant, and malt became as nothing.

Fathers should never kiss their daughters when young men are by. It's too much. There are bounds to human endurance. So thought Sim Tappertit when Gabriel drew those rosy lips to his—those lips within Sim's reach from day to day, and yet so far off. He had a respect for his master, but he wished the Yorkshire cake might choke him.

"Father," said the locksmith's daughter, when this salute was over, and they took their seats at table, "what is this I hear about last night?"

"All true, my dear; true as the Gospel, Doll."

"Young Mr. Chester robbed, and lying wounded in the road, when you came up?"

"Ay—Mr. Edward. And beside him, Barnaby, calling for help with all his might. It was well it happened as it did; for the road's a lonely one, the hour was late, and, the night being cold, and poor Barnaby even less sensible than usual from surprise and fright, the young gentleman might have met his death in a very short time."

"I dread to think of it!" cried his daughter, with a shudder. "How did you know him?"

"Know him!" returned the locksmith. "I did n't know him—how could I? I had never seen him, often as I had heard and spoken of him. I took him to Mrs. Rudge's; and she no sooner saw him than the truth came out."

"Miss Emma, father—If this news should reach her, enlarged upon as it is sure to be, she will go distracted."

"Why, lookye there again, how a man suffers for being good-natured," said the locksmith. "Miss Emma was with her uncle at the masquerade at Carlisle House, where she had gone, as the people at the Warren told me, sorely against her will. What does your blockhead father when he and Mrs. Rudge have laid their heads together, but goes there when he ought to be abed, makes interest with his friend the doorkeeper, slips him on a mask and domino, and mixes with the masquers."

"And like himself to do so!" cried the girl, putting her fair arm round his neck, and giving him a most enthusiastic kiss.

"Like himself!" repeated Gabriel, affecting to grumble, but evidently delighted with the part he had taken, and with her praise. "Very like himself—so your mother said. However, he mingled with the crowd, and prettily worried and badgered he was, I warrant you, with people squeaking, 'Don't you know me?' and 'I've found you out,' and all that kind of nonsense in his ears. He might have wandered on till now, but in a little room there was a young lady who had taken off her mask, on account of the place being very warm, and was sitting there alone."

"And that was she?" said his daughter, hastily.

"And that was she," replied the locksmith; "and I no sooner whispered to her what the matter was—as softly, Doll, and with nearly as much art as you could have used yourself—than she gives a kind of scream and faints away."

"What did you do—what happened next?" asked his daughter.

"Why, the masks came flocking round, with a general noise and hubbub, and I thought myself in luck to get clear off, that's all," rejoined the locksmith. "What happened when I reached home you may guess, if you did n't hear it. Ah! Well, it's a poor heart that never rejoices. Put Toby this way, my dear."

This Toby was the brown jug, of which previous mention has been made. Applying his lips to the worthy old gentleman's benevolent forehead, the locksmith, who had all this time been ravaging among the eatables, kept them there so long, at the same time raising the vessel slowly in the air, that at length Toby stood on his head upon his nose, when he smacked his lips, and set him on the table again with fond reluctance.

Although Sim Tappertit had taken no share in this conversation, no part of it being addressed to him, he had not been wanting in such silent manifestations of astonishment, as he deemed most compatible with the favorable display of his eyes. Regarding the pause which now ensued, as a particularly advantageous opportunity for doing great execution with them upon the locksmith's daughter (who he had no doubt was looking at him in mute admiration,) he began to screw and twist his face, and especially those features, into such extraordinary, hideous, and unparalleled contortions, that Gabriel, who happened to look toward him, was stricken with amazement.

"Why, what the devil's the matter with the lad?" cried the locksmith. "Is he choking?"

"Who?" demanded Tim, with some disdain.

"Who? why you," returned his master. "What do you mean by making those horrible faces over your breakfast?"

"Faces are matters of taste, sir," said Mr. Tappertit, rather discomfited; not the less so because he saw the locksmith's daughter smiling.

"Sim," rejoined Gabriel, laughing heartily. "Do n't be a fool, for I'd rather see you in your senses. These young fellows," he added, turning to his daughter, "are always committing some folly or another. There was a quarrel between Joe Willet and old John last night—though I can't say Joe was much in fault either. He'll be missing one of these mornings, and will have gone away upon some wild-goose errand, seeking his fortune. Why, what's the matter, Doll? You are making faces now. The girls are as bad as the boys every bit!"

"It's the tea," said Dolly, turning alternately very red and very white, which is no doubt the effect of a slight scald—"so very hot."

Mr. Tappertit looked immensely big at a quatern loaf on the table, and breathed hard.

"Is that all?" returned the locksmith. "Put some more milk in it. Yes, I am sorry for Joe, because he is a likely young fellow, and gains upon one every time one sees him. But he'll start off you'll find. Indeed he told me as much himself!"

"Indeed!" cried Dolly, in a faint voice. "In—deed!"

"Is the tea tickling your throat still, my dear?" said the locksmith.

But before his daughter could make him any answer, she was taken with a troublesome cough, and it was such a very unpleasant cough, that when she left off the tears were starting in her bright eyes. The good-natured locksmith was still patting her on the back and applying such gentle restoratives, when a message arrived from Mrs. Varden, making known to all whom it might concern, that she felt too much indisposed to rise after her great agitation and anxiety of the previous night; and therefore desired to be immediately accommodated with the little black tea-pot of strong mixed tea, a couple of rounds of buttered toast, a middling-sized dish of beef and ham cut thin, and the Protestant Manuel in two volumes post octavo. Like some other ladies who, in remote ages, flourished upon this globe, Mrs. Varden was most devout when most ill-tempered. Whenever she and her husband were at unusual variance, then the Protestant Manuel was in high feather.

Knowing from experience what these requests portended, the triumvirate broke up: Dolly to see the orders executed with all despatch; Gabriel to some out-of-door work in his little chaise; and Sim to his daily duty in the work-shop, to which retreat he carried the big look, although the loaf remained behind.

Indeed the big look increased immensely, and when he had tied his apron on quite gigantic. It was not until he had several times walked up and down with folded arms, and the longest strides he could take, and had kicked a great many small articles out of his way, that his lip began to curl. At length a gloomy derision came upon his features, and he smiled; uttering, meanwhile, with supreme contempt the monosyllable "Joe!"

"I eyed her over while he talked about the fellow," he said, "and that was of course the reason of her being confused. Joe!"

He walked up and down again much quicker than before, and if possible with longer strides; sometimes stopping to take a glance at his legs, and sometimes stopping to jerk out as it were, and cast from him, another "Joe!" In the course of a quarter an hour or so he again assumed the paper cap and tried to work. No. It could not be done.

"I'll do nothing to-day," said Mr. Tappertit, dashing it down again, "but grind. I'll grind up all the tools. Grinding will suit my prestat humor well. Joe!"

Whirr-r-r-r. The grindstone was soon in motion; the sparks were flying off in showers. This was the occupation for his heated spirit.

Whirr-r-r-r-r-r-r. "Something will come of this!" said Mr. Tappertit, pausing as if in triumph, and wiping his heated face upon his sleeve. "Something will come of this. I hope it may n't be human gore."

CHAPTER V.

As soon as the business of the day was over, the locksmith sallied forth alone to visit the wounded gentleman and ascertain the progress of his recovery. The house where he had left him was in a by street in Southwark, not far from London Bridge; and thither he hied with all speed, bent upon returning with as little delay as might be, and getting to bed betimes.

The evening was boisterous—scarcely better than the previous night had been. It was not easy for a stout man like Gabriel to keep his legs at the street corners, or to make head against the high wind; which often fairly got the better of him, and drove him back some paces, or, in defiance of all his energy, forced him to take shelter in an arch or doorway until the fury of the gust was spent. Occasionally a hat or wig, or both, came spinning and trundling past him, like a mad thing; while the more serious spectacle of falling tiles and slates, or of masses of brick and mortar, or fragments of stone-coping rattling upon the pavement near at hand, and splitting into fragments, did not increase the pleasure of the journey, or make the way less dreary.

"A trying night for a man like me to walk in!" said the locksmith, as he knocked softly at the widow's door. "I'd rather be in old John's chimney-corner, faith!"

"Who's there?" demanded a woman's voice from within. Being answered, it added a hasty word of welcome, and the door was quickly opened.

She was about forty—perhaps two or three years older—with a cheerful aspect, and a face that had once been pretty. It bore traces of affliction and care, but they were of an old date, and Time had smoothed them. Any one who had bestowed but a casual glance on Barnaby might have known that this was his mother, from the strong resemblance between them; but where in his face there was wildness and vacancy, in hers there was the patient composure of long effort and quiet resignation.

One thing about this face was very strange and startling. You could not look upon it in its most cheerful mood without feeling that it had some extraordinary capacity of expressing terror. It was not on the surface. It was in no one feature that it lingered. You could not take the eyes, or mouth, or lines upon the cheek, and say, if this or that were otherwise, it would not be so. Yet there it always lurked—something for ever dimly seen, but ever there, and never absent for a moment. It was the faintest, palest shadow of some look, to which an instant of intense and most unutterable horror only could have given birth; but indistinct and feeble as it was, it did suggest what that look must have been, and fixed it in the mind as if it had had existence in a dream.

More faintly imaged, and wanting force and purpose, as it were, because of his darkened intellect, there was this same stamp upon the son. Seen in a picture it must have had some legend with it, and would have haunted those who looked upon the canvass. They who knew the Maypole story, and could remember what the widow was, before her husband's and his master's murder, understood it well. They recollected how the change had come, and could call to mind that when her son was born, upon the very day the deed was known, he bore upon his wrist what seemed a smear of blood but half washed out.

"God save you, neighbor?" said the locksmith, as he followed her with the air of an old friend into a little parlor where a cheerful fire was burning.

"And you," she answered, smiling. "Your kind heart has brought you here again. Nothing will keep you at home, I know of old, if there are friends to serve or comfort, out of doors."

"Tut, tut," returned the locksmith, rubbing his hands and warming them. "You women are such talkers. What of the patient, neighbor?"

"He is sleeping now. He was very restless toward daylight, and for some hours tossed and tumbled sadly. But the fever has left him, and the doctor says he will soon mend. He must not be removed until to-morrow."

"He has had visitors to-day—humpf!" said Gabriel, slyly.

"Yes. Old Mr. Chester has been here ever since we sent for him, and had not been gone many minutes when you knocked."

"No ladies?" said Gabriel, elevating his eyebrows and looking disappointed.

"A letter," replied the widow.

"Come. That's better than nothing!" cried the locksmith. "Who was the bearer?"

"Barnaby, of course."

"Barnaby's a jewel!" said Varden; "and comes and goes with ease where we who think ourselves much wiser would make but a poor hand of it. He is not out wandering, again, I hope!"

"Thank Heaven he is in his bed; having been up all night, as you know, and on his feet all day. He was quite tired out. Ah, neighbor, if I could but see him oftener so—if I could but tame down that terrible restlessness—"

"In good time," said the locksmith, kindly, "in good time—don't be down-hearted. To my mind he grows wiser every day."

The widow shook her head. And yet, though she knew the locksmith sought to cheer her, and spoke from no conviction of his own, she was glad to hear even this praise of her poor benighted son.

"He will be a 'cute man yet," resumed the locksmith. "Take care, when we are growing old and foolish, Barnaby does n't put us to the blush, that's all. But our other friend," he added, looking under the table and about the floor—"sharpest and cunningest of all the sharp and cunning ones—where's he?"

"In Barnaby's room," rejoined the widow, with a faint smile.

"Ah! He's a knowing blade!" said Varden, shaking his head. "I should be sorry to talk secrets before him. Oh! he's a deep customer. I've no doubt he can read and write and cast accounts if he chooses. What was that—him tapping at the door?"

"No," returned the widow. "It was in the street, I think. Hark! Yes. There again! 'Tis some one knocking softly at the shutter. Who can it be?"

They had been speaking in a low tone, for the invalid lay overhead, and the walls and ceilings being thin and poorly built, the sound of their voices might otherwise have disturbed his slumber. The party without, whoever it was, could have stood close to the shutter without hearing anything spoken; and, seeing the light through the chinks and finding all so quiet, might have been persuaded that only one person was there.

"Some thief or ruffian, maybe," said the locksmith. "Give me the light."

"No, no," she returned, hastily. "Such visitors have never come to this poor dwelling. Do you stay here. You're within call, at the worst. I would rather go myself—alone."

"Why?" said the locksmith, unwillingly relinquishing the candle he had caught up from the table.

"Because—I don't know why—because the wish is strong upon me," she rejoined. "There again—do not detain me; I beg of you!"

Gabriel looked at her, in great surprise to see one who was usually so mild and quiet thus agitated, and with so little cause. She left the room and closed the door behind her. She stood for a moment as if hesitating, with her hand upon the lock. In this short interval the knocking came again, and a voice close to the window—a voice the locksmith seemed to recollect, and to have some disagreeable association with—whispered "Make haste."

The words were uttered in that low, distinct voice which finds its way so readily to sleepers' ears, and wakes them in a fright. For a moment it startled even the locksmith; who involuntarily drew back from the window, and listened.

The wind rumbling in the chimney made it difficult to hear what passed; but he could tell that the door was opened, that there was the tread of a man upon the creaking boards, and then a moment's silence—broken by a suppressed something which was not a shriek, or groan, or cry for help, and yet might have been either or all three; and the words "My God!" uttered in a voice it chilled him to hear.

He rushed out upon the instant. There, at last, was that dreadful look—the very one he seemed to know so well, and yet had never seen before—upon her face. There she stood, frozen to the ground, gazing with starting eyes, and livid cheeks, and every feature fixed and ghastly, upon the man he had encountered in the dark last night. His eyes met those of the locksmith. It was but a flash, an instant, a breath upon a polished glass, and he was gone.

The locksmith was upon him—had the skirts of his streaming garment almost in his grasp—when his arms were tightly clutched, and the widow flung herself upon the ground before him.

"The other way—the other way," she cried. "He went the other way. Turn—turn."

"The other way! I see him now," rejoined the locksmith, pointing—"yonder—there—there is his shadow passing by that light. What—who is this? Let me go."

"Come back, come back!" exclaimed the woman, wrestling with and clasping him; "Do not touch him on your life. I charge you, come back. He carries other lives besides his own. Come back!"

"What does this mean?" cried the locksmith.

"No matter what it means—do n't ask, do n't speak, do n't think about it. He is not to be followed, checked, or stopped. Come back!"

The old man looked at her in wonder, as she writhed and clung about him; and, borne down by her passion, suffered her to drag him into the house. It was not until she had chained and double-locked the door, fastened every bolt and bar with the heat and fury of a maniac, and drawn him back into the room, that she turned upon him once again that stony look of horror, and, sinking down into a chair, covered her face, and shuddered, as though the hand of death were on her.

CHAPTER VI.

Beyond all measure astonished by the strange occurrences which had passed with so much violence and rapidity, the locksmith gazed upon the shuddering figure in the chair like one half stupified, and would have gazed much longer, had not his tongue been loosened by compassion and humanity.

"You are ill," said Gabriel. "Let me call some neighbor in."

"Not for the world," she rejoined, motioning to him with her trembling hand, and still holding her face averted. "It is enough that you have been by to see this."

"Nay, more than enough—or less," said Gabriel.

"Be it so," she returned. "As you like. Ask me no questions, I entreat you."

"Neighbor," said the locksmith, after a pause. "Is this fair, or reasonable, or just to yourself? Is it like you, who have known me so long and sought my advice in all matters—like you, who from a girl have had a strong mind and a staunch heart?"

"I have had need of them," she replied. "I am growing old, both in years and care. Perhaps that, and too much trial, have made them weaker than they used to be. Do not speak to me."

"How can I see what I have seen, and hold my peace?" returned the locksmith. "Who was that man, and why has his coming made this change in you?"

She was silent, but clung to the chair as though to save herself from falling to the ground.

"I take the license of an old acquaintance, Mary," said the locksmith, "who has ever had a warm regard for you, and may be has tried to prove it when he could. Who is this ill-favored man, and what has he to do with you? Who is this ghost, that is only seen in the black nights and bad weather? How does he know, and why does he haunt this house, whispering through chinks and crevices, as if there was that between him and you, which neither durst so much as speak aloud of? Who is he?"

"You do well to say he haunts this house," returned the widow faintly. "His shadow has been upon it and me, in light and darkness, at noonday and midnight. And now, at last, he has come in the body!"

"But he would n't have gone in the body," returned the locksmith with some irritation, "if you had left my arms and legs at liberty. What riddle is this?"

"It is one," she answered, rising as she spoke, "that must remain for ever as it is. I dare not say more than that."

"Dare not!" repeated the wondering locksmith.

"Do not press me," she replied. "I am sick and faint, and every faculty of life seems dead within me. No!—Do not touch me, either."

Gabriel, who had stepped forward to render her assistance, fell back as she made this hasty exclamation, and regarded her in silent wonder.

"Let me go my way alone," she said in a low voice, "and let the hands of no honest man touch mine to-night." When she had tottered to the door, she turned, and added with a stronger effort, "This is a secret which, of necessity, I trust to you. You are a true man. As you have ever been good and kind to me—keep it. If any noise was heard above, make some excuse—say any thing but what you really saw, and never let a word or look between us, recal this circumstance. I trust to you. Mind, I trust to you. How much I trust, you never can conceive."

Fixing her eyes upon him for an instant, she withdrew, and left him there alone.

Gabriel, not knowing what to think, stood staring at the door with a countenance full of surprise and dismay. The more he pondered on what had passed, the less able he was to give it any favorable interpretation. To find this widow woman, whose life for so many years had been supposed to be one of solitude and retirement, and who, in her quiet suffering character, had gained the good opinion and respect of all who knew her—to find her linked mysteriously with an ill-omened man, alarmed at her appearance, and yet favoring his escape, was a discovery that pained as much as it started him. Her reliance on his secrecy, and his tacit acquiescence, increased his distress of mind. If he had spoken boldly, persisted in questioning her, detained her when she rose to leave the room, made any kind of protest, instead of silently comprehending himself, as he felt he had done, he would have been more at ease.

"Why did I let her say it was a secret, and she trusted it to me!" said Gabriel, putting his wig on one side to scratch his head with greater ease, and looking ruefully at the fire. "I have no more readiness than old John himself. Why did n't I say firmly, 'You have no right to such secrets, and I demand of you to tell me what this means,' instead of standing gaping at her, like an old mooncalf as I am! But there's my weakness. I can be obstinate enough with men if need be, but women may twist me round their fingers at their pleasure."

He took his wig off outright as he made this reflection, and warming his handkerchief at the fire began to rub and polish his bald head with it, until it glistened again.

"And yet," said the locksmith, softening under this soothing process, and stopping to smile, "It may be nothing.—Any drunken brawler trying to make his way into the house, would have alarmed a quiet soul like her. But then"—and here was the vexation—"how it came to be that man—how comes he to have this influence over her; how came she to favor his getting away from me; and more than all, how came she not to say it was a sudden fright, and nothing more? It's a sad thing to have, in one minute, reason to mistrust a person I have known so long, and an old sweetheart into the bargain; but what else can I do, with all this upon my mind!—Is that Barnaby outside there?"

"Ay!" he cried, looking in and nodding. "Sure enough it's Barnaby—how did you guess?"

"By your shadow," said the locksmith.

"Oho!" cried Barnaby, glancing over his shoulder, "He's a merry fellow, that shadow, and keeps close to me, though I am silly. We have such pranks, such walks, such runs, such gambols on the grass. Sometimes he'll be half as tall as a church steeple, and sometimes no bigger than a dwarf. Now he goes on before, and now behind, and anon he'll be stealing slyly on, on this side, or on that, stopping whenever I stop, and thinking I can't see him, though I have my eye on him sharp enough. Oh! he's a merry fellow. Tell me—is he silly too? I think he is."

"Why?" asked Gabriel.

"Because he never tires of mocking me, but does it all day long. Why don't you come?"

"Where?"

"Up stairs. He wants you. Stay—where's his shadow? Come. You're a wise man; tell me that."

"Beside him, Barnaby; beside him, I suppose," returned the locksmith.

"No!" he replied, shaking his head. "Guess again."

"Gone out a walking, maybe?"

"He has changed shadows with a woman," the idiot whispered in his ear, and then fell back with a look of triumph. "Her shadow's always with him, and his with her. That's sport I think, eh?"

"Barnaby," said the locksmith, with a grave look; "come hither, lad."

"I know what you want to say. I know!" he replied, keeping away from him. "But I'm cunning, I'm silent. I only say so much to you—are you ready?" As he spoke, he caught up the light, and waved it with a wild laugh above his head.

"Softly—gently," said the locksmith, exerting all his influence to keep him calm and quiet. "I thought you had been asleep."

"So I have been asleep," he rejoined, with widely-opened eyes. "There have been great faces coming and going—close to my face, and then a mile away—low places to creep through, whether I would or no—high churches to fall down from—strange creatures crowded up together neck and heels, to sit upon the bed—that's sleep, eh?"

"Dreams, Barnaby, dreams," said the locksmith.

"Dreams?" he echoed softly, drawing close to him.

"Those are not dreams."

"What are," replied the locksmith, "if they are not?"

"I dreamed," said Barnaby, passing his arm through Vardon's and peering close into his face as he answered in a whisper, "I dreamed just now that something—it was in the shape of a man—followed me—came softly after me—wouldn't let me be—but was always hiding and crouching, like a cat in dark corners, waiting till I should pass; when it crept out and came softly after me. Did you ever see me run?"

"Many a time, you know."

"You never saw me run as I did in this dream. Still it came creeping on to worry me. Nearer, nearer, nearer—I ran faster—leaped—sprung out of bed, and to the window—and there, in the street below—but he is waiting for us. Are you coming?"

"What in the street below, dear Barnaby?" said Vardon, imagining that he traced some connection between this vision and what had actually occurred.

Barnaby looked into his face, muttered incoherently, waved the light above his head again, laughed, and drawing the locksmith's arm more tightly through his own, led him up the stairs in silence.

They entered a homely bed-chamber, garnished in a scanty way with chairs whose spindle-shanks bespoke their age, and other furniture of very little worth, but clean and neatly kept. Reclining in an easy chair before the fire, pale and weak from waste of blood, was Edward Chester, the young gentleman that had been the first to quit the Maypole on the previous night, who, extending his hand to the locksmith, welcomed him as his preserver and friend.

"Say no more, sir, say no more," said Gabriel. "I hope I would have done at least as much for any man in such a strait, and most of all for you, sir. A certain young lady," he added, with some hesitation, "has done us many a kind turn, and we naturally feel—I hope I give you no offence in saying this, sir?"

The young man smiled and shook his head, at the same time moving in his chair as if in pain.

"It's no great matter," he said, in answering to the locksmith's sympathising look, "a mere uneasiness arising at least as much from being cooped up here as from the slight wound I have, or from the loss of blood. Be seated, Mr. Vardon."

"If I may make so bold, Mr. Edward, as to lean upon your chair," returned the locksmith, accommodating his action to his speech, and bending over him, "I'll stand here, for the convenience of speaking low. Barnaby is not in his quietest humor to-night, and at such times talking never does him good."

They both glanced at the subject of this remark, who had taken a seat on the other side of the fire, and, smiling, vacantly, was making puzzles on his fingers, with a skein of string.

"Pray, tell me, sir," said Vardon, dropping his voice still lower, "exactly what happened last night. I have my reasons for inquiring. You left the Maypole alone?"

"And walked home alone until I had nearly reached the place where you found me, when I heard the gallop of a horse."

"—Behind you?" said the locksmith.

"Indeed, yes—behind me. It was a single rider, who soon overtook me, and checking his horse, inquired the way to London."

"You were on the alert, sir, knowing how many highwaymen there are, scouring the roads in all directions?" said Vardon.

"I was, but I had only a stick, having imprudently left my pistols in the holster-case, with the landlord's son. I directed him as he desired. Before the words had passed my lips, he rode upon me, furiously, as if bent on trampling me down beneath his horse's hoofs. In starting aside I slipped and fell. You found me with this stab and an ugly bruise or two, and without my purse—in which he found little enough for his pains. And now, Mr. Vardon," he added, shaking the locksmith by the hand, "saving the extent of my gratitude to you, you know as much as I."

"Except," said Gabriel, bending down yet more, and looking cautiously toward their silent neighbor, "except in respect of the robber himself. What like was he, sir? Speak low, if you please. Barnaby means no harm; but I have watched him oftener than you, and I know, little as you would think it, that he's listening now."

It required a strong confidence in the locksmith's veracity to lead any one to this belief, for every sense and faculty that Barnaby possessed, seemed to be fixed upon his game, to the exclusion of all other things. Something in the young man's face expressed this opinion, for Gabriel repeated what he had just said, more earnestly than before, and with another glance towards Barnaby, again asked what like the man was.

"The night was so dark," said Edward, "the attack so sudden, and he so wrapped and muffled up that I can hardly say. It seems that—"

"Do not mention his name, sir," returned the locksmith, following his look toward Barnaby; I know he saw him. I want to know what you saw."

"All I remember is," said Edward, "that as he checked his horse his hat was blown off. He caught it and replaced it on his head, which I observed was bound with a dark handkerchief. A stranger entered the Maypole while I was there, whom I had not seen, for I set apart for reasons of my own, and when I rose to leave the room and glanced round, he was in the shadow of the chimney, and hidden from my sight. But if he and the robber were two different persons, their voices were strangely and most remarkably alike; for directly the man addressed me in the road, I recognised his speech again."

"It is as I feared. The very man was here to-night," thought the locksmith, changing color. "What dark history is this?"

"Halloa!" cried a hoarse voice in his ear. "Halloa, halloa, halloa! Bow wow wow. What's the matter here! Hal-loa!"

The speaker—who made the locksmith start, as if he had been some supernatural agent—was a large raven; who had perched upon the top of the easy-chair, unseen by him and Edward, and listened with a polite attention and a most extraordinary appearance of comprehending every word, to all they had said up to this point; turning his head from one to the other, as if his office were to judge between them, and it were of the very last importance that he should not lose a word.

"Look at him!" said Vardon, divided between admiration of the bird and a kind of fear of him. "Was there ever such a knowing imp as that. Oh, he's a dreadful fellow!"

The raven, with his head very much on one side, and his bright eye shining like a diamond, preserved a thoughtful silence for a few seconds, and then replied in a voice so hoarse and distant, that it seemed to come through his thick features rather than out of his mouth.

"Halloa, halloa, halloa! What's the matter here! Keep up your spirits. Never say die. Bow wow wow. I'm a devil, I'm a devil, I'm a devil. Hurrah!" And then, as if exulting in his infernal character, he began to whistle.

"I more than half believe he speaks the truth. Upon my word I do," said Vardon. "Do you see how he looks at me, as if he knew what I was saying?"

To which the bird, balancing himself on tiptoe, as it were, and moving his body up and down in a sort of grave dance, rejoined, "I'm a devil, I'm a devil, I'm a devil," and flapped his wings against his sides as if he were bursting with laughter. Barnaby clapped his hands, and fairly rolled upon the ground in an ecstasy of delight.

"Strange companions, sir," said the locksmith, shaking his head and looking from one to the other. "The bird has all the wit."

"Strange indeed!" said Edward, holding out his forefinger to the raven, who, in the acknowledgement of the attention, made a dive at it immediately with his iron bill.

"Is he old?"

"A mere boy, sir," replied the locksmith. "A hundred and twenty, or thereabouts. Call him down, Barnaby my man."

"Call him," echoed Barnaby, sitting upright upon the floor, and staring vacantly at Gabriel, as he thrust his hair back from his face. "But who can make him come! He calls me, and makes me go where he will. He goes on before, and I follow. He's the master, and I'm the man. Is that the truth, Grip?"

The raven gave a short, comfortable, confidential kind of croak—a most expressive croak, which seemed to say, "You need not let these fellows into our secrets. We understand each other. It's all right."

"I make him come!" cried Barnaby, pointing to the bird. "Him, who never goes to sleep, or so much as winks! Why, any time of night, you may see his eyes in my dark room, shining like two snakes. And every night, and all night too, he's broad awake, talking to himself, thinking what he shall do to-morrow, where we shall go, and what he shall steal, and hide, and bury. I make him come! Ha, ha, ha!"

On second thoughts, the bird appeared disposed to come of himself. After a short survey of the ground, and a few sidelong looks at the ceiling and at everybody present in turn, he fluttered to the floor, and went to Barnaby—not in a hop or walk, or run, but in a pace like that of a very particular gentleman with exceedingly tight boots on, trying to walk fast over loose pebbles. Then, stepping into his extended hand, and condescending to be held out at arm's length, he gave vent to a succession of sounds, not unlike the drawing of some eight or ten dozen of long corks, and again asserted his brimstone birth and parentage with great distinctness.

The locksmith shook his head—perhaps in some doubt of the creature's being really nothing but a bird—perhaps in pity for Barnaby, who by this time had him in his arms, and was rolling about with him on the ground. As he raised his eyes from the poor fellow he encountered those of his mother, who had entered the room and was looking on in silence.

She was quite white in the face, even to her lips, but had wholly subdued her emotion, and wore her usual quiet look. Vardon fancied as he glanced at her that she shrunk from his eye; and that she busied herself about the wounded gentleman to avoid him the better.

It was time he went to bed, she said. He was to be removed to his own home on the morrow, and he had already exceeded his time for sitting up, by a full hour. Acting on this hint, the locksmith prepared to take his leave.

"By the bye," said Edward, as he shook him by the hand, and looked from him to Mrs. Rudge and back again, "what noise was that below? I heard your voice in the midst of it, and should have inquired before, but our other conversation drove it from my memory. What was it?"

The locksmith looked toward her, and bit his lip. She leant against the chair, and bent her eyes upon the ground. Barnaby too—he was listening.

"Some mad or drunken fellow, sir," Vardon at length made answer, looking steadily at the window as he spoke. "He mistook the house, and tried to force an entrance."

She breathed more freely, but stood quite motionless. As the locksmith said "Good night," and Barnaby caught up the candle to light him down the stairs, she took it from him, and charged him—with more haste and earnestness than so slight an occasion appeared to warrant—not to stir. The raven followed them to satisfy himself that all was right below, and when they reached the street door stood on the bottom stair, drawing corks out of number.

With a trembling hand she unfastened the chain and bolts, and turned the key. As she had her hand upon the latch, the locksmith said in a low voice.

"I have told a lie to-night, for your sake, Mary, and for the sake of by-gone times and old acquaintances, when I would scorn to do so for my own. I hope I may have done no harm, or led to none. I can't help the suspicions you have forced upon me, and I am loath, I tell you plainly, to leave Mr. Edward here. Take care he comes to no hurt. I doubt the safety of this roof, and am glad he leaves it so soon. Now, let me go."

For a moment she had her face in her hands and wept; but resisting the strong impulse which evidently moved her to reply, opened the door—no wider than was sufficient for the passage of his body—and motioned him away. As the locksmith stood upon the step, it was chained and locked behind him, and the raven, in furtherance of these precautions, barked like a lusty house-dog.

"In league with that ill-looking figure that might have fallen from a gibbet—he listening and hiding here—Barnaby first upon the spot last night—can she who has always borne so fair a name be guilty of such crimes in secret!" said the locksmith, musing. "Heaven forgive me if I am wrong, and send me just thoughts; but she is poor, the temptation may be great, and we daily hear of things as strange. Ay, bark away, my friend. If there is any wickedness going on, that raven's in it, I'll be sworn."

CHAPTER VII.

Mrs. Varden was a lady of what is commonly called an uncertain temper—a phrase which being interpreted signifies a temper tolerably certain to make every body more or less uncomfortable. Thus it generally happened, that when other people were merry, Mrs. Varden was dull; and that when other people were dull, Mrs. Varden was disposed to be amazingly cheerful. Indeed the worthy housewife was of such a capricious nature, that she not only attained a higher pitch of genius than Macbeth, in respect of her ability to be wise, amazed, temperate and furious, loyal and neutral in an instant, but would sometimes ring the changes backward and forward on all possible moods and flights in one short quarter of an hour; performing, as it were, a kind of triple bob major on the peal of instruments in the female belfry, with a skillfulness and rapidity of execution that astonished all who heard her.

It has been observed in this good lady (who did not want for personal attractions, being plump and buxom to look at, though like her fair daughter, somewhat short in stature,) that this uncertainty of disposition strengthened and increased with her temporal prosperity; and divers wise men and matrons, on friendly terms with the locksmith and his family, even went so far as to assert, that a tumble down some half-dozen rounds in the world's ladder—such as the breaking of the bank in which her husband kept his money, or some little fall of that kind—would be the making of her, and could hardly fail to render her one of the most agreeable companions in existence. Whether they were right or wrong in this conjecture, certain it is that minds, like hodies, will often fall into a pimpled, ill-conditioned state from mere excess of comfort, and like them, are often successfully cured by remedies in themselves very nauseous and unpalatable.

Mrs. Varden's chief aider and abettor, and at the same time her principal victim and object of wrath, was her single domestic servant, one Miss Miggs; or—as she was called in conformity with those prejudices of society which lop and top from poor handmaidens all such genteel excrescences—Miggs. This Miggs was a tall young lady, very much addicted to patterns in private life; slender and shrewish, of a rather uncomfortable figure, and though not absolutely ill-looking, of a sharp and acid visage. As a general principle and abstract proposition, Miggs held the male sex to be utterly contemptible and unworthy of notice; to be fickle, false, base, seditious, inclined to perjury, and wholly undeserving. When most exasperated against them (which, slander said, was when Sim Tappertit alighted her most,) she was accustomed to wish with great emphasis, that the whole race of women could but die off, in order that the men might be brought to know the real value of the blessings by which they set so little store; nay, her feeling for her order ran so high, that she sometimes declared, if she could only have good security for a fair, round number—say ten thousand—of young virgins following her example, she would, to spite mankind, hang, drown, stab, or poison herself, with a joy past all expression. It was the voice of Miggs that greeted the locksmith, when he knocked at his own house, with a shrill cry of "Who's there?"

"Me, gill, me," returned Gabriel.

"What, already, sir!" said Miggs, opening the door with a look of surprise. "We are just getting on our night-caps to sit up,—me and mistress. Oh, she has been so bad!"

Miggs said this with an air of uncommon candor and concern; but the parlor door was standing open, and as Gabriel very well knew for whose ears it was designed, he regarded her with anything but in approving looks as he passed in.

"Master's come home, man," cried Miggs, running before him into the parlor. "You was wrong, mim, and I was right. I thought he would n't keep us up so late, two nights running, mim. Master's always considerate so far. I'm so glad, mim, on your account. I'm a little"—here Miggs yawned—"a little sleepy myself; I'll own it now, mim, though I said I was n't when you asked me. It ain't of no consequence, mim, of course."

"You had better," said the locksmith, who most devoutly wished that Barnaby's raven was at Miggs' ankle, "you had better go to bed at once then."

"Thanking you kindly, sir," returned Miggs, "I could n't take my rest in peace, nor fix my thoughts upon my prayers, otherways than that I knew mistress was comfortable in her bed this night; by rights she should have been there, hours ago."

"You're talkative, mistress," said Vardon, pulling off his great-coat, and looking at her askew.

"Taking the hint sir," cried Miggs, with a flushed face, "and thanking you for it most kindly, I will make bold to say, that if I give offense by having consideration for my mistress, I do not ask your pardon, but am content to get myself into trouble, and to be in suffering."

Here Mrs. Vardon, who, with her countenance shrouded in a large night-cap, had been all this time intent upon the Protestant Manuel, looked round, and acknowledged Miggs' championship by commanding her to hold her tongue.

Every little bone in Miggs's throat and neck developed itself with a spitefulness quite alarming, as she replied, "Yes, mim, I will."

"How do you find yourself now, my dear?" said the locksmith, taking a chair near his wife (who had resumed her book,) and rubbing his knees hard as he made the inquiry.

"You're very anxious to know, a'n't you?" returned Mrs. Vardon, with her eyes upon the print. "You, that have not been near me all day, and would n't have been if I was dying!"

"My dear Martha," said Gabriel.

Mrs. Vardon turned over the next page; then went back again to the bottom line over the leaf to be quite sure of the last words; and then went on reading with an appearance of the deepest interest and study.

"My dear Martha," said the locksmith, "how can you say such things, when you know you don't mean them?—If you were dying! Why, if there was any thing serious the matter with you, Martha, shouldn't I be in constant attendance upon you?"

"Yes!" cried Mrs. Vardon, bursting into tears, "yes, you would. I don't doubt it, Vardon. Certainly you would. That's as much as to tell me that you would be hovering round me like a vulture, waiting till the breath was out of my body, that you might go and marry somebody else."

Miggs groaned in sympathy—a little short groan, checked in its birth, and changed into a cough. It seemed to say, "I can't help it.—It's wrong from me by the dreadful brutality of that monster master."

"But you'll break my heart one of these days," added Mrs. Vardon, with more resignation, "and then we shall both be happy. My only desire is to see Dolly comfortably settled, and when she is you may settle me as soon as you like."

"Ah!" cried Miggs—and coughed again.

Poor Gabriel twisted his wig about in silence for a long time, and then said mildly, "Has Dolly gone to bed?"

"Your master speaks to you," said Mrs. Vardon, looking sternly over her shoulder at Miss Miggs in waiting.

"No, my dear, I spoke to you," suggested the locksmith.

"Did you hear me, Miggs?" cried the obdurate lady, stamping her foot upon the ground. "You are beginning to despise me now, are you? But this is example!"

At this cruel rebuke, Miggs, whose tears were always ready, for large or small parties, on the shortest notice, and the most unreasonable terms, fell a crying violently; holding both her hands upon her heart meanwhile, as if nothing less would prevent its splitting into small fragments. Mrs. Vardon, who likewise possessed that faculty in high perfection, wept too, against Miggs; and with such effect that Miggs gave in after a time, and, except for an occasional sob, which seemed to threaten some remote intention of breaking out again, left her mistress in possession of the field. Her superiority being thoroughly asserted, that lady soon desisted likewise, and fell into a quiet melancholy.

The relief was so great, and the fatiguing occurrences of last night so completely overpowered the locksmith, that he nodded in his chair, and would doubtless have slept there all night, but for the voice of Mrs. Vardon, which, after a pause of some five minutes, awoke him with a start.

"If I am ever," said Mrs. V.—not scolding, but in a sort of monotonous remonstrance—"in spirits, if I am ever cheerful, if I am ever more than usually disposed to be talkative and comfortable, this is the way I am treated."

"Such comforts as you was in too, mim, but half an hour ago!" cried Miggs. "I never see such company."

"Because," said Mr. Vardon, "because I never interfere or interrupt; because I never question where anybody comes or goes; because my whole mind and soul is bent on saving where I can save, and laboring in this house—therefore, they try me as they do."

"Martha," urged the locksmith, endeavoring to look as wakeful as possible, "what is it you complain of? I really came home with every wish and desire to be happy. I did, indeed."

"What do I complain of?" retorted his wife. "Is it a chilling thing to have one's husband sulking and falling asleep directly he comes home—to have him freezing all one's warm-heartedness, and throwing cold water over the fire-side? Is it natural, when I know he went out upon a matter in which I am as much interested as anybody can be, that I should wish to know all that has happened, or that he should tell me without my begging and praying him to do it? Is that natural, or is it not?"

"I am very sorry, Martha," said the good-natured locksmith. "I was really afraid you were not disposed to talk pleasantly; I'll tell you everything; I shall only be too glad, my dear."

"No, Vardon," returned his wife, rising with dignity. "I dare say—thank you. I'm not a child to be corrected one minute and petted the next—I'm a little too old for that, Vardon. Miggs, carry the light. You can be cheerful, Miggs, at least."

Miggs, who to this moment, had been in the very depths of compassionate despondency, passed instantly into the liveliest state conceivable, and, tossing her head as she glanced towards the locksmith, bore off her mistress and the light together.

"Now, who would think," thought Vardon, shrugging his shoulders and drawing his chair near to the fire, "that that woman could ever be pleasant and agreeable? And yet she can be. Well, well, all of us have our faults. I'll not be hard upon hers. We have been man and wife too long for that."

He dozed again—not the less pleasantly, perhaps, for his hearty temper. While his eyes were closed, the door leading to the upper stairs was partially opened; and a head appeared, which, at sight of him, hastily drew back again.

"I wish," murmured Gabriel, waking at the noise, and looking round the room, "I wish somebody would marry Miggs. But that's impossible! I wonder whether there's any madman alive, who would marry Miggs!"

This was such a vast speculation that he fell into a doze again, and slept until the fire was quite burned out. At last he roused himself; and having double-locked the street-door according to custom, and put the key in his pocket, went off to bed.

He had not left the room in darkness many minutes, when the head again appeared, and Sim Tappertitt entered, bearing in his hand a little lamp.

"What the devil business has he to stop up so late!" muttered Sim, passing into the workshop, and setting it down upon the forge. "Here's half the night gone already.—There's only one good that has ever come to me, out of this cursed old rusty mechanical trade, and that's this piece of ironmongery, upon my soul!"

As he spoke, he drew from the right hand, or rather right leg pocket of his smalls, a clumsy, large-sized key, which he inserted cautiously in the lock his master had secured, and softly opened the door. That done, he replaced his piece of secret workmanship in his pocket; and leaving the lamp burning, and closing the door carefully and without noise, stole out into the street—as little suspected by the locksmith in his sound deep sleep, as by Barnaby himself in his phantom-haunted dreams.

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1841.

CASE OF THE STEAMBOAT HOME.*

The case of the Home, last week decided in the Superior Court of this city by the verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiff, has excited a far greater attention among our citizens, than is usually accorded to any civil proceeding in our Courts; however great the magnitude of the cause, and however distinguished in ability the advocates employed in it. The melancholy circumstances, attending the loss of the steam-packet Home, in the fall of the year 1837, have not yet faded from our memories—and this cause, concerned as it is merely with the pecuniary responsibility of the insurers, seems to have revived those circumstances in all their original power. The heavy imputations—cast during the just fervor of the public excitement, upon the character of the vessel, her builders, owner, master and all connected, however remotely, with her, and the bold uncompromising manner in which all such charges were repelled, have occasioned in the public a pathetic curiosity to hear the judicial investigation of all the circumstances of the disaster, and the solemn decision of an intelligent jury upon the truth of all such imputations. The Court room has been thronged from morning till night, through the eight days which the trial of this arduous cause has occupied, and that equally during the protracted examination of some sixty witnesses, and the eloquent arguments of the four advocates of varied and singular ability who summed up to the jury. A concise statement of the history of the Home and the circumstances of her fate, as drawn from the testimony of witnesses, and a brief exposition of the legal points involved in the case, may not be uninteresting to our readers.

Early in the year 1835, James P. Allaire applied to Brown & Bell, a shipbuilding firm in this city of the highest reputation, to build him a steamboat for sea-service, of the following dimensions of model: 209 feet long, 23½ wide, and 12½ depth of hold, requesting them to make their estimates and name their price. The sum for the construction of a boat of such dimensions, and of the best materials and workmanship, required by Messrs. Brown & Bell, was $20,000. Mr. Allaire agreed to pay this sum, and with the exception of stipulating for the above dimensions, gave no directions as to her construction. Her keel was laid in May 1835—she was launched April 20th, 1836—her machinery was then put in her, she was named the Home, and was ready for sea by the summer of 1837. The entire cost of the Home ready for sea, had been one hundred thousand dollars and more, and Mr. Allaire, was obliged to aid his own resources by a loan from a Wall street capitalist to the amount of $40,000, giving as security a bill of sale of the whole vessel, and effecting insurance in four offices of this city, to the amount of $25,000: assigning to his creditor his policies as collateral. The insurance in the American was for $10,000, at 8 per cent premium, from New York to New Orleans or intermediate ports, for one year, with liberty to reclaim premium pro rata for time not used.

Early in September the Home went upon her first trip to Charleston, S. C., the route for which, in the mind of her owner she had been destined. She encountered rough and stormy but not very violent weather, and sustained some little injury in her joiner's work. There was a good deal of evidence to show that she behaved very ill under the storm; that she complained very much, sprung, bent and twisted in a very unusual manner, and impressed many on board of her with an opinion that she was entirely unfit for the route, on which she was running.

She returned to New York and made one outward and return trip more, (during which the sea and weather were so tranquil as to try her strength in no degree,) before she departed from this port on her last voyage.

She left her berth in this harbor for the last time at 4 o'clock P. M. of Saturday the 7th October, 1837. The weather was perfectly serene. The season of the year supplied to her a large number of passengers from the refined and wealthy families which visit the North in the summer. Eighty cabin passengers and forty crew were all the lives on board. She met with an accident within two hours after leaving the wharf, thought of at the time only as a vexatious delay, but pregnant with most disastrous results. In the lower bay, two miles north of Sandy Hook, she grounded on the Romer shoals. She had no pilot on board; her captain was below deck for a moment, and the wheel in the hands of a deck hand who was an experienced steersman. The ebbing tide detained her on the soft sandy bottom of the shoal for five hours. That five hours well employed would have carried her beyond the violence of the storm, or at least brought her to a portion of the coast where she could have made a port. She experienced not the slightest injury from the accident, and left the shoal at about 11 o'clock that evening.

On Sunday, at noon, the wind rose and the storm commenced, which continued till it caused her loss. On Monday it blew a gale, and there was a heavy sea. The feeder pipe broke, and produced the stoppage of one boiler and much delay; it was repaired and the vessel proceeded. At three o'clock, P. M., she sprung a leak when off Cape Hatteras, the most dangerous point in our coast navigation. The engine and hand-pumps were plied. Finally the crew and passengers, both men and women, commenced bailing with buckets, but the leak gained on them. Having succeeded in clearing Hatteras, the captain altered the course of the boat, and hauled up to land, hoping to get under the lee of the shoal in a smooth sea, repair and proceed. The leak continued to increase rapidly, and at 8 o'clock P. M. it had extinguished the fires. The engines being now useless, the sails, the only resource left, were set; but the hope of getting under the lee of Hatteras was soon abandoned, and as the leak still increased, the only expedient, in the judgment of the captain and the opinion of all on board, promising safety to their lives, was to run the boat ashore. She drove before the wind with all sails set, and about 11 o'clock in the evening struck her bows straight upon the outer bar, passed over the bar as far as amid-ships, and there rested with both extremities in deep water. She thus lay at the distance of 300 or 400 yards from the main shore until she listed to sea, exposing her deck to the fury of the storm. The breakers thus had a clean sweep over her from stern to stern, and the first, of unusual violence, stove in the dining cabin aft on deck. Piece after piece of the upper works was now carried away, with the men and women upon them—submerged by tens and twenties. Of the eighty passengers 18 men and 2 women survived the catastrophe; and of the crew 19 were saved.

Out of this loss the action against the American Insurance Company to recover the insurance money arose. It was commenced in February, 1838, but its trial has been delayed by the plaintiff, for one reason and another, till the present term of the Court. The defence rested entirely upon the unseaworthiness of the boat, though it assumed three aspects in the course of the trial.

Seaworthiness is an explicit warranty in every instance of Marine Insurance, and its existence in the ship insured at the time of insurance is a condition precedent to the attaching of the policy. Seaworthiness means ability to withstand the ordinary perils of the sea, and the risk of these ordinary perils the insurance does not undertake to assume. The contract of insurance is only to indemnify the assured against the extraordinary perils of the seas. Seaworthiness is a matter of fact not of opinion. The honest confidence of the builder and owner in the vessel, the deliberate approbation of the Insurance Company expressed through their inspector or other authorized agent, may all be evidence of her seaworthiness, but are not conclusive upon either party. An universal mistake of all interested shows the bona fides of the contract but renders it void and the misfortune of the mistake falls upon the assured—Res perit domino.

With these plain stern rules of law before them, the single point for the decision of the jury was, as to the fact of the seaworthiness.

It was urged, upon the parts of the defendants, that the very shape and model of the vessel showed her to be unfit for navigation on so dangerous a route; and they introduced much evidence relative to the just theoretic proportions of a sea-steamer, and many opinions of practical men on this point. They next argued from the unsatisfactory behavior of the boat upon her first voyage, exposed to only moderately rough weather, (i. e., the ordinary perils of the sea,) that she was at the outset unseaworthy; and further, that the injuries received on this first trip were unrepaired before her fatal voyage, and this again rendered her unseaworthy. That the want of a pilot, and her grounding, and the consequent delay, all released the Company; and finally, that she perished in only an ordinary storm; that she succumbed to its influence, from her own inherent weakness, and not from its overwhelming power. On each of these points many witnesses were examined and long and eloquent arguments based.

The force of these objections was skilfully repelled by the plaintiff's counsel. They adduced much evidence of high character to show the perfect soundness of the boat, that she behaved on her first voyage as well as any vessel could; that the ill opinion of her strength rose from the ignorant fears of landmen; that she received but trivial injuries on such voyage, and that those were repaired; that there was no usage for seagoing steamboats to take a pilot; that the grounding produced no actual injury, and that the delay was too remote a consideration to enter into the subsequent loss; and finally, that she fell a victim to the irresistible power of a terrible storm, an extraordinary peril of the sea, the very fate against which the Company had undertaken to indemnify; and that it was no imputation on a vessel's strength that, "framed only of live oak from the forest, and fastened only with wrought iron from the mine, she could not cope with Omnipotence."

The Judge in his charge almost entirely omitted the important part of his duty, that of arranging the mass of evidence, purging it from the false coloring in which the ingenuity and interest of either party may have invested it, and analysing it, with a view to enable the jury, unaccustomed to adjust conflicting evidence, to give to each matter its due and only its due force. On the law he displayed his usual accuracy and perspicuity. He directed them to find for the company if they were satisfied that the boat was originally unfit for the navigation which she undertook to perform—or if they thought she sustained in her first voyage injuries affecting her strength, and that such injuries were not repaired when they might have been—or if they thought it an usage for seagoing steamers to take pilots, and that actual, immediate injury followed from the grounding in consequence of such neglect—or if they thought she was finally wrecked from her own weakness and not from the violence of the storm—but if on all these points they were of the contrary opinion, then for the plaintiff.

The cause was submitted to the Jury at 9 o'clock Monday night of last week. They were together only fifteen minutes, before they prepared a sealed verdict. When opened on the coming in of the Court on Tuesday morning it was found to be in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount claimed. The counsel for the defendants polled the jury.

The result of the cause, notwithstanding the deep sympathy with the sufferers in the disaster and the loud denunciations upon all connected in responsibility with the ill-fated vessel which followed her loss, has occasioned general satisfaction.

Exceptions were taken during the progress of the trial on points of evidence, and at its close to the directions of the Judge. Whether they will be insisted upon and the questions carried up has not yet transpired.

J. FENNIMORE COOPER.—This gentleman has published a long communication in the Evening Post, in reply to Mr. Barber's letter to Col. Webb, to which letter we made reference a few days ago. Mr. Cooper cares nothing about public opinion or newspaper opinion—the one being a mere echo of distinctive English thought, and the other a thing of no consideration among the English nobility. But some how or other he is always appealing to public opinion and wincing under newspaper opinion. For ourselves, we are "a plain, blunt man," and do not understand these discrepancies.

The concluding paragraph of Mr. Cooper's communication is especially forcible and not a little appalling. We suppose that he squints ominously toward ourselves, and we therefore place it before our eyes for our future government:

One word more. Nothing is plainer than the fact that very many persons connected with the press entertain very false and exaggerated notions of its immunities. They evidently think they have a right to calumniate their fellow citizens at pleasure. Not satisfied with this power, they wish to bully the injured party from attempting to seek redress; nor are they always willing to stop there; for, in some instances, they endeavor to overshadow the law, by driving parties from receiving its benefits, even after it has decided. It may save all such persons some useless trouble, and a good deal of questionable logic, if they are reminded that, though there are certain individuals who can be bullied from their purposes, when they know they are right, there are others who can not. J. FENNIMORE COOPER.

The distinguished writer of the above is remarkably sturdy in his way, and is never, he says, to be bullied from his purposes. This firmness of purpose is a good quality if the purpose itself happens to be good. There is, however, a kind of firmness in this world, not wholly commendable. It is briefly described under the popular term of Roman firmness; and its analysis is said to show the following ingredients:

Stupidity ..... 60 parts
Obstinacy ..... 40

¶ The notorious wretch, calling herself Madame Restell, and having a reputed husband named Charles Lohman, has been arrested for the probable murder of a Mrs. Purdy. The circumstances are too horrible and too disgusting for repetition in this journal; but it seems that Mrs. Purdy was a respectable married lady. She did not wish to become a second time a mother, and so, by the advice of some female devil, consulted this Madame Restell. She was, however, first induced to do so by reading an advertisement in the Sun newspaper. The first cause, therefore, of her probable death, is the advertisement. We believe that the Herald and the Sun are the only newspapers in New York that have dared to issue the damnable announcement of this Madame Restell, and of others, who, like herself, publish themselves as the workers of an infamy too horrible for belief. Thus have these two papers lent themselves to be accomplices before the fact to a crime, than which there is no deeper in the catalogue of human guilt.

The tardy movement and wretched inefficiency of the city magistrates and police have suffered these evils to accumulate till they have at last gathered into a head and broken of themselves. Great sins against society will, by the inevitable destruction they bring upon its members, be overtaken sooner or later by a just retribution.

There seems not to be the slightest doubt of the guilt of the accused. Mrs. Purdy in the last hours of her life (for it is said by the physicians that her demise is certain,) has sworn to facts that are sufficient, if justice were evenly meted out, to hang all the parties concerned. She has given her deposition to the attending magistrate under circumstances the most solemn and with the deep conviction that but a few short moments must elapse before she goes to give her account at the bar of God. Her repentance is bitter and sincere; and the only consolation of her friends is derived from that high promise, which declares "though thy sins be as scarlet they shall be white as snow."

The accused was arrested and brought to the bedside of her dying victim, and there solemnly recognised. Madame Restell is now in custody and will be tried for this murder. Other crimes of as black a dye will unquestionably be brought to light. In conclusion, we have but one question to ask—How can those, whose duty and whose obligation it is to guard public morality, hold themselves guiltless of the results of their negligence?

THE NEW-YORK POST OFFICE.—Is there a new postmaster to be appointed for this city or is there not? How much longer, in consequence of the quarrels of the candidates, are we to be deprived of an efficient management in this department? The conduct of the business of the Post-office here is shameful. Coddington, with the certainty of being turned out, neglects his duties entirely, and the clerks behave in the most shiftless manner. Our agent in Albany, in a letter dated March 20, says: "I this day received your New Worlds and other papers mailed in New-York on the 11th, by the way of Buffalo. The way they manage business in your Post-office is greatly to my disadvantage. The papers frequently go to Washington, Utica, Buffalo, and elsewhere, before reaching Albany."

Scarcely a day elapses in which we do not receive accounts of papers not come to hand, letters miscarried and money lost. How long is this mismanagement to afflict us? Will the official paper be so good as to present this complaint to the notice of the powers at Washington?

We cut the following from the Evening Post of Monday

THE MAILS.—Some two weeks since the sum of $4 was sent by mail directed to this office from Mr. Allen, postmaster at Ulsterville in Ulster county in this state. On the fifth instant two dollars were remitted from Mr. Bull, the postmaster at Columbia Hall in this state. Neither of these sums have been received. The failure is so much the more remarkable as, until within a few months, nothing of the kind has occurred for a long series of years past.

A correspondent at Plattekill, in this state, complains that he does not receive the Evening Post regularly, not having received a single copy since the 3d of March—while the other New-York papers arrive regularly at the Plattekill post office.

"GUILTY."—This verdict has been rendered by the jury in the case of Peter Robinson, tried for the murder of Mr. Suydam.

ARRIVAL OF THE CALEDONIA.

TWENTY-TWO DAYS LATER.

The steamship Caledonia, Capt. McKellar, arrived at Boston at half past eleven o'clock on Saturday morning, of last week in a little less than sixteen days from Liverpool.

We have copious files of London papers to the 3d and Liverpool to the 4th inst.

The packet ship George Washington, which left this port on the 9th February, arrived at Liverpool on the morning of the 3d, bringing the first intelligence of the suspension of specie payments by the Bank of the United States. The Liverpool papers have not a word of comment on the subject.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

LONDON, Wednesday Evening, March 3, 1841.

The intelligence brought by the Acadia on the 15th created some uneasiness, owing to the exaggerated reports on the matter of McLeod. The depreciation of value in the United States Bank stock had also its effects, and for several days following this arrival, the money market wore a most gloomy aspect. We are happy to say that matters have again recovered themselves and a gradual improvement may be noted up to the present date. English Consols, which were so low as 87½, close this evening at 89½ for the April account. United States Bank continues extremely reduced. Sales were made to day at £9. Three weeks ago they were £9 10s. In 1837 they ranged from £24 to £25 10s. The drafts on Jas. Morrison, which appear to have been taken doubtfully on your side, were duly honored and are received here as paper of the highest class. The Bank of England has received these bills without any hesitation. These objections to acceptances of Mr. Jaudon arose from a principle not to discount paper of one establishment drawn on itself unless secured by an additional London endorsement. Besides, there was no check on the amount of such drafts, and it could not be seen whether they were based on legitimate transactions or otherwise.

Considerable anxiety was felt during last week for the result of the Parliamentary division on the Irish Registration Bill introduced by the Ministry. After four nights debate it passed its second reading by a majority of five only. As a test of party strength, the conclusion is viewed by both sides with congratulation. Had the bill been thrown out, which many anticipated, an immediate dissolution of Parliament was fully expected. As it is, such a step appears more than likely before many weeks. What advantage such a recourse would give to the Melbourne Cabinet we cannot possibly perceive. Judging by recent elections, their supporters would be still further decreased.

The corn market has undergone considerable advance in prices, and the speculators have already given out orders to some extent in the Baltic ports. Within the last ten days wheat has commanded from 20 to 30 rise per quarter, and American flour about 1s. per barrel. This last is now quoted 25s. to 26s. in bond. The duty on wheat is now 25s. 8d. equal to 15s. 5d. on flour, and the general feeling at present is that the former will come down to 13s. 8d. before next harvest. At this rate the market would obtain a good opening for importations from the United States, but we cannot see on what grounds they form this expectation. Every thing at this time gives promise of a good year's crop; the weather has so far been remarkably favorable and all accounts from the country are satisfactory. The stock of American flour now in Liverpool exceeds 50,000 barrels.

At Liverpool the Cotton business has been large within a few days, and an improvement of ½d may be quoted since the middle of February. The sales, week ending 19th, were 47,000, and ending 26th 33,000 bags. The three days since have averaged 6,000 bales.

LONDON, March 3, 1841.

The most melancholy disaster at sea which has been recorded for many years, occurred on the morning of the 20th, about twenty miles from Holyhead. The ship Governor Fenner, of Boston, S. C. Andrews master, bound for New-York, with a crew of 17 men and 106 passengers, came in collision with the steamer Nottingham. The ship foundered immediately, and, dreadful to state, every soul on board perished, excepting the Captain and first officer. The accident took place about two hours after midnight, whilst all the passengers were asleep. These were emigrants, and principally from Ireland. Not one of them had time to reach the deck. The sailors on duty went aft instead of forward, as ordered by the Captain, and sunk also with the vessel. The bows of the latter were stove in, having struck the steamer close to the paddle box. It appears surprising that the Nottingham escaped. She was unable to proceed, and fifteen hours afterward was fallen in with by another steamer, and brought to Liverpool.

THE DREADFUL LOSS OF THE SHIP GOVERNOR FENNER, OF BOSTON, NEAR LIVERPOOL.

In addition to the particulars furnished by our correspondent, we obtain the following from the Liverpool papers. The Albion gives the account as stated by Captain Andrews:

"We sailed from Liverpool on Friday last at noon, with the wind at S. S. W. The crew consisted of seventeen, and the passengers in the steerage amounted to one hundred and six. We had a full cargo of manufactured goods. On Saturday morning, at two o'clock, the wind blowing fresh from S. S. W., and when the ship was under double-reefed topsails, the gibs, spanker, and mainsail in, saw a steamer to windward on the larboard bow. The ship's helm was instantly put hard a-port. The steamer crossed our bow, and struck her right midships. From the force of the collision, it was evident that either the ship or the steamer would sink, or perhaps both. Instantly I felt that the ship, the bows of which were stove in, was sinking. I cried out to the crew (all the passengers were below) to endeavor to save their lives. They, instead of running forward, through fear ran aft. My first object was to endeavor to save the crew and passengers: but so rapid was the sinking of the ship, I found it impossible to do anything to accomplish that object. I and the mate then ran forward, and, finding the ship fast sinking, I tried to jump on to the steamer. Failing in my first attempt through a momentary faintness, I made a second, and, just as the ship was at the water's edge, succeeded in grasping a rope which was hanging over the steamer's side. The mate saved his life by jumping from the fore-yard arm on to the steamer's deck. In one minute the ship sank, with sixteen of her crew and all the passengers, amounting together to one hundred and twenty-two souls. The steamer's boat was instantly lowered for the purpose of making an attempt to save such of the crew and passengers as might be floating, but it unfortunately swamped alongside."

The mate, Mr. Carter, also furnished the following, according to another paper, but some of the statements have been since disavowed.

After corroborating the captain in his account of the sailing, &c., about five minutes past two o'clock on Saturday morning we saw the lights of a steamboat. It was my watch on deck, and I immediately called the captain. The steamboat came up at about a point and a half on our weather-bow, we having at the time our larboard tacks on board. We thought she was coming on head to us. We had no light but that of the binnacle on the quarter-deck; and, I believe it is not considered necessary or prudent for sailing vessels clear of the land to carry a light. We waited as much as five or six minutes, to find out what way the steamer was really coming, and then the captain ordered the man at the wheel to put the helm hard-a-port, so as to give her a clear birth. If the steamboat had done the same we should have gone clear of each other a long way, perhaps a mile. The captain, as soon as he ordered the wheel to be put up, went forward to look out. I then looked over the larboard side, abaft the main rigging, and saw the whole bulk of the steamer. I said to the man at the helm, "She is on board of us." This was a quarter past two o'clock. The vessels came in contact notwithstanding our ship paying off. When the crash took place I heard the captain call out several times, "For God's sake save yourselves, the ship is sinking." The jibboom of the ship struck the funnel of the steamer, and her bowsprit afterward rested upon her. On the third surge she gave, I believe, down she went, bow foremost. The taffrail was the last thing we saw of her. She filled very quickly. She had on board a heavy cargo, including a quantity of iron and other heavy goods. The watch on the deck at the time consisted of seven men, the captain and myself. All the others on board were asleep below.

The captain also sang out to the man at the helm to leave the wheel. His name was Munroe—he was formerly mate of the Belvidere, came on board to work his passage to America, and we intended to make him second mate of the ship next day. All the men at first went forward with me to the captain, who was standing between the night-heads, but they afterward went aft as the ship sunk, to be, as I suppose, on the higher part of her hull. I stood some time, and attempted to go aft with a view of endeavoring to save my wife and others by lowering a boat. She, however, sunk so fast, that I was obliged to give up the idea in despair. I left the captain, and went to the starboard side. I stood there a few seconds, till the water was perhaps two feet deep, as far aft as the mainmast, and was fast gathering still further aft, her head being then nearly under. I scarce know what afterward occurred. I got up somehow into the fore-rigging, and thence on to the larboard fore-yards, which then crossed the steamer. When the ship sunk so far that I was from six to eight feet from the steamer's deck, I let go, and dropped down amongst some sheep. I lay some time rather confused, and did not attempt to rise, as I thought I might become entangled in a rope which passed over my shoulders, and, as I thought, was part of the bowsprit running rigging of the ship. I then got up. The cry on board the steamer was, that she was sinking, and I believe a passenger on board lowered the boat left on the davits on the larboard side; but she unhooked from the tackles when she touched the water, and the painter not being fast, she drifted away from the vessel.

I was on board about three-quarters of an hour before I found that the captain of the ship was there. I had seen my wife, who was a little sea-sick, about 20 minutes before in her berth, and gave her a drink. The captain, when I first saw him in the steamer, was without his hat, and on seeing him (informant) he said, "Good God, is this you; is there any of the crew saved?" I said, "I do not know. I did not know what became of you after I missed you off the ship's bow." Her hull was under water before I got off. The foreyard from which I dropped was broken on the steamer as she was going down; and also, I believe, the topsail yard, as our foretopmast studding-sail-boom, which was rigged out at the time, (the wind having been for some time fair in the evening,) was left on the steamer's deck. I afterward looked, but could see nothing of the ship or her masts. The last time I observed the watch on deck, they were on the starboard side of the quarter-deck. One man sang out, "For God Almighty's sake save me!" I did not hear the others. I had a quantity of my wife's and my own clothing and other articles on board, worth about £50. All were lost.

The account of the catastrophe given by those on board the Nottingham is in substance as follows:

"About a quarter past two o'clock on Saturday morning, when about fifteen miles to the westward of Holyhead, the weather calm, but rather thick, one of the men on the watch saw a ship bearing down upon the Nottingham. She had no light at her mast, while the steamer had three. He reported the fact to the second mate, who was then at the wheel. The second mate hailed the ship, and was answered. He desired her to starboard the helm. This, they thought, was not done. A voice from the ship, which was supposed to have been that of the captain, requested the steamer to starboard her helm, as he could not bring the ship over, she not answering her helm. At this instant the Governor Fenner struck the Nottingham amidships. In less than five minutes the ship filled with water and disappeared. The steamer became quite motionless after the shock, and the people on board of her were unable to make the least attempt to succor those on board the ship, which sank bow foremost. The cries of the people on the wreck were heartrending, but they soon ceased, and all was still. The steamer's starboard side was completely stove in; the paddle shaft and wheel were shivered in pieces; the starboard engine was broken, and the funnel carried away. Seventeen cows were killed; seven beasts and seventy-eight sheep were thrown overboard, and eleven died before the vessel reached port.

The Nottingham did not get ten miles from the place where the collision took place during the whole day, and at five in the afternoon was taken in tow by another steamer from Ireland. She was brought into the Clarence Dock, and was so much shattered on the starboard side that hundreds of persons congregated on the quays to see, all absorbed in the melancholy event which had caused the destruction. Her paddle-box had almost entirely been carried away, and part of the "skeleton" on the wheel—the cast iron work of the "spokes" being broken in pieces, and the beaten iron rings of the wheel crushed up, almost close to the vessel's side. She presented, indeed, the appearance of a wreck, in the effecting of which it is extraordinary that no person on board was killed or thrust overboard and drowned. Much of the upper timber was reduced to mere match-wood by the collision. A boat on the starboard quarter was cut in two, and one part of her only remained on deck. The after paddle-beam, a bulk of hard wood, of about twenty inches square (and which was a main support of the box and wheel), is broken close to the ship's side, and turned in a diagonal direction, aft—held by the toughness of the fibres from falling off, and even yet of sufficient strength to support the weight of several persons upon it. The strong iron stay or pillar, supporting it in a downward direction to the side, some feet below, is also driven sternward from its position.

The passengers were all below in their berths when the collision between the ship and the steamer took place. The shock caused by it would, of course, rouse even those who might then have been asleep. No doubt they would make a rush toward the deck: the interval which elapsed, however, between the shock and the sinking was so short, scarcely five minutes, that very few, if any, could have succeeded in reaching it. So that, in all probability, most of them perished in their berths. The mate had been married only a few days before the ship's sailing: the captain had given his wife a berth with her husband in the cabin. When the fate of the ship became inevitable, he attempted to run aft to rescue her. Time failed him, the instinct of self-preservation became strong, he sprang up the shrouds, and reached the steamer, as we have already stated, by jumping from the fore yard-arm.

CIRCULAR.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 20, 1841.

To the Hon. Thomas Ewing,

Secretary of the Treasury:

SIR: The President is of opinion that it is a great abuse to bring the patronage of the General Government into conflict with the freedom of elections; and that this abuse ought to be corrected wherever it may have been permitted to exist, and to be prevented for the future.

He therefore directs that information be given to all officers and agents in your Department of the public service that partisan interference in popular elections, whether of State officers or officers of this Government, and for whomsoever or against whomsoever it may be exercised, or the payment of any contribution or assessment on salaries or official compensation for party or election purposes, will be regarded by him as cause of removal.

It is not intended that any officer shall be restrained in the free and proper expression and maintenance of his opinions respecting public men or public measures, or in the exercise, to the fullest degree, of the constitutional right of suffrage. But persons employed under the Government, and paid for their services out of the public Treasury, are not expected to take an active or officious part in attempts to influence the minds or votes of others; such conduct being deemed inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution and the duties of public agents acting under it; and the President is resolved, so far as depends upon him, that while the exercise of the elective franchise by the People shall be free from undue influences of official station and authority, opinion shall also be free among the officers and agents of the Government.

The President wishes it further to be announced and distinctly understood, that from all collecting and disbursing officers, promptitude in rendering accounts, and entire punctuality in paying balances, will be rigorously exacted. In his opinion, it is time to return, in this respect, to the early practice of the Government, and to hold any degree of delinquency on the part of those entrusted with the public money just cause of immediate removal. He deems the severe observance of this rule to be essential to the public service, as every dollar lost to the Treasury by unfaithfulness in office creates a necessity for a new charge upon the People.

I have the honor to be, sir, your ob't serv't,

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Daniel O'Connell

Engraved on Wood, by Butler.

DANIEL O'CONNELL, ESQ., M. P. FOR THE CITY OF DUBLIN.

Daniel O'Connell in our Portrait Gallery!! And—observe him—how thoroughly unconscious he appears of the distinction. There is not the slightest intimation in his countenance of gratitude or even surprise. The Venetian Doge, who amidst all the wonders of the French Court, wondered most to find himself there, has not left to the Doge of Ireland any portion of his sensitiveness. Such is the character of the land we live in. An Irishman, like a Parisian, is every where at home. Mr. O'Connell takes it all as his due; and if any trick of youth remains with him, very probably imagines that for the beauty of his countenance we have selected him to ornament our gallery.

He is mistaken if he thinks so. The reader will not mistake. Not that we deny the man to be "a noticeable man" enough—but he is not of that shape and feature which wins its way solely by the power of its external charms. He looks as if he had been successful—but as if success had lost all its poetry. Things had gone well with him, you would say, as you look upon his visage; but he no longer feels the charm of being prosperous. He lives in a disenchanted world. So his whole air and deportment indicates. But it indicates also that he is satisfied to take it as it is, and to be contented with it.

But why have we chosen him? Is it for his political opinions—or for the high qualities by which he adorns them? or for the sound moral by which, however we may deprecate his objects and ends, he compels us to confess that what "he would highly, that would he holily?" No such thing—in all these particulars we have oftentimes condemned him. Why then hang up his portrait? There is a passage written by one Shakespere, which we do not wish to quote, but in plain prose we profess that we have been influenced by the station he has acquired, the power he wields, the aims he has in view, and feel that, although we do not give him our praise or our good will, we cannot refuse to him our notice. Let him hang, then, (portrait-wise,) in our gallery.

Daniel O'Connell was born at Cashan, near Cahirciveen, on the 6th of August, 1775, and, after a course of education in the college of St. Omers, and after having renounced the office of the priesthood, an estate for which manifestly he had no vocation, was called to the Irish bar in the year 1798. Having behaved with most commendable discretion during the most tempestuous days of that season of peril, and, as Dr. Meyler affirms, having hidden his patriotic propensities under the loyal garb of a yeoman, he began to become bold as the days of evil and danger departed; and, when it became safe to seek the reputation of an agitator, agitated "with a good courage." We mean no sneer. We have heard insinuations against Mr. O'Connell's valor. In the most unequivocal terms we declare our utter disbelief in them. We lay no such flattering unction to our souls as that rebellion must grow slack because of Mr. O'Connell's cowardice. If he thought it advisable to marshal the strength of his masses against the power of England, we believe firmly that, from any craven apprehensions of what would befall himself, he would not stay the battle. On the contrary, we can believe (there are some, but very few, who will understand the propriety of our citation)—

"That hour of bliss is all he'd crave, Between his labors and his grave."

No. Mr. O'Connell is not a dastard.

It must be confessed that Roman Catholics, in the early part of this century, had strong provocations to shake their chains against the Government. The policy of conciliation was erroneously conceived, and most clumsily carried into practice. The trick of the Government seemed to be, to make Roman Catholics satisfied with their exclusion from power, by silencing all who would manifest the danger of a Popish principle. The only success to be hoped from such a game as this would be, to convince Romanists that their exclusion was unjust, not to satisfy them that they owed any thanks for the enforcement of a silence which no substantial benefit accompanied. They, naturally, in numerous instances, believed, that they were punished for their religious opinions, not for the politics of their church; and thus they were drawn closer to each other, and rendered more angrily disposed to the State, by an exclusion from power on grounds in which all men must discern a character of injustice.

Mr. O'Connell is evidently a man in whom the consciousness of his own presence (if such an expression is admissible,) never fails or faints. In him, as, in truth, in most of those whom history denominates great—as well as in vast multitudes of the little, the importance of everything is tested by its application to himself. Fichte himself was not speculatively more awake to the exigencies of the great "Ego," than O'Connell has shown himself in practice. The same spirit which incited him to oppose and overthrow the Marquess of Anglesea in later days, was not feeble in his youth, when he beheld (whatever were the professions of the Government,) the practice, which bestowed honors and emolument on one favored class, and asked of the neglected to be thankful that it was permitted them to live. We would not be mistaken. Let it not be thought that we condemn the laws which inflicted Penal disabilities. We condemn the inconsistency which, on the one hand, enforced them, and, on the other, discouraged all attempts by which they could be justified or explained. If you deny power to any class of men, you should tell them why. The moment it was pronounced inexpedient to expose the intolerance and perfidy of the Church of Rome, it became unwise to maintain the laws against Roman Catholics. We censure not the laws, (although we would have modified them had we had the power,) but the puerile notion that Romanists could be reconciled to them by a line of conduct which only supposed them unnecessary.

It was impossible that a man of Mr. O'Connell's temper should not feel indignantly his own part in the seeming wrong under which his party suffered; and it was also impossible that a mind of sagacity such as his, should not discern the advantage to be obtained from the incoherent policy which the State had adopted. He resolved that the penal disabilities should cease, and that he should be hailed as the author of their abolition.

We are far from wishing to be understood as expressing a belief, that "emancipation" was the one object for which Mr. O'Connell contended. From the beginning, and at the present day, (we are firmly persuaded,) his ambition for himself, or what he terms his country, had, and continues to have, a higher aim. Repeal of the Legislative Union, and the consequences inseparable from it, are the real objects of Mr. O'Connell's exertions. It is because they are known so to be, that all his errors and offences toward his party meet so prompt a forgiveness. It is by believing them to be so, we are strongly disposed to think, the apparent inconsistencies in his political life can be understood and reconciled. Whatever changes he has experienced, no change has reached the "love" he bears the Saxon. That one principle appears to be immortal in his nature; and by it, however otherwise his views and habits may be altered, the identity of his character is still discernible. It is only the vulgar politicians—the superficial—the empirical, of a day like ours, who can deny to him the honor, such as it be, of having a great public object at heart. He is, we firmly believe, as devotedly resolved to pursue his personal objects, as any public man with whom he has been associated, or to whom he has been opposed—but we do him the justice, and we take to ourselves the warning, to believe, that there is no object, personal or political, so constantly in the thoughts, so dear to the heart of Daniel O'Connell, as the separation of Ireland from Great Britain.

The qualities which have fitted Mr. O'Connell for the part he has chosen in public life, are too well known to require our delineation of them. He has a strong will, a strong body, and a conscience which regards ends rather than means, and is marvellously disposed to be at peace with itself, when by any means his ends can be accomplished. In this latter particular, he, no doubt, had advantages from his creed with which no heretic can be favored. If the statements of O'Sullivan, and M'Ghee, and M'Neile are to be credited, (and it does not appear that they are denied,) the conscience of a true son of the Church of Rome is to be submissive in the confessional, that it may take its impressions from the priest; and afterward, in the business of life, to utter no voice but that which the priest has taught it. Mr. O'Connell's moral sense appears to be thoroughly orthodox. His confessor must answer for his salvation, and leave him free, by all means, without scruple, without remorse, to struggle for the salvation of his country. He and the people whom he represents and leads, are marvellously adapted to each other. A Protestant leader, who should hazard experiments such as Mr. O'Connell has attempted with success, would be indignantly rejected and disowned by the very party he wished to serve. The people or party who would dare to second a patriot's purposes by such enterprises as the "finest peasantry" attempt for "O'Connell and country," would find few indeed of intellectual power approaching to their leaders, whom their excesses and iniquities would not alienate from them. The leader and the people are manifestations of the character of system in which both have been disciplined.

Mr. O'Connell has been heavily censured for the manner in which he carries out in life the spirit and principle of his often recited "vow." To interpose it as a shield against personal danger, and to allow it no influence or authority in restraining from offence and outrage, does certainly appear inconsistent. It is worse than Hibernian reciprocity. To breathe a vow to heaven, which is to impose no restraint on most uncharitable tendencies, which is to leave falsehood and slander free to work their wicked ends, and is to show itself only when it is necessary to save them from being punished; this is not consistent, certainly, with acknowledged notions of morals, or religion, or honor. The complacency with which Irish Roman Catholics regard the practices of Mr. O'Connell prove, by the result, that he has not miscalculated their capacity of endurance, or offended against principles which they hold inviolable. "The end" is his justification. He is a great popular orator. To be successful, there must be ready sympathies between the speaker and the audience. The orator for the masses must reflect to them their own passions and purposes. What would O'Connell be in haranguing an Irish mob, if his language were not rancorous. If he did not indulge them with gross abuse of their superiors, of all who are set in authority, the multitude would soon desert him. His vow, therefore, must be so regarded as that it shall not abridge his occupation. He will sacrifice to it, if need be, his character, that is, his reputation in the judgment of reflecting men; but he will not expose his life, and he will not govern his tongue.

Mr. O'Connell is a great popular orator; he is an admirable cross-examiner; but it has been observed, in order to his being successful, he must have a vantage ground in starting. In the Catholic Association, on circuit, he has exhibited power and presence of mind: in parliament, the instances are not many in which he has acquitted himself with credit. He certainly does not feel in the senate, as one who is "at home" there. He must know, for he is far too sagacious to be ignorant of the fact, that with the exception of one or two near relations, there is not an individual in the House of Commons who will not, at heart, rejoice in all his failures. The ministers whose tyrant he is, while keeping them in place—the party to whom he gives superiority of power, although they must, for their interests' sake, wish even to his public efforts a certain species of success; yet gladly would feed their spite with every untoward event which may embarrass or annoy their despotic protector. This is an uncomfortable position. No man, certainly not O'Connell, can feel at ease in it. And often, when we have seen him vanish as Lord Stanley, or Sir Robert Peel, arose to reply, and have heard the jeers and laughter, amidst which, after having adjusted his wig and firmly pressed his hat upon his brows, with a pallid smile, and an ill-measured step, he hastened to the door—we have said to ourselves—"it is not for fear of Stanley or Peel that man is shrinking away—it is because he knows that if he remained, every man in the house, except his son Maurice, would rejoice in his castigation."

We have heard that O'Connell has not always been best when the audience was best disposed toward him. Lord Fingall and the Patriots were taught to know that he could exercise much power over an adverse assembly. He was the first man in Ireland who successfully wielded popular strength against the purposes of the aristocracy. The natural leaders (as those who are conventionally leaders, the wealthy and titled classes, are called,) of the Roman Catholics would have excluded him from their deliberations. The end of the contest was, that they were well contented to follow in his train. Nor was it over the aristocracy of his own sect alone he exercised his power. Even the haughtiness of "Brooks" quailed before it—even in that choice assembly of the lordly and liberal—in that crème of Whig politicians—his power was felt; and he was permitted, without rebuke, to follow out an outrage upon good manners into the more unpardonable sin of respecting "his vow," under circumstances in which any other man in England or Ireland would have been compelled to betake himself into retirement. "To get into a scrape as a black-guard," said a well-known and gallant officer, "is a misfortune, but if you get out of it as a gentleman, all shall be forgiven." How Mr. O'Connell got into his scrape with Sir Henry Hardyng was of very little moment in the estimation of the club. How he was to get out of it gave them somewhat more concern. It was not to their taste, as they confessed;—but they submitted—submitted certainly with no good grace—and left to Mr. O'Connell the merit of influencing a club of gentlemen not to expel a member for refusing to fight a duel, although indulging in language by which the decencies of society were outraged. This is an incident in the life of Mr. O'Connell which ought to be well remembered. It was the first introduction of plebeianism into the clubs of London. We do not think it will take root in them. The law of the Prince of this world will resume its authority. But we firmly believe that no man in the British dominions, except O'Connell, would have been permitted, as he was with impunity, to aggravate the offence of unbecoming language, by a professed respect for the law of God. This was Mr. O'Connell's unenvied but most memorable prerogative.

Of all public men living, it is probable that there is not one beside Mr. O'Connell who regards his reputation as something in which he has no personal concern. Against the law and power of opinion he alone seems to bear "a charmed life." He glories in being, as he declares, "the best abused man in Christendom." The man who had "lost his shadow," was not more singularly distinguished among his fellows than O'Connell is. He "leaves his character behind him" fearlessly, while he proceeds to his ends, through means which he regards only as they may serve his purposes. And with such views the means are well selected. To the unthinking, it may often seem as if he were merely indulging the spleen or passion of the moment. The wise can discern a crafty purpose beneath. Hear him, for example, denouncing the House of Commons—imputing to its members every baseness in motive and act—you ask what can he mean? Hear him speak of the iniquitous decisions of Tory Committees on Election—of the certainty that they must ever be unjust—you ask, perhaps, is the man mad? But wait the result: his seat is dependent on the decision of a committee. Observe how he has gauged and measured the intellect of the "curled darlings" of the house. Observe the unwillingness to serve on a committee where his interests are to be decided. Look to the end—and then see whether O'Connell did not profit by the foul invectives which first set the House of Commons on fire, and then wrought in the hearts of the very members who had resented them most, to avoid collision with so unceremonious an assailant, and rather give him the rewards of victory than be sullied in a conflict with him.

O'Connell is a great popular orator—but oratory is only one of the many forms with which his intellect clothes itself. He is a subtle politician. A mere orator is at best but an instrument for wiser men to work with. O'Connell has the art to make all men he comes withal, his victims or his tools. When first he entered upon public life with any thing like success, it is said he came forward as one of the many whom a very cunning man employed as his instruments. We mean Mr. Scully, author of "The Penal Laws." O'Connell, however, soon showed that he had a principle of independent life. He was not formed of the stuff of which parasites are made. The relations between patron and protégé were soon inverted, and the cause of "Catholic Ireland" became concentrated in the person of O'Connell.

One is sometimes disposed to ask how it comes to pass, that means such as Mr. O'Connell has never scrupled to employ, should be crowned with such unexampled success? There is nothing wonderful in this, nothing which is not quite consistent with all sound notions of God's providential dealings. Evil may be indulged in a triumph, in order to punish those who profess and see what is good, and who will not faithfully pursue it. Mr. O'Connell has acted steadily on a fixed principle. He desires the "liberation" as he calls it, of his country, the exaltation of his church. These are his ends—his means, all agencies which may attain them. If those who profess a purer moral, would act upon their principles, O'Connell could not succeed; if they desert their principles for a phantom of expediency, the success of means such as he has employed is the proper chastisement for their transgression. As yet their sin has been visited rather upon a party than the nation; if they persist, conjecture can scarcely reach the extent to which the punishment may be inflicted.

Mr. O'Connell can plead in his own behalf excuses with which none of his adversaries can protect themselves. The habits of his early life, his education, his religion, are his defence. He has done nothing in his public career which would cause him to feel affright or shame at the vision of his boyhood, at the remembrance of St. Omer, or in the perusal of "an examination of conscience." Amidst the circumstances of his earlier years, the instincts of self were strengthened and sharpened in him. By his education, he was trained in the faith that the means employed to promote the interests of the church are sanctified by their uses. And if, as some say, he escaped from bigotry into infidelity, and passed some portion of his life in an estrangement from belief in every thing by which man is bettered, it did not follow, that false principles, or evil habits were to droop because of the change from credulity to scepticism. The love of self may have revived as concern for religion departed;—and when events gave proof that that love might, in the form of zeal for religion, best attain its ends, it was natural enough that selfishness, and superstition, and irreligion, should all combine their various influences to form such a character as should represent and serve them all most faithfully.

Mr. O'Connell's adversaries can plead no such excuse. They ought to see in his rise and power, that they are punished for the inconsistencies of former days. They ought to discern the sign of still severer punishment, if their perseverance in wrong doing provoke it. Mr. O'Connell is now in a position which no subject in the British realms ever occupied before. He is the virtual head of the British government; the protector and the tyrant over her Majesty's ministers. They confess that without his aid they could not exist. They make it manifest therefore that, under no imaginable circumstances, could they retain place, and brave his serious displeasure. And he makes it manifest. From one end of Ireland to the other, he raises the cry for Repeal, and thus gives contemptuous warning to the sovereign and the people, that the present ministers of England hold their places at the will of an individual, who is bent on the dismemberment of the empire, and who finds, in the existing government, the ministry which best serves his purposes.

The warning ought to be respected: and yet it is possible that he has judged correctly the character of the people whom it might serve, in concluding that it may safely be given because they will not profit by it. In opposition to the delusive assertions of many, we repeat that O'Connell is sincere in his enterprise against the legislative union. His prejudices, his habits, his education, his interests, his instincts, all are on the side of separation. He is at heart essentially Irish; by habits of life he is rendered thoroughly anti-Anglican. His sojourns in London only serve to exasperate him against the English aristocracy. His retirements—the very reverse of seclusion—at Derrynane—invalidate the spirit of Irish chieftaincy. In short, nature and circumstances conspire to hold him in estrangement from all Anglican sympathies, and to concentrate all his powers and passions upon the object which he professes—that of the independence of Ireland.

Some term this object impracticable—we are not among them. We can imagine how it may be defeated; we can imagine how it may succeed. It ought not to be, sported with. We will not enter into a detail of circumstances in which it might be effected. We would, however, remind the incredulous, of the successes by which Mr. O'Connell has heretofore been encouraged. We remember his indictments; his narrow escape from ruin; and his patent of precedence. We remember him when his cause seemed utterly prostrate; when some of the ablest speculators of the time affirmed boldly, that the claims of the Roman Catholics were postponed to another generation; and we see Mr. O'Connell in Parliament, with an influence, too, greater than ever was possessed by peer or commoner in ancient times. We learn that the members of his creed pay him nearly twenty thousand pounds a year, because, as they say, he carried "the emancipation." We know that he turned the scale in the struggle for "reform." We shall, in all probability, if he and we live so long, behold him next year arrayed in the civic robes of Lord Mayor of Dublin; and after that, we ask of the most incredulous and the least imaginative, what possible elevation is there in which Mr. O'Connell may not place himself?

TO J * * * *

Too well, too well I love thee—
Would that I loved thee less!
For such deep love hath bitter power
That words cannot express:
My smiles are feigned—they do not cheer
This heart so sad and lone—
But thine are all my light of life,
My beautiful, my own!

If thou wouldst curb this leaping blood—
The wanderer reclaim—
And to a mild and gentle mood
This rebel spirit tame:
Oh let not high resentment speak,
But feelings soft and kind,
Unto the temper of the dove,
Calm and subdue my mind.

From those sweet lips let music flow,
And tones of kindness fall,
And, like a willing captive, I
Will yield to thee my all—
My all of hope—my all of bliss:
And yet it will not be,
For thou art so beloved, I find
My happiness in thee.

Thus win a heart that's fond and true,
And lure those feelings back,
Which may have roamed away from thee
On Pleasure's flowery track.
To free from snares of worldly joy—
To thee alone 't is given—
One, whom thy dear persuasive voice
Could call from earth to heaven.

When from his perch the bird is cast
Upon the open sky
To realms, that far away from home
In other climates lie,
His wing may stray—but soon or late
The lost one will appear
And seek a kindly look to see,
A kindly voice to hear.

Thus, I from saddest solitude
And parted from thy side,
Come in thy true and tender heart
My cares and griefs to hide—
For thou art dear, oh, dearer far
Than these frail lines have shown—
And I can find no sure repose
Save in thy love alone!

THE OLD SCHOOL-HOUSE.

WRITTEN FOR HENRY RUSSELL BY PARK BENJAMIN.

On the village green it stood,
And a tree was at the door,
Whose shadow, broad and good,
Reached far along the floor
Of the school-room, when the sun
Put on his crimson vest,
And, his daily labor done,
Like a monarch sunk to rest.

How the threshold-wood was worn!
How the lintel-post decayed!
By the tread at eve and morn,
Of the feet that o'er it strayed—
By the pressure of the crowd
Within the portal small—
By the ivy's emerald shroud
That wrapped and darkened all.

That school-house dim and old—
How many years have flown
Since in its little fold
My name was kindly known!
How different it seems
From what it used to be,
When, gay as morning dreams,
We played around the tree!

How we watched the lengthening ray
Through the dusty window-pane!
How we longed to be away
And at sport upon the plain—
To leave the weary books
And the master's careful eye,
For the flowers and for the brooks,
And the cool and open sky.

Alas! where now are they—
My early comrades dear?
Departed far away,
And I alone am here!
Some are in distant climes,
And some in churchyard cold—
Yet it told of happy times,
That school-house dim and old!

AN ORATION,

Pronounced on the occasion of the Second Anniversary of Knickerbocker Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in the BROADWAY TABERNACLE,
New York, March 23, 1841.

BY REV. I. D. WILLIAMSON.

This world is, at best, but a checkered scene of good and ill. Misfortune and poverty, sorrow and death, are the unavoidable evils with which we are surrounded; and no man may hope to pass through life without witnessing and even feeling their effects. Such is human life; and it is the part of wisdom to take the world as it is, rather than as we may chance to think it ought to be. Poets may dream of Utopian lands, where poverty and sickness can never enter; and I will not deny that this may make good poetry. But when we come down from the dizzy heights of Parnassus, and talk in sober prose, the fact too clearly appears that we are in a world of suffering, and "full many a tear and many a sigh," warn us that the destroyer of human happiness is abroad and doing his work. Misfortunes which no mortal ken could foresee, no human power possibly prevent, will come, and that too, upon the wisest and best of men, so that he who is rich and prosperous to-day, may be poor and destitute to-morrow. Sickness, also, in ten thousand forms, stalks abroad in darkness, and wasteth in the light of noon day;

"And fierce diseases wait around
To hurry mortals home."

To-day the iron nerve may be strong to do battle with the difficulties and dangers of life; the cheek may be flushed with health; and the eye flashing with the fires of life. But to-morrow—ah! who can tell how it shall be to-morrow! To-morrow, the strong arm may become weak and helpless as a little child's; the rose may fade upon the cheek; the fires of the eye grow dim; and the robust frame lie emaciated and poor upon a bed of pain. Long months or years of sickness and misfortune may consume the last fraction of that store which a prudent foresight had laid aside for the day of need; and death, at last, may close the scene, and leave a widow and her children penniless and poor, and with unsheltered heads exposed, naked, to "the peltings of the pitiless storm." These things are not only possible, but they do actually occur, and are among the every day events of life, all over the world.

Seeing then, that these things are so, it becomes a matter of serious and important inquiry, whether aught can be done to relieve the unfortunate, and mitigate the evils of which we have been speaking? Are there methods or systems, by which the poor and unfortunate, the sick and the distressed, the widow and the fatherless, can be relieved, and made to feel less heavily the evils that surround them?

In our judgment, there are such means, fully within our power; and in that conviction originated, and by it is sustained—THE INDEPENDENT ORDER OF ODD FELLOWS. That other methods might be adopted we are not disposed to deny; but we do not hesitate to express our firm conviction, that none have yet been put in operation that afford so fair a prospect of success. By this institution men are formed into an association, the main pillar of which is the comfort and relief of the sick and distressed brother, the aiding of his widow, and the education of his orphans. That these objects are great and good, no man can, for a moment, deny; and we believe our means of securing them are preeminently good, because they are effectual.

I can think of but three ways in which the sick, the poor, the widow and the orphan can be relieved. These are—First, By civil government. Secondly, By individual charity. Or Thirdly, By organized associations for that specific purpose.

That the first might be practicable, there can be no doubt. Civil governments could make such provisions for the poor and the destitute that none should lack bread; no widows pine in want; no orphans go uneducated. But it should be remembered, that no human government has yet done this, and the mere abstract proposition that it could be done, will neither feed the hungry, nor clothe the naked. Although our government has done more than any other to secure to all the means of comfortable livelihood—still, it is an unquestionable truth, that there is, all around us, suffering, for which there is no provision. We cannot therefore look to civil government for aid, effectual and full aid, in these matters.

The second mode named, That of private, individual charity, has done much; but all its efforts fall far short of what is needed. Who does not know, that to depend upon charity—cold, accidental charity, upon which, according to common opinion, we have no claim—is indeed a precarious, a sad, and desolate condition? Miserly avarice hoards her thousands, and drives hungry from the door the shivering applicant for a morsel of bread. Rags and poverty, cold, hunger and nakedness, are the portion of him that depends upon the charity of the world. But were the waters of charity as abundant as those that gushed from the rock in the wilderness, under the stroke of Moses' rod, and would they flow as freely at the call of the destitute, still there would be insuperable objections to this mode of relief, as society is now constituted. There is a laudable pride in the human heart that loves and the breaking down of this pride is no easy matter. On this account, many, and they too the most deserving, will suffer long and severely, before they will submit to the humiliating necessity of asking alms. "To beg they are ashamed." And when, at last, lank poverty and sharp-jawed famine prevail, and drive the sufferer out to beg, it is accompanied with such a sinking of the spirits, such a crushing of the hopes, that the moral powers will hardly survive the shock. And then, in many cases, charity will be meted out so parsimoniously, or in such an ungracious manner, that the recipient feels that his physical wants only are relieved, and he takes the gift with a keener anguish of heart, than all his previous outward distress has given him. He no longer walks erect, for he feels that he is dependent on charity. Or, if he assumes a bold front, it is the boldness of callous indifference to the opinions of others, or the morbid insensibility of a heart soured and steeled by frequent intercourse with what he is sure to deem, if it be not in fact the actual, selfishness and cruelty of the world. Thus its influence is to blunt the moral sensibilities, and prepare the mind for the commission of crime. Such are its effects, in these respects, that you will find but few instances where men, or even children, are reduced to the necessity of becoming common beggars, and rise from their degradation to return to the paths of virtue and respectability. And though it is more honorable to beg than to steal, yet it is to be feared that in many instances, that principle is reversed, and theft committed.

"The glorious privilege

Another objection still, is, that this mode of relief, opens wide the door of imposition and speculation. The vile wretch who riots in dissipation, and wallows in the very mire of iniquity, will appeal, in the name of charity, for relief from a catalogue of miseries that he will repeat by rule, and receive from the kind in heart the means of ministering to his depraved lusts, and sinking himself deeper and deeper in pollution and misery. Now, we may reason as we will, and yet it takes but a few instances of such imposition as this, to seal up, in a measure, the fountains of charity; to make us look with a suspicious eye upon every applicant for alms, and, often, to contemplate with comparative indifference the sufferings of the really deserving, or unwittingly to visit the sins of others upon their heads.

Thus the principle becomes arrayed against itself, and in its operations cuts off the supplies from which it expects to draw support. And even worse than this, it familiarizes the public ear to the cry of distress, and thus hardens the public heart, so that it can look with composure upon human suffering. These, then, are serious objections against the system of accidental charity; but even if these were obviated, still it would be vain to hope for effectual relief from such a source. The last method, or that of voluntary association for this specific object, appears to us most feasible. True, it may not reach the whole community, or cover the whole extent of the evil; for it is not to be presumed, that all will become members of such an association; but it has this peculiar excellency, that, as far as it goes, it does its work uniformly and effectually.

The principle of association, that has wrought such wonders in this age, and in every department of society, has been adopted by our order; and we unite in Social compact, for our own mutual benefit, and for the specific purpose of extending to the sick, the widow, and orphan, efficient and timely aid; and our organization is intended to obviate all objections that lie against the systems upon which I have commented. The experience of years has proved, that, though our regular contributions to our treasury are, in themselves, but trifling, still, they afford abundant means for affording effectual relief to all our needy members; and I am not aware that a single instance has occurred, where a lodge has not been able to meet all the demands of this kind that have been made upon its treasury. And I may safely say, that, under our present organization and regulations, no poor brother will want the necessities of life—no widow will go out to beg—no orphan be left uneducated. Such things have not been known amongst us, and they will not occur. Our means, then, are sufficient to carry out our objects.

And then, again, we save the distressed from the humiliating necessity of asking for charity. The member of this institution, by the payment of a small sum, fully within the reach of every man in health, secures to himself a positive right, not to a trifle of charity to be meted out at pleasure, but to a liberal and specified amount, in time of sickness and distress. He secures to his wife, in case of his demise, a like specified sum, and to his children the means of an education. The sick brother, therefore, appeals not to his lodge in the character of a petitioner for alms. But he goes to a fund which he has himself, in part, created; and, in the full consciousness of his independence, he claims that which is his own, by virtue of the very terms of the compact into which he has entered. There is here no crushing of the spirits, no compromise of the dignity of the man, no humbling of that laudable pride that every man ought to feel in being able to provide for himself. So of the widow: she comes not to the lodge as a beggar. But she comes with the knowledge of her rights, and she demands that boon for which she knows her husband has paid. She asks no stinted charity, to be dealt out by the miserly hand of avarice. But she asks that which is her own. So, also, with the orphan. He comes not to our halls to crave alms, as an humble mendicant; but, in the consciousness of his right, he claims care, protection and education, by virtue of what his father has done and paid. It is his inheritance from his father, and wo to the lodge, or the man, that would withhold it, or rob him of his portion. There is therefore none of that sinking of the spirits or searing of the heart, which is attendant upon the course of the beggar, and especially upon contact with the unfeeling, who turn the needy away empty.

The other objection to the system of seeking relief by means of individual charity was, that it opened wide the door for imposition and speculation. Against this also we are secured by our secrecy. There are, with us, "certain well-known signs and tokens," known only to Odd Fellows, and by which we have the means of knowing whether a man is, or is not, what he professes to be. No matter what these signs are. If they were no more than taking off the hat with the left hand instead of the right, as is usual, yet you see at once, if that were an inviolable secret, and known only to an Odd Fellow, no impostor could deceive us. And here let me say, that the only earthly use of all our signs is to preserve us from imposition. I would not give a fraction for the whole of them, so far as the things themselves are concerned. Their utility consists alone in the fact that they are secrets. And if you ask, why we do not make them known? My answer is, that if we should do so they would cease to be of any utility to us or any other person. They would serve us no better purpose than the private mark of the merchant if every one knew the key by which to read it. Should you ask why we cannot as well secure ourselves against imposition without these secrets, as a common benefit society? Our reply is, if we were confined, like such institutions, to one place, we could do so. But you will bear in mind that ours is a widely-extended fraternity, scattered over the length and breadth of this vast continent, crossing the waters and spreading over Europe; and when the stranger comes from afar, and presents a certificate, perhaps in a foreign language, we are bound to relieve his wants; but how do we know that his certificate is not a forgery, or even that he is the man in whose name it is given? We need, in such cases, security greater than a mere local institution; and this we have in our secrecy. We cannot be deceived; but when we relieve a distressed brother we have the satisfaction of knowing that he is an Odd Fellow, and as such has done a share at least to relieve others similarly situated. That the institution is perfect we cannot pretend; for what offspring of human wisdom is faultless? But we point you to the fact that this is a world of suffering, that sickness and poverty may, and death positively will come, and that suffering does exist, in nameless forms through all the world. And we present ours as an institution that combines many advantages for securing the most effectual mitigation of these evils.

We avow it as our firm conviction that there is no institution on earth which has done, and is doing more, in proportion to its numbers, for the benefit of the distressed and the poor. For this reason alone, we feel a cheering confidence, that when the objects and works of this institution are known, they will be appreciated; and we invoke upon it, in an especial manner, the smiles and the approbation of our fair friends, who of all others are most interested in its objects. I say most interested, because it is upon the tender and delicate female that the weight of adversity falls most heavily, and is felt most severely. When man's strong arm is feeble with disease, and the means of subsistence for his dependant family are cut off, he may indeed suffer; but more keen, by far, are the sufferings of his companion, who, in addition to her midnight watchings, is borne down with new and numerous cares, and oppressed with fearful apprehensions of the future. So, when death comes, and cuts down the husband and the father, when the hearthstone is desolate, and the stay and support of the family is laid in the grave, the orphans indeed may weep; but, happily for them, they cannot appreciate their loss; and, though crushed for a moment, their buoyant spirits soon recover from the shock; and as bright visions of hope dance before their eyes, they will look up and smile through their tears. But it is not so with the wife and the mother. Upon her head comes the fury of the storm. Worn down with weary watchings, she feels that a new and mighty responsibility has devolved upon her; the present is dreary, and the future dark and cheerless, and she feels not for herself alone, but more keenly than all, for the tender babes that are left unprotected in the world. To afford all the relief that human aid can afford, in seasons like these, is the prime object of our institution; and for this cause, I conceive that woman should be the last to raise her voice against it.

Man alone, under ordinary circumstances, can battle his way through the dangers and difficulties of life; and, for his own sake, he might not, perhaps, so much need the security afforded by such an institution as this. But if he have a wife and children, they may be left alone; and for her sake and theirs, a provident care for the future should admonish him of the propriety of securing for them, against the day of trial, that friendly and efficient aid which this institution so certainly extends. For me, I confess that when I look upon the little family with which heaven has blessed me, for their sakes, I cleave yet more closely to this order; for I know that should it please God to call me hence, and leave my home desolate and drear, here should my loved ones find a shelter from the storm; for the strong arm of this institution would be thrown as a protecting shield around them, to relieve the weeping partner of my joys, and take up my tender babes and bless them. Ask me not to leave it. For their sakes, I will cling to its altars, and for humanity's sake I will plead its cause.

There is still another feature in our institution, which is worthy of a passing notice. I allude to its influence upon human character through the social disposition of man. We are social beings, formed for converse, and social communion with our fellow creatures. We would not be alone, but instinctively we seek the society of our brethren of the human race; and to these associations, in a great measure, we owe the formation of our characters. I hold it to be one of the defects of our social system, that we are too much engaged in a desperate rush for the "loaves and fishes," and too little inclined to cultivate our social faculties. We do indeed mingle with our fellow-men, but it is in the bustle and confusion of business. Intent upon our object, we hurry past each other in the crowd with a nod of recognition, or meet each other in the sharp contest for gain. And when the labor of the day is over, we sit down to count our "cent per cent.," and form plans for the morrow. Possibly we may spend an hour with a few select friends; but they are men of similar pursuits, or similar political or religious opinions, and all the world besides are to us as heathens and barbarians. The consequence is, that we become unsocial in our feelings, and bigots to a creed, or slaves to a party. Who is the sour-hearted bigot and partizan, but the man who knows nothing of the world but what he has learned from communion with his own sect or his own party? Who the Ishmael, whose hand is against every man, but he that, in the midst of a thronged world, dwells in a desert alone? To me, at least, it appears evident that there is need of an institution that will bring together men of various pursuits, and different parties and sects, and give them a fellow feeling by uniting them in one work, thus laying the foundation of a broader feeling of charity, a more extended chain of social union.

Such is the institution of which we are speaking. It brings together men of every sect and party; and as they mingle, from week to week, the rough corners of prejudice are sure to be battered off—and the sharp features of hard-faceted bigotry to be smoothed and softened. Men thus learn that there is virtue in every sect and in every party, and begin to indulge more far-reaching and expanded feelings of kindness and charity. The golden chain of friendship is lengthened and brightened, the social faculties are improved, their sphere of operation enlarged, and the partition wall, that divide sect from sect, and party from party are broken down. The reason is obvious. There grows up naturally between men who commune frequently with each other, is free and familiar, but yet in dignified association, a feeling of brotherhood—a firmer friendship than can exist between men who merely jostle each other in the crowd, or in the confusion of business. If charity of feeling, and broad principles of good will to man, are worth possessing, it should always be remembered that they will not grow up spontaneously in the cloister of the monk, or the cell of the recluse. They must proceed from, or rather be drawn out by, the social principle of human nature, in a wide sense. Furious and vindictive party feeling exists alone in the man who associates with kindred spirits of his own party. Narrow-minded and dark-browed religious bigotry scowls most furiously in the face of the man who associates only with those of his own creed. Let the one and the other come out from the enclosure, and mingle with the votaries of other parties, and they will soon learn, that virtue is not confined to names; and their bigotry and acrimony will wear away. They will be better men, and better Christians; for they will imbibe more of that first and greatest of all graces, CHARITY, that "thinketh no evil." Thus it is in our lodges. There men of all parties and of various creeds meet, not as partisans but as friends and brothers, engaged in one work, bound in one common bond, and they learn to cherish toward one another more kindly feelings of love and goodwill. Friendships are formed between men of most discordant opinions, and many are brought together who would otherwise have been "most distant from each other."

When I look around upon this vast congregation and think of the occasion that has called us together, I cannot avoid contrasting the present with the past. A little more than twenty years ago, and the name of our institution was unknown in America. It had indeed existed in Europe for a period unknown to us; but on this broad continent there was not an organized body of Odd Fellows. The first lodge, organized in 1819, was composed of five members, in the humble walks of life, and held its meetings in the upper story of an obscure hotel in the city of Baltimore. Like another and a far better institution, it was born in poverty, cradled in a manger, and like that too, its subsequent history is calculated to remind us of the words of the Holy Man of old when he says, "There shall be a handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountain, but the seed thereof shall shake like Lebanon, and they of the city shall flourish as the grass of the earth." It was indeed but a small handful of corn in the desolate earth, and it was planted, too, in a spot apparently as unpropitious as the bald peaks of the snow-clad and storm-beaten mountains, where vegetation withers and dies. But it sprang up fresh and green in the sterile soil where it had been planted. Scarcely, however, had it peered above the earth when it was assailed by the storm. It was denounced as a secret and dangerous institution; an exotic and poisonous plant, that ought not to infest the soil of our country. The churches, in some instances, denounced it, and closed their doors against its members; and the ministers of religion branded it as the enemy of virtue and happiness. On the one hand, it met the slow contempt of scorn's unmoving finger; and on the other, the open hostility of the well-meaning but mistaken philanthropist. But in the midst of this war of the elements it stood, drooping, indeed, and scathed by the fury of the storm, but with its root firm in the earth, and prepared to shoot upward when the cloud should move away and the sun again illumine the heavens. Thus it continued for a season, struggling for a precarious existence, in the midst of opposition cruel and severe. But the storm has passed, the tempest has ceased its angry roar, and already the fields are white and ready for the harvest. Like the nodding plumes of the tall cedars of Lebanon, the ripening grain bends upon the parent stock, and those who "sowed in sadness are returning with joy, bearing their sheaves with them," and the reapers are about the harvest home.

How mighty the contrast! A few years ago, all that felt an interest in this institution in America could convene in a humble garret in a neighboring city. But now it stands like a mighty colossus, and plants one foot upon the extreme north-western boundary, and the other upon the southernmost point of our vast republic. With the one hand it touches the very shore of our Atlantic coast, and with the other the uttermost regions of the father of our rivers, the Mississippi; and all abroad in this wide region of liberty and virtue its temples are rising, and diffusing their benefactions to the poor and distressed, the widow and the fatherless who wait at their gates—not as the poor beggar to receive the crumbs that fall from the table, but as welcome guests, to enter and share the provisions of a plenteous board.

A few years ago and we were poor, and our means for relieving the distressed meagre and small. Now, though not rich in this world's goods, yet are we rich in the most precious of all treasures, the blessings of the widow and the fatherless, and of "him that was ready to perish," which are daily invoked upon our labors.

Thousands of sleeping voices rise up and call us blessed; and already we must count the sums devoted to their relief, not by tens and fifties, but by thousands and hundreds of thousands. A few years ago the name of an Odd Fellow was held as a bye-word and a reproach, and there were few "so poor to do it reverence." The opinion prevailed that it was a mere merry-making affair, got up for convivial and Bacchanalian purposes; and though it claimed the title of a humane and benevolent institution, it was believed that this claim was set up as a cloak of hypocrisy, to conceal practices which, if known, would meet the severest reprehension of a virtuous and intelligent people.

Then the whole order, in the United States, might have convened in this city, and paraded its streets, without attracting the attention of the passenger, or securing ought to itself but the sneers of the few who might chance to know what was passing. But now what is it that we see? A single lodge, of recent date, and but one of some hundreds, has come out to celebrate its anniversary; and this vast temple is filled with the virtuous and respectable of this community. Hoary headed sires, and strong manhood, and blooming youth, and female loveliness and beauty, are here to gladden our hearts, and cheer us on in the work of benevolence in which we are engaged.

To say that we are gratified with these results, and pleased with the presence of this large and respectable audience, is but a poor and cold expression of what we feel. We are more than gratified, more than pleased. We rejoice exceedingly in the evidence thus afforded, that we have outtrode the storm, and that, with full sails and prosperous breezes, we are gallantly sailing over smooth seas, and under calm skies, to the desired haven.

But in the midst of our rejoicings for past success, may it not be well to pause and ask, what is it that has wrought the mighty change we have been contemplating? Is it the influence of wealth? Nay, for the pioneers of our order were blessed with but a moderate share of this world's goods. Is it the power of the great names that have been enrolled among our members? No. For until recently our members have been mostly found in the humbler walks of life, with little influence but that which their own probity and virtue could command. Has it been accompanied by flaming appeals to the public? by studied systems of proselyting? or by ostentatious displays of benevolence? No, by none of these; for our aims have been given in secret, our efforts to gain members still and small, and our appeals to the public few and far between. And yet we have prospered abundantly; and, except only the religion of Christ, I do not believe that there is on earth an institution which, from a beginning so humble, and by means apparently so feeble, has made its way through such towering opposition, and risen so soon to strength and importance. But the explanation is simple and easy. The principles of our institution are such as the benevolent of all sects and parties must approve. Its only earthly object is the amelioration of the condition of suffering humanity; and we have prospered precisely in proportion as we have kept close to these principles, and devoted our energies to the promotion of the professed and legitimate objects of our association. Silently and unostentatiously, but steadily and perseveringly, have we labored in the work of benevolence. The sick have been visited, and the dark and silent watches of the night have found our members by the bed of the feeble sufferer, soothing his feverish brow and presenting the cup to his thirsty lip. They have closed the eyes of the dying; and when death has done its work, they have borne the body to the grave, and deposited it in the narrow house appointed for all the living. They have gone back to the house that was left desolate, taken up the orphans, and fed, and educated, and trained them up in knowledge and virtue, and relieved and blessed the widow in the loneliness of her destitution.

Silently and without display, yet steadily, systematically, and surely, has this work been going on; and these have been the advocates that have plead our cause, and here is the secret of all our success. In labors like these, though seen only by the distressed, and by that eye which seeth in darkness as well as in light, there is a spirit that goeth out in silent but mighty power, a voice that finds an approving response in every benevolent heart. It is the spirit of love, and that is the spirit of the great God himself, for "God is love." In works like these we are strong, and while we continue in them we are absolutely invincible. But if we shall turn aside from these to any other object, selfish or partisan, we shall suffer for our folly; for the day that sees our institution any thing else but what it now is—a purely benevolent order—will write its epitaph, as that of a thing unworthy the confidence of a virtuous and kind people. It is not, therefore, by might or by power that we may hope for a continuance of our prosperity: but the silent influence of the spirit of kindness is more potent than armies, and it will give us the victory.

The old Prophet, as he stood upon the mountain, saw the emblem of this spirit's power, as contrasted with the might of the Terrible. The furious wind came and roared about his head. Terribly it swept on, whistling in the crevices and moaning in the caves of the bare and rugged mountain. The tempest was loud and terrible; but the Lord was not in the tempest. And then came a consuming fire, licking up the very dust, and scorching and consuming every green thing, and leaving nought but smouldering ruins behind. Burning and hot was the fire! But God was not there!

And behold! there came an earthquake, deep rumbling in the bowels of the earth. The lofty peaks of the perpetual hills did bow, and the firm foundations of the everlasting mountains did tremble. The solid rocks were rent asunder, and the earth heaved as the billows of the ocean lashed by the storm. Old Horeb's turrets reeled and trembled as a "reed shaken by the wind." Terrible was the earthquake! But God was not there! The earthquake passed, and the elements were hushed and silent. And lo! there came a still small voice, softly and gently stealing over the senses, like the music of holier spheres, or as the far distant harp of angels in the paradise of God. It was the gentleness of heaven, the harmlessness of the peaceful dove. And God, in silent power, was in that voice!

Here then is the emblem of that noiseless spirit which has led us on and given us our prosperity. The emblem of it, did I say? Nay, it is the very spirit itself. For inasmuch as ours is the spirit of LOVE and KINDNESS, it is the spirit of God.

The cold-hearted and the misanthropic may look coolly on. The proud and the haughty may pass by on the other side, and leave the poor traveler naked, and weltering in gore. But angels will bend from heaven, and smile on the good Samaritan, who stoops to bind up his wounds, and pour the healing oil upon the forsaken sufferer; ay, and God himself will write the deed in the book of his remembrance, and bless and prosper him that had compassion on his suffering fellow mortal. Whether these works are done by the Churchman, or the Odd Fellow is of little consequence. They are works that Heaven will own and bless.

Let our institution continue on in these labors of love, and our past success, extraordinary as it has been, shall be but the beginning of prosperity. The rejoicings of this day, shall be but the first note in a song of triumph, that shall echo from year to year, and be borne onward from generation to generation, till its full chorus shall mingle in harmony with the songs of the blessed, in that day when the last tear shall fall from the eye of weeping humanity, and the last sigh of anguish escape from the pained heart of a creature of God.

Brethren of Knickerbocker Lodge! one word to you and I have done.

Allow me to congratulate you on this occasion. Great, and we trust healthful and permanent, has been your prosperity. But remember that action upon the great principles of our order is the best method of extending the influence and increasing the numbers of your Lodge. Go out then into the world, and do your duty, as it is taught you in your lodge, and you will continue to increase, not only in numbers but in virtue and in happiness. May your Lodge grow and prosper, deepening its foundations and extending broad its branches, bearing precious fruit. May it rise upward a beautiful temple of charity, lifting its proud dome to the sun, and illuminating the darkness of human woe, while its portals shall be filled with the widows whose tears it has dried, and the orphans it has protected and blessed.

DEATH OF QUEEN BLANCHE.

That Pedro was accessory to the violent death of this young and innocent Princess whom he had married, and immediately afterward deserted for ever, there can be no doubt. This atrocious deed was avenged abundantly; for it certainly led, in the issue, to the downfall and death of Pedro himself.

Mariana says, very briefly, that the injuries sustained by Queen Blanche had so much offended many of Pedro's own nobility, that they drew up a formal remonstrance, and presented it to him in a style sufficiently formidable; and that he, his proud and fierce temper being stung to madness by what he considered an unjustifiable interference with his domestic concerns, immediately gave orders for the poisoning of Blanche in her prison.

In the old French Memoirs of Du Guesclin, a much more improbable story is told at great length. The Queen Blanche, according to this account, had been banished to Medina, the adjoining territory being assigned to her for her maintenance. One of her vassals, a Jew, presumed to do his homage in the usual fashion, that is by kissing Blanche on the cheek, ere his true character was suspected either by her or her attendants. No sooner was the man known to be a Jew, than he was driven from the presence of the Queen with every mark of insult; and this stung so deeply into his mind, that he determined to revenge himself, if possible, by the death of Blanche. He told his story to Maria de Padilla, who prevailed on the King to suffer him to take his own measures; and he accordingly surprised the Castle of Medina by night, at the head of a troop of his own countrymen, and butchered the unhappy lady.

The ballad itself is, in all likelihood, as trust-worthy as any other authority; but the true particulars of such a crime were pretty sure to be kept concealed.

"Maria de Padilla, be not thus of dismal mood,
For if I twice have wedded me, it all was for thy good; *

Then Pedro to his chamber went, his cheek was burning red,
And to a bowman of his guard the dark command he said.

STANLEY THORN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'VALENTINE VOX.'

CHAPTER XXXV. . . . In which a highly important secret is disclosed.

Notwithstanding the earnest anxiety of the widow to disguise the real state of the case, her true position soon appeared. Persons may with success conceal their thoughts, their emotions, or even their wealth; but their poverty will not be concealed; it will out; it will make itself manifest: the more energetic may be the efforts to keep it from view, the more boldly will it rear its hateful head to proclaim its existence to the world.

If the widow, when she found herself embarrassed, had immediately retrenched, all would have been so far well as that she might have been able, with economy, to maintain something bearing the semblance of her usual style; but as, instead of acting promptly upon the principle of retrenchment, she not only lived as before, but incurred those additional expenses which are invariably consequent on an ardent desire to preserve a reputation for wealth when the means have departed, the necessity in her case for selling out became so constant that in a short time she possessed but little stock, indeed, to sell.

This she concealed as long as possible from Stanley. She trembled at the thought of its becoming known to him: the idea was, in her judgement, dreadful.

"Oh!" she would exclaim, in tones of agony, when alone, "what on earth would he say if he knew it! He must not be told; he would go raving mad! and yet how can I now keep it from him? What am I to do? How—how can I act? Oh! my poor boy! It is terrible—very, very terrible! The thought of it will drive me to distraction!"

But even this was not all. Had Stanley alone been concerned in the impending disclosure, it might have been borne; nay she would then have summoned sufficient courage to impart the dreadful secret to him at once, for her embarrassments were daily becoming deeper and deeper still; but the thought of what Sir William would say, or what he would think of it, and how he would act, tortured her so cruelly that, although in his presence she wore a constant smile, and expressed the highest pleasure, her heart was in reality full of affliction.

And oh! how she then sighed and panted to hear him propose! She had been for many months in the liveliest anticipation of being blessed by receiving a proposal in due form, and yet, albeit, in her view the question had been twenty times all but put, it had never been proposed with sufficient distinctness to warrant a formal consent. This was very distressing: it was, indeed, very. If he had but proposed to her then, all might have been well—all, at least, might have been without sorrow endured; but, although he still visited with all his wonted constancy, although he still conversed with his usual warmth and eloquence, she could not tempt him to come to the point.

At length, having waited for this important question until she began to despair, her difficulties became too palpable to escape even the tardy observation of Stanley. He had previously entertained suspicions on the subject; but, as he hated to enter into matters of a pecuniary character, those suspicions had not taken root: indeed could he have got from time to time the sums of money he required, things might have gone on and on for years, without his troubling himself to give the matter another thought. When, however, he experienced a difficulty in getting what he wanted, his previous suspicions were re-awakened, and he resolved to have them either removed or confirmed.

"Mother," said he, "yesterday I asked you for money. You put me off; you were anxious not to draw too close: I should have some soon; in a day or so; to-morrow, perhaps! Why is this? Why have you not plenty at your banker's? The time is come, mother, when I cannot but deem it necessary that I should know the cause."

The widow, without answering, burst into tears.

"Why, what is the meaning of this?" demanded Stanley, having regarded her intently for a moment. "There is something—something which you have hitherto concealed, but which must be concealed from me no longer."

"My poor boy!" sobbed the widow. "The dreadful secret must be told! I have struggled—Heaven knows I have struggled—to keep it from you."

"What is it?" cried Stanley, with impatience.

"You will never be able to bear it: I am sure you never will."

"Whatever it be, mother, let me know at once, that I may at once guard against its effect."

"Those dreadful expenses, my Stanley!—those terrible expenses!"

"Have ruined us!"

"No—no—no—no! not ruined—oh! Heaven forbid!"

"What am I to understand then?" cried Stanley. If they have not ruined us, what have they done?"

"So embarrassed us, my Stanley,—that you must—oh, how it afflicts me to tell you!—you must, at least for a time, manage to live upon the estate which was purchased for your qualification."

"Impossible! How can I live on a pitiful three or four hundred a year? How can I entertain those friends whom

I have been in the habit of entertaining? How can I meet them? How can I even show my face, mother?"

"Stanley, do not be rash: pray do not be impetuous! You will break my heart! indeed, my love, indeed it was all done for you. Come, come! You will be calm, dear Stanley? You will be calm? You will not make this wound deeper than it is, or cause it to rankle, dear Stanley? Heaven knows I would have given worlds if this dreadful disclosure could by any earthly means have been avoided."

"Why did you not tell me before? Why bury me up with the hope—nay, with the absolute belief that our fortunes had not been materially affected? Why did you not explain to me at once that we were ruined, beggared, comparatively beggared?"

"I dared not; indeed, my love, I dared not do it. I dreaded nothing on earth more. But, believe me, dear, I'll make every sacrifice in my power to promote your happiness still."

"Sacrifice! What sacrifice have you now the power to make?"

"I'll reduce my establishment; I'll put down my carriage; I'll do any thing in the world to diminish my expenditure; indeed, dear, I will; I'll live retired—quite retired. I shall be happy—I feel I shall be happy—very happy, if you are but so."

"Do not talk to me of happiness, mother. How can you, or I, or any one be happy when fallen? The idea is monstrous! You now perceive the consequence, I hope, of endeavoring to conceal every thing from me."

"Believe me, dear Stanley, I did all for the best."

"But do you think that if I had known what I ought to have known I would have opposed that petition? Do you think that I would have been guilty of an act of madness so palpable, so glaring? Why was the thing kept from me?"

"My love, you know that I am at all times unwilling to annoy you. You know that if it were possible to prevent it I would not have your mind distressed for the world."

"Well!" cried Stanley, still pacing the room with violence. "The thing is done. The die is cast. We are ruined. Now I suppose I may know something of your affairs!"

"My dear Stanley, all shall be explained."

"I insist upon having all explained."

"You shall have it, my dear; yes, believe me, you shall. But, although very terrible, it is not so bad as you imagine—it is not, indeed."

"I do not imagine that we are reduced to actual beggary; but I do imagine that henceforth our position will be sufficiently mean to cause society to shun us. I cannot live on three or four hundred a year."

"I know—I know you cannot; nor will there be any necessity for you to endeavor to do so: I feel perfectly sure that there will not. No—no, my dear, things may yet be better than you suppose—much better. Let us hope for the best. I am sure I do not know myself yet how we stand. But my affairs shall be immediately adjusted—yes, I'll have them all investigated properly and at once; and then we shall see, dear Stanley—we shall see."

Stanley was suddenly silent. A dreary prospect opened to his view. And in the whole social scale there is perhaps no position so annoying, so perpetually painful, or so pregnant with temptation to dishonor, as that of a young and ardent spirit who—being without influential family connections, and at the same time without a profession—finds himself suddenly thrown upon his own resources, or placed below the sphere—be that sphere what it may—in which he had theretofore moved. The uncontrollable nature of circumstances renders the folly—it may be termed, the thoughtless cruelty—of teaching young men to depend solely upon the wealth of relatives, instead of giving them a profession upon which to fall back in case of need, so conspicuous, that it is in truth amazing, when reverses of fortune so constantly occur, that the paltry pride of parents on this great point should be suffered to supersede their manifest duty.

This darkly appeared to Stanley then; and the more darkly, seeing that he had no direct knowledge of the position to which he had been reduced; but the widow, being far more sanguine, scarcely gave this a thought: her strongest apprehension was that of losing Sir William; it was that which in reality afflicted her most, and, being almost unable to endure the thought of the discontinuance of his visits, she would have gone on as usual, in the lively anticipation of a formal proposal being made, had not Stanley, being impatient to know the worst, insisted upon an immediate investigation of affairs, which accordingly commenced without further delay.

CHAPTER XXXVI. . . . Shows how a reconciliation took place between Bob and his venerable friend.

When the reduction of an establishment is about to take place, and more especially if the establishment be an old one, whatever may be the tact with which it is managed, whatever may be the secrecy with which you proceed, it is perfectly sure to be generally known: indeed, any attempt at secrecy does but increase the evil, inasmuch as it establishes a mystery, and mysteries invariably teem with conjectures, which are certain to make the thing worse than it is.

Now this is, of course, a remarkable fact, and one, moreover, ascribable solely to one's utter inability to get rid of servants under the circumstances with any degree of quietude or comfort. When these useful people have long been in the habit of giving "good satisfaction," they well know that they would not be discharged without a cause, and you cannot—no act of caprice can—deprive them of the additional knowledge of whether their conduct in reality constitutes that cause or not. If it do, why there, of course, is an end of the matter; but if it do not, they watch events narrowly, and if none be engaged in their places, they see how it is, and never fail to report what they see; in fact, they deem it their duty to do so in their own justification, and that they ought to be justified is strictly correct.

Now in this particular case the afflicted widow no sooner found it to be necessary for her to relinquish her carriage, and in consequence to discharge her old coachman, and several other servants, than the news flew with such unexampled rapidity that on the evening of the memorable day in which the servants had notice, Bob received the following letter from his venerable friend:

"DEAR ROBERT," "General Johnstone Stables."

"allow i aint Seed nothink on yu fore A werry konsiderbell peerid off thyme sirkumstanahalls la cum toe mi nollege witch kornes Me fore to feel werry fillisoffoele about yu kornes hive A inkelliaashun fore toe think frum wot hived eared yule bee throwed out off plaice if so and vule kum and pig we me hit sharnt kost yer a apney for nothink wile yer out and I des say i kan get yu into somethink as soon As i kan for becin out is onkommon heckspensyve a noboddy dont git fat at It speahly as thymes is werry rotten butt wy Dont yu Do me the onner off a korn hay kum there Ain't no maliss kum an letts ave a Drain toogetther As we yoused kornes yu hare a goodd sort an i never took yu fore nothink ellse so No more at present from yure Werry pertickeller frend joseph coggles."

The immediate effect of this generous and gentlemanly epistle was to throw the whole of Bob's mental faculties into a state of confusion. He read it again and again with a view to understand not only the words but the feelings by which they were prompted. It was the first formal letter he had ever received, and while it tended to raise him in his own estimation as a person of importance, it amazed him, for he had really entertained no suspicion of that which the venerable gentleman had intimated with so much distinctness. What could be the meaning of it? What had he done? He was sure that he had been particularly attentive of late. Besides, he had heard no complaint. Had any pernicious person succeeded in secretly subverting his fair reputation? Could it be possible?

As he sat in silent solitude upon half a truss of hay in the stall which invariably formed his studio, he weighed with the utmost nicety the bearings of each conjecture as it arose; but having been thus engaged for sometime, without being able to arrive at any really satisfactory conclusion, he started up with the full determination to ascertain what it meant from the lips of his venerable friend.

It is true, very true, that in saluting Joanna the venerable gentleman had annoyed him, and yet, on serious reflection, why should he feel annoyed? What was Joanna to him? She had been kind, she had been friendly, she had made suet dumplings exclusively for him, and had prepared hot suppers almost every night during his master's parliamentary career, which was certainly very affectionate; but then, had he ever proposed to Joanna? Had he ever even led her to believe that he wished to propose? Nay, had he that wish? Decidedly not! at least not that he knew of. Why then should he feel thus annoyed? He had no right to entertain any such feeling. He would be annoyed no longer! He made up his mind at once not to be annoyed, and having done so, he started off to have this deep mystery solved.

On reaching the General's stables, he beheld in one corner his venerable friend sitting studiously upon a basket duly turned upside down, with a pen in his right hand, and the forefinger of his left upon his temple, laboring to turn a bright conception into shape with an expression of the most intense thought. The very instant, however, he became conscious of Bob's presence, he relinquished his pen, and greeted him in his usual affectionate style, by striking a pugilistic attitude of a character extremely scientific and picturesque.

Having squared at each other with great ability for some considerable time, they simultaneously seized each other's hand, which they shook with remarkable fierceness and affection; and when these, and other equally indispensable preliminaries had been to their mutual satisfaction accomplished, the venerable gentleman broke silence by expressing with all his characteristic eloquence the unexampled gladness of his heart.

"But Bobby, my Briton," he added, "wot's the matter atween us? Friends vich is friends shoold never be on-friendly!"

"I'm not unfriendly!" said Bob.

"There you are! the hold business hover agin! the sum total 'mounts ony to a misanderstandin', and cert'ny misanderstandin's is the rummest things alive. Vy, wot d'yer think the hold General did the other day now? I'll tell yer: two friends of his'n had a sort of a misanderstandin' about nothink: they wos werry cold, and coodn't ha' told vy if the'd bin arst. Werry well, wot does he do but he goes to the basket, and picks out their cards, and then sends 'em to each other's houses, as if they wos sent by themselves! Wot wos the sconsquence? Vy they at once returned wot they both took to be the compliment boney fido, and as each flattered himself that the other had made the fast advances, and wos willin' for to meet him arf way, they met in course for all the world as if nothink had happened, and a reconciliation took place."

"Well, that was n't a bad move, mind yer," said Bob.

"It wos hexcellent, cos they on'y wanted for to be brought together to be all right agin. And that's the case with these misanderstandin's atween friends. But it's all reg'lar now atween us? Eh? Give us yer 'and! Let's go over to the tap, and say nothink more about it."

To the tap they accordingly went, and after touching slightly upon the state of the nation, and two or three important political points which were just then at issue, Bob, being impatient to have explained to him the various intimations contained in the venerable gentleman's epistle, produced that mysterious document, and having read it with due emphasis, begged to know what it all meant.

"Wot does it mean?" cried the venerable gentleman, elevating his eyebrows in a state of amazement. "Wot! ain't you then seed your old missus's coachman?"

"No," replied Bob, "not lately."

"Vell, but do you mean to say you do n't know there's a screw werry loose?"

"Have n't heard nothing of it."

"Vell, send I may live! Vy the 'stablishment's goin' to be broke up reg'lar!"

"You do n't mean that!"

"But I do, and nothink but! Coachman was 'ere last night as ever wos to explain the 'ole business, and the perticklers cert'ny looks werry queer. He's got vornin'; they've almost hall on 'em got vornin', and from wot I can learn, things is goin' hall to smash!"

"You do n't say so!" cried Bob, whose countenance developed the utmost astonishment. "You stagger me regular. I thought they had a mint."

"And so they had; but coachman tells me thish ere parleymentary business 'as kicked it all down."

"Ar, I thought they was going too fast."

"And so did I," rejoined the venerable gentleman; and it really is amazing how prone men in general are to anticipate things when they have actually taken place, and how fully their conjectures then are borne out by facts. "It struck me frequent," he continued, "that they never cood stand them air evey expenses. But I'm werry sorry for it; cos, from wot I 'ear, your master's got nothink but wot he 'as from the old lady; so if she goes, he must go with her."

"Safe!" returned Bob. "And it hurts my sentiments very acute, 'cause he is a trump, and there can't be two opinions about it. But what I look at most is missis, 'cause she is a regular good un, and I'd go to the bottom of the sea to serve her. What must her feelings be, mind you, eh? I do n't think she knows a bit about it as yet; but when she comes for to be told, eh? Safe to break her heart."

"I don't know," said the venerable gentleman. "Vimmin genelly bears these rewersees much better than men. And it likewise makes 'em more dewoted. I've seen it frequent. Ven all goes on prosperous, they've plenty of scope to make themselves onhappy about nothink, and feels themselves at liberty to pitch into their husbands, cos, as they do n't vont for nothink, they don't know wot they vont; but on'y let their husbands have a rewerse, and they 're at once all affection. Vot is it they vood n't do then if they cood! And if they can't get 'em over it, they 'll kiss 'em, and make it seem better than it is, and try to persuade 'em not to mind it, and get 'em to bear up against it like men. That's the p'int! Vimmin is rum swells to deal with."

"I agree with you there," rejoined Bob. "But I say! ain't your principles on this here particular p'int a little changed, eh? Did n't you used to tell me, that when things went wrong, they 'd pitch into you the more?"

"Ar," replied the venerable gentleman, whom the question had slightly confused, "that's ven they 're regular hout and hout wixens."

Bob shook his head. He perceived at a glance the inconsistency of his venerable friend, and being anxious to know the extent to which his opinions upon the matter had changed, he took occasion to intimate gently that he had an idea that the views which he had once entertained on the subject of matrimony were not precisely those which he entertained then.

"It strikes me forcible," he added, "that they 're, in p'int of fact, particularly different; 'cause I somehow or another have a sort of a notion that you and our cook is a managing of matters, do you know?"

At this moment the venerable gentleman blushed—ay, actually blushed!—but on recovering himself a trifle, he smiled, and said, "Vy, Bobby, vot makes you think so?"

"'Cause she's a continually sighing and talking about you, and looking arter the postman, and receiving of letters, which is writ in a fist werry similar to yours."

Again the venerable gentleman looked extremely red. He saw at once that, in sending a letter to Bob in an undisguised hand, he had not acted with his customary caution.

"You write a decent stick, though," continued Bob, playfully. "The 'i's is all dotted, and the hizzards is werry respectable."

"I see," said the venerable gentleman, shaking his head with great significance. "I see I've let the cat out of the bag. But it ain't of much odds, cos I do n't s'pose I'm puttin' your nose out of j'int?"

"Not a bit of it! Oh! it ain't no odds to me, you know. Only all I look at is this—she's a cook, you know, and cooks is all warrant, eh?—do n't you recollect?"

"And so they are," returned the venerable gentleman—"so they are, in the common course of natur"; but Joanna is one in fifty million! That's the p'int! I'll be bound to say you do n't find another sich a cook in a day's march!"

"She's a good un of the sort," observed Bob, cavalierly. "A good un! I believe yer. There's no mistake about her!"

"But however you come to be caught after all your experience, is a thing which gets quite over me. I can't at all understand it. A deader mystery I never come across."

"Vy, look ear," said the venerable gentleman, with a philosophic aspect. "Did you ever 'appen to see an unexperienced young gray-hound a-playing with a leveret, a-rolling of it over and over, and a-pawing it, and licking it, and not exactly knowin' vot to do with it?"

"Can't say I ever did."

"Did yer ever see a kitten a-playing with a mouse, a-purring and singing to it reg'lar, a-letting of it run, and springing arter it ag'in, vile the little onfort'nate wictim is arf dead with fright?"

"Yes, that I have seen."

"Werry well, then, wot do they play with 'em for? Ain't it cos they know nothink about 'em? Ain't it cos they never tasted the blood of them there animals, and do n't know wot it is? Vy, in course. But let 'em jist walk their teeth into one—let them have but one taste, and they 're always then a-hankerin' and yarnin' arter 'em wiolent. And that's the case with me. I never loved reg'lar afore: I never knowed wot it was to love; but now that I've tasted it, and knows wot it is, and finds it nat'ral to like it, I can't never be 'appy without the hobjer of that love, vich is her as I knows loves me. That's the p'int."

"Well," said Bob, "I hope she 'll turn out a regular good 'un."

"Safe to be a good un! Safe to be 'appy! She's the kindest and comfortabest creature in life. I never see her feller, and I've seed above a few on 'em in my time, you know. She's cert'n'y hout-an'-hout."

"Well, all I can say, you know, is, may she never be anything but. They do, mind you, sometimes turn out queer."

"But you do n't s'pose I've lived all these here 'ears for nothink! No, no, Bobby; hold birds ain't ketched with chaff. I shoob be blind if I cood n't tell wot a woman wos. I can see right clean through 'em in a hinstant. No—come, we ain't a-going to be done exactly arter all this 'ere experience, nayther!"

"Well, well," said Bob, "you ought to know a little about it."

"I flatter myself," returned his venerable friend, "I just do."

"Well, and when do you think about doing the trick?"

"Vy, that depends a little upon circumstantialia. If your 'establishment's broke up, yer know, as well as the old lady's, vy, it von't be vuth vile for her to take another place."

"No more it won't," observed Bob. "But do n't it strike you as very strange that I ain't heard nothink about it?"

"The most singularlest thing alive!" returned the venerable gentleman. "They ought at least to 'ave named it, if they did nothink helse."

"But do you know, now, I do n't think it 'll be so after all."

The venerable gentleman admitted that such a thought as that might be entertained, but strongly advised him, nevertheless, to prepare. He then repeated those generous offers which his gentlemanly letter contained; and when Bob had acknowledged in grateful terms the friendly feeling by which those offers were characterised, they pressed each other's hands, had another pot, and parted.

CHAP. XXXVII. . . . In which Stanley resolves to retrieve his fortunes.

Although the news of the reduction of the widow's establishment travelled fast from Bob's venerable friend to the General's cook, from the cook to the lady's maid, from the maid to Miss Johnson, and from that young lady to the General, both he and Captain Jolliffe, whom he subsequently told, deemed it a point of too much delicacy to justify any direct inquiry into the matter.

The first object of Stanley—when he found that all he had to depend upon was the estate, which yielded barely three hundred a year—was to conceal the altered state of affairs from Amelia; and when he had taken steps to accomplish this, at least for a time, he devoted all his energies with the view of retrieving their fortunes.

But then how was this to be done? Should he enter the army? No; that would not do. Should he endeavor to obtain some colonial appointment? He had not the slightest wish to leave England; and even if he had, where was his political influence? He thought of a hundred things by which his condition might be improved, but not one which was, under the circumstances, practicable.

At length Sir William—who had never allowed a syllable having reference to these embarrassments to escape him—became acquainted with a project by which he fondly hoped that Stanley might be involved in utter ruin. At that time several men of high connections—one of whom was by courtesy an Earl—having lost on various occasions immense sums at play, and being experienced and highly accomplished gamblers, conceived the idea of taking a house themselves, and putting down sub rosa a bank of their own. This they fancied would be a most profitable speculation; and as the aid of Sir William, by whom they were all perfectly well known, had been solicited, he held it to be an excellent opportunity of sinking the remnant of Stanley's fortune, by inducing him to join them.

He accordingly lost no time in communicating with Stanley on the subject, but took especial care to proceed with the utmost caution. At first he mentioned it as a mere matter of news; but when he found that Stanley caught at the project, he gradually entered into the most minute explanations, and made the success of the scheme appear certain.

"Well," said Stanley, when the matter had been explained, "why don't you join them?"

"Why, you see, I have at present so much on my hands, and the probability is that it would divert my attention from matters which require a deal of thought. Besides, you know, I'm not a very speculative man; and these things, to succeed, must be entered into boldly."

"Of course nothing but strict honor is intended?"

"Why, the character of those who are engaged in the scheme would alone, one would think, be a sufficient guarantee against dishonorable practices."

"Of course! But is it not singular that men of their character and standing in society should descend to enter into a speculation of the kind?"

"Why the descent of itself is not very tremendous. The difference between playing against a bank and playing with one—except in so far as the profits are concerned—is but slight. They would not, of course, like it to be generally known that they were engaged in a speculation of this sort; nor would they, in fact, like it to be generally known that they frequented houses of that description at all; but in the abstract it certainly is as honorable to put down the bank as it is to play against it."

"It merely struck me at the moment as being rather singular."

"And so it is. If it were usual, it would be thought nothing of."

"Well," said Stanley, "the idea is certainly novel. I should really like to join them."

"I should recommend you not."

"Why?" inquired Stanley.

"Merely because I think that it might occupy too much of your time. Besides, Thorn, when you play, it is solely for pleasure; now their sole object is profit. There is another thing: they have of late lost considerable sums of money, which they are resolved to regain, and it is more-over necessary that they should do so; but you are not in that position."

"Perhaps not," rejoined Stanley, whom the reason assigned urged on the mere. "But when we play, as you say, for pleasure, is not profit invariably the chief object we have in view? Are not the pleasures of play derived from winning, coupled with the hope of winning more? Are losses productive of pleasure?"

"It certainly is not very pleasurable to lose; but that is an altogether different thing. Here we have a direct and well-organized speculation, the object of the speculators being to regain a certain sum. That their object will be accomplished there can be but little doubt; but then look at the anxiety!—what can repay them for that?"

"The attainment of their object alone! Now it appears to me to be the very kind of speculation into which I should like to enter."

"Well—but what which I look at is the necessity which exists in their case, and not in yours. Of course I'll introduce you with pleasure, and I am sure that they would like you to join them exceedingly; but if you do, you must expect to be annoyed—at least I know that the constant settlements, the division of the profits, and all that sort of thing, would annoy me."

"Very likely. But I have not, you know, so much to attend to as you have, which makes all the difference. When shall I see them?"

"Oh! we'll go when you please—this evening, if you like; [but I should advise you before we go to think the matter over.]"

"Yes; that of course I'll do. Well, shall we say this evening?"

"Oh yes! I'll call for you at what hour?"

"You may as well dine with me, and then we can start from here direct."

"Very well; be it so. I have a few little matters to attend to this morning, and while I am about them you can be turning the thing over in your mind; but still, if I were you, I should say it would be scarcely worth my while to trouble my head about it. However, it is for you to decide. We shall again see each other at seven."

Sir William then left, and as he entered his cab—"Every man," thought Stanley, "knows his own business best. He has no idea of my real position. His advice, therefore, goes for nothing. He still thinks that I am wealthy. He has not the slightest notion that my necessities are as great as the necessities of those whom I shall join. It is hence that he conceives that I shall deem the constant division of the profits an annoyance!"

Stanley smiled at this idea, and then proceeded to calculate what the profits of such a speculation were likely to be; and while he was thus engaged—with the gain of tens of thousands floating upon the current of his rich imagination—Sir William, who was by no means so ignorant of the matter as Stanley supposed, was conversing with the projectors of the scheme, and representing Stanley as being a young fellow who had brilliant expectations, and who would be an unquestionable acquisition, if they could but secure him.

"But is he likely to be caught?" inquired the noble Earl. "Will he come in?"

"That I must leave entirely to you. He is to be managed."

"Has he much stuff in hand?"

"Why, it matters but little, you know, whether he has or not."

"His paper is good, of course?" interposed 'Captain' Filcher, who had engaged to be the nominal proprietor of the concern.

"Safe as the bank," replied Sir William.

"Then of course," rejoined Filcher, "it's regular."

And so it was in his view, and also in that of the noble Earl, who expressed an anxiety to see Stanley, and begged of Sir William to bring him that evening, in order that he might at once be fixed, which Sir William promptly promised to do; and they parted.

During dinner, although no word was spoken on the subject which Amelia could understand, Sir William perceived that Stanley's views were unaltered. He was therefore in high spirits, and conversed with unusual animation, and studiously applauded every sentiment which Amelia advanced. His marked attention to her would, in the mind of a stranger, have excited suspicion; but his freedom of manner and of speech had been so cautiously, so gradually assumed, that its progress had been to them imperceptible.

"I wish your mamma were here, Stanley," said Amelia, on the table being cleared.

"Yes," replied Stanley, "she would have been company for you while we are absent."

"Then are you naughty people going to leave me?"

"Business, my love, business. I shall not be late."

"Oh! I anticipated quite a delightful evening."

"For my part, said the wily baronet, looking at Stanley, 'I think we had better remain where we are.'"

"There's a good creature!" cried Amelia. You ought to be recognised generally as the champion of the ladies. Is it of importance, dear Stanley?"

"It is, my love. I must go; but I shall return very early."

"Well, do not let me interfere with business. But how long shall I give you? Shall I say twelve o'clock?"

"Do not name any time, because I like to be punctual; and if we say twelve o'clock, I may stop till that time, when otherwise I might be home earlier."

"Very well; but return as soon as you can—there's a dear."

"You really are an admirable wife," said Sir William, to whom the gentle affection displayed by Amelia was wormwood.

"Now you are pleased to flatter," she returned, with a smile.

"No, upon my honor."

"Well, I appreciate your good opinion," rejoined Amelia, gaily. "Stanley ought in due form to acknowledge the compliment, seeing that he has made me what I am. We must ascribe all the merit to him. Admirable husbands make admirable wives—is it not so?"

"It is amiable on the part of those admirable wives to think so."

"Nay, but is it not so in reality?"

"The belief, I fear, is not universally entertained."

"I should say not," interposed Stanley. "The most brutal husbands have the most gentle wives; and as you see in my case, the more mild and affectionate a man is, the more advantage his wife takes of that mildness and affection, the more she will tyrannise over him, and make him feel her power."

Amelia smiled, and was about to concede that with the thoughtless and the vulgar it sometimes happened that both husbands and wives took advantage of amiability and devotion; but as Stanley at the moment gave the signal, they rose; and, on taking leave, Sir William pressed the hand of Amelia with so much warmth, that although she attributed it to nothing but the purest friendship, she felt an almost involuntary inclination to withdraw it. The effect, however, was but instantaneous; she bade him adieu with her wonted smile, and then embraced her Stanley with the fondest affection.

Having entered the cab, Stanley, being impatient, started off with so much swiftness, that Bob—who had anticipated nothing of the sort, and who had to run like lightning for five hundred yards before he could catch the cab to get up behind—very naturally conceived that there was something additional amiss.

"Another blessed screw loose!" said he, very privately, to himself. "I'm glad he's got somebody with him; although, as it is, I must mind what I'm at. In this here ticklish state of transactions, masters ain't very particular about gratitude; and there's something a little extra o'clock to-night, I know!"

The expediency of looking out with an eagle's eye having thus appeared clear to his view, he leaped from behind with such amazing alacrity when Stanley pulled up, that he was at the head of the horse in an instant.

"Another blessed four o'clock business," said he, muttering with great caution, as Stanley and Sir William entered a brilliantly illuminated club-house. "When every individual winder's in a blaze they pinto to four of half-past, safe! Won't you stand still?" he added, aloud, addressing his horse, "or am I to go for to make you? Don't you think I've enough to put up with? Ain't it ten times worse than listing for a soger? As true as I'm alive masters now-a-days aint got no bowels for servants at all!"

Whereupon he stepped leisurely into the cab, and having driven a short distance from the door, he adjusted himself snugly in the off corner of the vehicle, with the view of having a few hours soft repose.

On entering one of the private rooms of the club, Stanley was formally presented to the noble Earl, Captain Filcher, and two other dashing persons, who appeared to be highly pleased to see him. They had evidently been entering into certain calculations having reference to the scheme, the result of which had put them in great spirits; but no allusion whatever was made to the project for some considerable time.

At length, having freely conversed on the various topics of the day and become thereby better acquainted with each other, the noble Earl opened the subject of the speculation, the success of which he described as being perfectly certain; and having dwelt upon the brilliant character of the anticipated profits, and proved in theory all that it was necessary to prove, Stanley became so satisfied that he entered at once into his views, and expressed himself anxious to join them.

The noble Earl of course explained how happy he should be to have him as a partner in the speculation, and as his title, independently of his gentlemanlike bearing, had great weight with Stanley, he felt highly honored.

"And what will it be necessary for us to put down?" he inquired.

"Why, according to our calculation," replied the noble Earl, "a capital of ten thousand will in all probability realize a hundred thousand pounds in three months. But we need not put it all down at once. Let me see; there are five of us. Of course we must expect to lose a trifle at first—it will in fact be expedient to do so. Now, I think that if we each of us put down five hundred to begin with, it will do; but, of course, it will be well, in order to make all sure, for each to be prepared with two thousand."

This proposition was made to all concerned, and agreed to, and when the agreement had been drawn up and signed, they set aside all business, made an appointment to meet the next morning at the house which Captain Filcher had partly engaged, and spent a jovial evening together.

On the following morning they accordingly met, and were all much pleased with the house; and as Filcher had had some experience in fitting up 'clubs,' he undertook to prepare it with all possible expedition. But Stanley was in timine puzzled. How was he to raise his share of the sum required? He could no longer draw money of the widow. Should he mortgage his estate? As this appeared to be the only way in which it could be managed, he resolved at once to do it; but as on the day in which this resolution was formed he happened to call at the club, to see what progress had been made, and found Filcher alone, his views on the subject were changed.

Filcher, who had received certain hints from Sir William, regarded this call as auspicious. He was therefore unusually anxious to win Stanley's confidence, and after showing him the furniture he had hired, and the tables he had purchased, and explaining certain mysteries of play, he got him over a bottle of wine, and became excessively communicative and friendly.

"I do n't know, of course, how you are situated," said he, when he fancied that Stanley had been sufficiently warned, "but men who may have the power to command a mint of money are not at all times flush. I merely allude to this in order to intimate that if you should at any time happen to be short, I have already so much confidence in you—and one can always tell pretty well what a man is—that I shall be happy to lend you my acceptance. But, mind, this is strictly between ourselves. I do not wish it to go farther, because in the present state of the world there are few men indeed whom I would do it for on any account; but for you I should be proud to do it, if such a thing should ever be required, to the extent of a thousand or so."

"Well," said Stanley, who was struck with the friendly feeling displayed by Captain Filcher, "I certainly feel flattered; and it strangely enough happens that I was just about to raise a sum of money by way of mortgage."

"Bills are much more convenient. They save a world of trouble. They have but to be drawn to command the sum required, and when at maturity the thing is at an end. What sum do you want to raise?"

"I thought of two thousand."

"Well!—I shall be happy to lend you my acceptance for that amount."

"But what security shall I give?"

"Your honor, Mr. Thorn, will be a sufficient security for me."

"But I think that every man ought to have some more tangible security than that."

"Oh, nonsense!—not among friends!"

"I should feel more satisfied."

"Well, if that be the case, give me your acceptance for the same amount. I positively refuse to take any other security from you."

This was kind, very kind, on the part of Captain Filcher. Stanley at least strongly felt it to be so, and inquired when the bills should be drawn.

"When you please," returned the Captain. "It may as well be done now as at any other time. Let me see—in- stead of having one bill for two thousand, you had better have four, you know, for five hundred each. You will find them more negotiable."

"I must be guided by you," observed Stanley, who at the same moment drew out his purse. "Can we send for the stamps?"

"By the by," cried the Captain, drawing for this pocket-book, "it strikes me I've a lot of stamps here!" And it singularly enough did happen that he found just eight of the very stamps required.

"Well," said he, "this is extraordinary! I knew that I had some, but I had no idea of what they were. They will save us the trouble of sending out for them at all events."

Stanley agreed with him perfectly in this, and offered to pay for them; but the Captain refused to receive a single shilling. "No," said he, "I am not a dealer in stamps. They are of no use whatever to me, and may as well be filled up for this purpose as not."

The bills were then drawn at two months. At the suggestion of the Captain, the dates were slightly varied. He drew four, and four were drawn by Stanley; and when each had accepted those which the other had drawn, they exchanged acceptances as a mere matter of mutual security.

"Have you any channel open?" inquired the Captain, when the exchange had been made. "I mean," he added, perceiving that he was not understood, "do you know any one who will discount those bills?"

"Upon my honor, I do not. I never had occasion to draw one before. But I suppose there will be no difficulty at all about that?"

"Oh! not the least in life." I'll undertake to get them cashed for you at once."

"I do n't like to trouble you," said Stanley; "but at the same time I really wish you would."

"My dear fellow, do n't name the trouble!" cried the Captain. "I'll do it with infinite pleasure. You shall have the cheque in the morning."

Whereupon Stanley returned him his own acceptances for the purpose of discount, and having warmly acknowledged this additional obligation, left him in possession of the whole of the bills.

The next morning he called for the promised cheque, and found the Captain excessively busy with the workmen, who were engaged, under his superintendence, in decorating the principal drawing-room, apparently for some immediate purpose.

"My dear fellow," said he, as Stanley entered, "these things cannot possibly be done until to-morrow."

"That will do quite as well," replied Stanley.

"I thought that it would make no difference to you?"

"Oh dear me, no, not the slightest. But what room is this intended for? You appear to have been very expeditious in fitting it up."

The captain smiled, and drew Stanley aside. "You have heard nothing of it, then?" said he, scotto voce. "This room is being adorned to give éclat to a private marriage. It will take place this evening by special licence. Will you join us?—it will be delicious sport."

"But who are the parties?"

"I am bound not to tell that; but you know the bridegroom. Say you will be here. It will come off precisely at eight."

"But will my presence be agreeable to those most concerned?"

"Agreeable! My dear fellow, they will all be delighted. You positively must be here!"

"Well," returned Stanley, "in that case I'll come. But I shall like to know who the parties are."

"All in good time, my dear fellow," cried the captain. "But the thing must positively be kept a profound secret until the job's done."

"Oh ho! I comprehend!" said Stanley. "Papa is in the way."

"Out, my boy!—for once in your life out! There's no papa in the case; and what is more, my dear fellow, mamma will be here! At half-past seven, recollect, you will have the felicity of being presented to her and the beautiful bride. You will not, therefore, on any account fail?"

"I will not. But do n't let me interrupt you another moment. For the present adieu."

"Adieu, my dear fellow! Remember the time! When you know all, my boy, you'll say it's delicious!"

"This is strange!" thought Stanley, on leaving the house. "And I know the bridegroom! Who on earth can it be? Can it be Wormwell? Very likely; and yet he surely would have named it to me at least! Well, it is useless to conjecture."

And so in reality it was; but his imagination teemed with conjectures nevertheless. There was a mystery in the matter, by which his curiosity had been strongly excited, and that excitement continued throughout the morning un- subdued.

He was, therefore, as a matter of course, punctual; indeed he was there somewhat before the appointed time, and found the bridegroom to be his new friend the noble earl, who presented him at once to the bride.

Well, as far as the bridegroom was concerned, of course the mystery was solved; but in his view there was something mysterious still. The bride!—true, she was rather a beautiful girl, but she was evidently not a lady, while her mamma—Stanley could n't understand it! He tried to converse with the bride; but "Yes, sir,"—"No, sir," and "Very, sir," appeared to be about the only original sentences she had the ability to utter. Her mamma, however, made up for all, by announcing it loudly to be her settled conviction that special licences were far more respectable than banns.

"Why, I say," cried the captain, when the hour had arrived, "where's the reverend swell? Time's up!"

"Oh, he'll be here shortly," returned the noble earl.

"He is safe to come, I suppose?"

At this moment a carriage drove up to the door, and almost immediately afterward he, by whom the ceremony had to be performed, walked solemnly into the room. As he entered, he bowed profoundly to all around; and as the bridegroom promptly asked him to take a glass of wine, he as promptly filled a bumper, and winked at the bridegroom, which Stanley conceived to be particularly odd. He remained, however, silent; they clearly understood it, although he did not: and the ceremony, without the smallest loss of time, commenced.

"Dear! beloved," said the reverend gentleman, "we are gathered together here for the purpose of joining this man and this woman. Wilt thou have this woman? Wilt thou love her, comfort her, and keep her?"

The noble earl answered, "I will."

"Wilt thou have this man? Wilt thou obey him, love, honor, and serve him?"

The bride tremblingly faltered out, "I will."

"Who giveth this woman to this man?"

The captain took the hand of the bride, and gave it to the reverend gentleman, and when he had transferred it to the noble earl, the ring was put on, and the ceremony ended.

Stanley stood amazed, and the bride's mamma observed that the ceremony, she fancied, was rather short, but suggested that it was in all probability unfashionable to have it longer when performed by special licence. She was therefore quite satisfied; and having taken just sufficient champagne to cause her to be content with almost any thing, she began to extol with surpassing volubility the prominent virtues of "my daughter the countess, and my dear son-in-law the noble earl."

The captain then called for a bumper, and all charged.

"I give you," said he, "a health to the bride and bridegroom! I propose it thus early, because I know that as they have to travel some distance to-night, we shall soon be deprived of their charming society. The health of the bride and bridegroom!—the bridegroom and the bride!"

The toast was duly honored, and the noble earl in an eloquent speech returned thanks; shortly after which he, his trembling bride, and her delighted mamma, took leave, and started in a carriage and four.

The very moment they had left, the reverend gentleman threw aside his surplice amidst loud roars of laughter.

"What is the meaning of this?" inquired Stanley, of the captain.

"What! do n't you understand it?"

"Upon my honor, I do not."

"Then it's no longer surprising that the old woman was deceived. Do n't you think it was done admirably, considering our parson is not in orders?"

"You do not mean to say that this has been a mock marriage?"

"Why, of course! It was the only way in which that girl could be had! Mild and gentle as she appears, he has been trying in vain to seduce her in the regular way for the last six months."

Stanley was so indignant on receiving this intelligence, so incensed at being thus made a party to a proceeding so vile, that he rose on the instant, and quitted the house with a feeling of ineffable disgust.

A MARRIED MAN'S REVERIE.

What a blockhead my brother Tom is, not to marry! or rather, perhaps, I should say, what a blockhead not to marry some twenty-five years ago, for I suppose he'd hardly get any decent sort of a body to take him, as old as he is now. Poor fellow! what a forlorn, desolate kind of a life he leads; no wife to take care of him—no children to love him—no domestic enjoyment—nothing snug and comfortable in his arrangements at home—nice social dinners—pleasant faces at breakfast. By the way, what the deuce is the reason my breakfast does not come up? I've been waiting for this half hour. Oh, I forgot; my wife sent the cook to market to get some trash or other for Dick's cold. She coddles that boy to death. But, after all, I ought not to find fault with Tom for not getting a wife, for he has lent me a good deal of money that came quite convenient, and I suppose the young ones will have all he's worth when he dies, poor fellow! They'll want it, I'm afraid; for although my business does very well, this house-keeping eats up the profits, with such a large family as mine. Let me see; how many mouths; have I to feed every day? There's my wife and her two sisters—that's three; and the four boys—seven, and Lucy and Sarah and Jane and Louisa, four more—eleven; then there's the cook and the housemaid, and the boy—fourteen; and the woman that comes every day to wash and do odd jobs about the house—fifteen; then there's the nursery-maid—sixteen; surely there must be another—I'm sure I made it out seventeen when I was reckoning up last Sunday morning at church; there must be another somewhere; let me see again; wife, wife's sisters, boys, girls—oh it's myself! Faith, I have so many to think of and provide for, that I forget myself half the time. Yes, that makes it—seventeen. Seventeen people to feed every day is no joke! and somehow or other they all have most furious appetites; but then, bless their hearts, it's pleasant to see them eat. What a havoc they do make with the buckwheat-cakes of a morning, to be sure! Now poor Tom knows nothing of all this. There he lives all alone by himself in a boarding-house, with nobody near him that cares a brass farthing whether he lives or dies. No affectionate wife to nurse him and coddle him up when he's sick; no little prattlers about him to keep him in a good humor—no dawning intellects, whose development he can amuse himself with watching day after day—nobody to study his wishes, and keep all his comforts ready. Confound it, has n't that woman got back from the market yet?

I feel remarkably hungry. I do n't mind the boy's being coddled and messed if my wife likes it, but there's no joke in having the breakfast kept back for an hour. O, by the way, I must remember to buy all those things for the children to-day. Christmas is close at hand, and my wife has made out a list of the presents she means to put in their stockings. More expense—and their school bills coming in too; I remember before I was married I used to think what a delight it would be to educate the young rogues myself; but a man with a large family has no time for that sort of amusement. I wonder how old my young Tom is; let me see, when does his birthday come? next month, as I'm a Christian; and then he will be fourteen. Boys of fourteen consider themselves all but men, now-a-days, and Tom is quite of that mind, I see. Nothing will suit his exquisite feet but Wellington boots, at thirty shillings a pair; and his mother has been throwing out hints for some time, as to the propriety of getting a watch for him—gold, of course. Silver was quite good enough for me when I was half a score years older than he is, but times are awfully changed since my younger days. Then, I believe in my soul, the young villain has learned to play billiards; and three or four times lately when he has come in late at night, his clothes seemed to be strongly perfumed with cigar smoke.

Heigho! Fathers have many troubles, and I can't help thinking sometimes that old bachelors are not such wonderful fools after all. They go to their pillows at night with no cares on their minds to keep them awake; and, when they have once got asleep, nothing comes to disturb their repose—nothing short of the house being on fire, can reach their peaceful condition. No getting up in the cold to walk up and down the room for an hour or two, with a squalling young varlet, as my luck has been for the last five or six weeks. It's an astonishing thing to perceive what a passion our little Louisa exhibits for crying; so sure as the clock strikes three she begins, and there's no getting her quiet again until she has fairly exhausted the strength of her lungs with good, straight-forward screaming. I can't for the life of me understand why the young villains don't get through all their squalling and roaring in the daytime, when I am out of the way. Then again, what a delightful pleasure it is to be routed out of one's first nap, and sent off post haste for the doctor, as I was, on Monday night, when my wife thought Sarah had got the croup, and frightened me half out of my wits with her lamentations and fidgets. By the way, there's the doctor's bill to be paid soon; his collector always pays me a visit just before Christmas. Brother Tom has no doctors to fee, and that certainly is a great comfort. Bless my soul, how the time slips away! Past nine o'clock, and no breakfast yet—wife messing with Dick, and getting the three girls and their two brothers ready for school. Nobody thinks of me, starving here all this time. What the plague has become of my newspaper, I wonder? that young rascal, Tom, has carried it off, I dare say, to read in the school, when he ought to be poring over his books. He's a great torment that boy. But no matter; there's a great deal of pleasure in married life, and if some vexations and trouble do come with its delights, grumbling won't take them away: nevertheless, brother Tom, I'm not very certain but that you have done quite as wisely as I, after all.

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

The worshipful Company of Squirt-makers elected him a member; and on a vacancy suddenly occurring in the ward to which he belonged, he was made a common-councilman. Mr. Tag-rag soon made a great stir as a champion of civil and religious liberty. As for church and county rates, in particular, he demonstrated the gross injustice which is done one who had no personal occasion for the use of a church, of a county bridge, a county jail, or a lunatic asylum, to be called upon to contribute to the support of them. A few speeches in this strain attracted so much attention to him, that several leading men in the ward (a very "liberal" one) intimated to him that he stood the best chance of succeeding to the honor of alderman on the next vacancy; and when he and Mrs. Tag-rag were alone together, he would start the subject of the expenses of the mayoralty with no little anxiety. He went to the chapel no longer on foot, but in a stylish sort of covered gig, with a kind of coal-scuttle shaped box, screwed on behind, into which was squeezed his footboy, (who, by the way, had a thin stripe of crimson let into each leg of his trousers, on Mr. Tag-rag's appointment to an office under the crown;) he was also a trifle later in arriving at the chapel than he had been accustomed to be. He had a crimson velvet cushion running along the front of his pew, and the bibles and hymn-books very smartly gilded. He was presently advanced to the honored post of Chief Deacon; and on one occasion, in the unexpected absence of the central luminary of the system, was asked to occupy the chair at a "great meeting" for the Prevention of Civil and Religious Discord; when he took the opportunity of declaring his opinion, which was enthusiastically cheered, that the principles of free trade ought to be applied to religion; and that the voluntary system was that which was designed by God, to secure the free blessings of competition. As for Satan Lodge, he stuck two little wings to it; and had one of the portraits of Titmouse (as Tippiwink) hung over his drawing room mantelpiece, splendidly framed and glazed.

Some little time after Tag-rag had obtained the Royal appointment, which I have been so particular in recording, Gammon, happening to be passing his shop, stepped in, and observing Mr. Tag-rag, very cordially greeted him; and then, as if it had been a thought of the moment only, without taking him from the shop, intimated that he had been westward, engaged in completing the formal details of a re-arrangement of the greater portion of Mr. Titmouse's estates, upon which that gentleman had recently determined, and the sight of Mr. Tag-rag's establishment had suggested to Mr. Gammon, that possibly Mr. Tag-rag would feel gratified at being made a formal party to the transaction; as Mr. Gammon was sure that Mr. Titmouse would feel delighted at having associated with the Earl of Dreddlington, and one or two other persons of distinction, in the meditated arrangement, the name of so early and sincere a friend as Mr. Tag-rag: "one who, moreover"—here Gammon paused, and gave a smile of inexpressible significance, "but it was not for him to hint his suspicions."

"Sir—I—I—will you come into my room?" interrupted Tag-rag, rather eagerly, anxious to have a more definite indication of Mr. Gammon's opinion; but that gentleman, looking at his watch, pleaded want of time, and suddenly shaking Mr. Tag-rag by the hand, moved toward the door.

"You were talking of signing, sir. Is it with you? I'll sign any thing!—any thing for Mr. Titmouse; only too proud—it's an honor to be in any way connected with him!" Gammon, on hearing this, felt in his pockets, as if he supposed that he should find there what he perfectly well knew had been lying ready, cut and dried, in his safe at Saffron Hill for months.

"I find I hav' n't got the little document with me," said he, carelessly; "I suppose it's lying about with other loose papers at the office, or I may have left it at the earl's"—[if Gammon meant here to allude to the Earl of Dreddlington, I think it only fair to say that he had never been, for one instant in his life, in that great man's presence.]

"I'll tell you what, Mr. Gammon," said Tag-rag, considering. "Your office is at Saffron Hill? Well, I shall be passing your way to-morrow, about noon, and will look in and do all you wish."

"Could you arrange to meet the earl there?—or, as his lordship's movements are—ah, ha!—not very?"

"Should be most proud to meet his lordship, sir, to express my personal gratitude!"

"Oh, the earl never likes to be reminded, Mr. Tag-rag, of any little courtesy or kindness he may have conferred! But if you will be with us about twelve, we can wait a little while; and if his lordship should not be punctual, we must even let you sign first, ah, ha!—and explain it to his lordship on his arrival, for I know your time's very precious, Mr. Tag-rag! Gracious! Mr. Tag-rag, what a constant stream of customers you have! I heard it said the other day, that you were rapidly absorbing all the leading business in your line in Oxford street."

"You're very polite, Mr. Gammon! Certainly I've no reason to complain. I always keep the best of every thing, and sell at the lowest prices, and spare no pains to please; and it's hard if!"

"How do you do?" quoth Gammon, suddenly starting, and bowing to some one the other side of the way, whom he did not see. "Well, good-day, Mr. Tag-rag—good-day! To-morrow at twelve, by the way?"

"I'm yours to command, Mr. Gammon," replied Tag-rag; and so they parted. Just about twelve o'clock the next day, the latter, in a great bustle, saying he had fifty places to call at in the city, made his appearance at Saffron Hill.

"His lordship a'n't here, I suppose?" quoth he, after shaking hands with Mr. Quirk and Mr. Gammon. The latter gentleman pulled out his watch, and, shrugging his shoulders, said with a smile, "No—we'll give him half-an-hour's grace."

"Half-an-hour, my dear sir!" exclaimed Tag-rag, "I could n't stay so long if there were half-a-dozen lords coming. I am a man of business, he is n't; first come first served, you know, eh? All fair that!" There were a good many recently engrossed parchments and writings scattered over the table, and from among them Gammon, after tossing them about for some time, at length drew out a sheet of foolscap. It was stamped, and there was writing upon the first and second pages.

"Now, gentlemen, quick 's the word—time's precious!" said Tag-rag, taking up a pen and dipping it into the inkstand. Gammon, with an unconcerned air, placed before him the document he had been looking for. "Ah, how well I know the signature! That flourish of his—a sort of boldness about it, a'n't there?" said Tag-rag, observing the signature of Titmouse immediately above the spot on which he was going to place his own; there being written in pencil underneath, the word "Dreddlington," evidently for the intended signature of the earl. "I'm between two good ones at any rate, eh?" said Tag-rag. Gammon or Quirk said something about a "term to attend the inheritance"—"trustee of an outstanding term"—"legal estate vested in the trustees"—"too great power to be put into the hands of any but those of the highest honor."

"Stay!" quoth Gammon, ringing his little handbell; "nothing like regularity, even in trifles." He was answered by one of the clerks, a very dashing person—"We only wish you to witness a signature," said Gammon. "Now, we shall release you, Mr. Tag-rag, in a moment. Say, 'I deliver this as my act and deed'—putting your finger on the little wafer there."

So said and so did Mr. Tag-rag as he had been directed; the clerk wrote his name under the witnessing clause, "Abominable Aminadab;" and from that moment Mr. Tag-rag had unconsciously acquired an interest in the future stability of Mr. Titmouse's fortunes, to the extent of some TWENTY THOUSAND POUNDS.

"Now, gentlemen, you'll make my compliments to his lordship, and if he asks how I came to sign before him, explain the hurry I was in. Time and tide wait for no man. Good morning, gentlemen; good morning; best regards to our friend, Mr. Titmouse." Gammon attended him to the door, cordially shaking him by the hand, and presently returned to the room he had just quitted, where he found Mr. Quirk holding in his hand the document just signed by Tag-rag; which was, in fact, a joint and several bond, conditioned in a penalty of forty thousand pounds, for due repayment, by Titmouse, of twenty thousand pounds and interest, about to be advanced to him on mortgage of a portion of the Yatton property. Gammon, sitting down, gently took the instrument from Mr. Quirk, and with a bit of India rubber calmly effaced the pencilled signature of Dreddlington.

"You're a d—d clever fellow, Gammon!" exclaimed Mr. Quirk, presently, with a sort of sigh. Gammon made no reply. His face was slightly pale, and wore an anxious expression. "It will do now," continued Mr. Quirk, rubbing his hands, and with a gleeful expression of countenance.

"That remains to be seen," replied Gammon, in a low tone.

"Eh? What? Does any thing occur—eh? By Jove, no screw loose, I hope?"

"No; but we're in very deep water now, Mr. Quirk."

"Well—Devil only cares, so long as you keep a sharp look-out, Gammon. I'll trust the helm to you."

As Gammon did not seem in a talkative mood, Quirk shortly afterward left him.

Now, though Mr. Tag-rag is no favorite of mine, I begin to feel a good deal of anxiety on his behalf. I wish he had not been in so vast a "hurry," in a matter which required such grave deliberation, as "signing, sealing, and delivering." When a man is called on to go through so serious a ceremony, it would be well if he could be apprised of the significance of the formula—"I deliver this as my act and deed." Thus hath expressed himself, upon this point, a great authority in the law, old Master Plowden. "T is a passage somewhat quaint in form, but not the less forcible and important in substance."

"Words are oft spoken unadvisedly, and pass from men lightly and inconsiderately; but, where the agreement is by deed, there is more time for deliberation; for when a man passes a thing by deed, first, there is the determination of the mind to do it, and upon that he causes it to be written, which is one part of deliberation; and, afterward, he puts his seal to it, which is another part of deliberation; and, lastly, he delivers the writing as his deed, which is the consummation of his resolution. So that there is great deliberation used in the making of deeds, for which reason they are received as a ten, final to the party, and are adjudged to bind the party, without examining upon what cause or consideration they were made."

Possibly some one now reading these pages hath had most dismal experience in the matter above-mentioned; and I hope that such dismal experience, a due reflection will avert from many a reader. As for Tag-rag, it may turn out that our fears for him are groundless: nevertheless, one hates to see men do important things in a hurry:—and, as we shall not see him again for some time, there can be no harm in wishing him well out of what he has done.

"If 't were done when 't is done—"

"Then 't were well 't were done quickly."

and not otherwise.

The London season was now advancing toward its close. Fine ladies were getting sated and exhausted with operas, concerts, balls, routs, soirées, assemblies, bazaars, fêtes, and the Park. Their lords were getting tired of their clubs during the day, and hurried dinners, late hours, foul air, long speeches, at the two Houses; where, however they might doze away the time, they could seldom get the luxury of a downright nap for more than an hour or two together—always waking, and fancying themselves in the tower of Babel, and that it was on fire, so strange and startling were the lights and the hubbub! The very whippers-in were looking jaded and done—like a Smithfield drover's dog on a Monday night, that at length can neither bark nor bite in return for a kick or a blow; and, hoarse and wearied, falls asleep on his way home—a regular somnambulist. Where the Earl of Dreddlington and Lady Cecilia were to pass their autumn, was a question which they were beginning to discuss rather anxiously. Any one glancing over their flourishing list of residences in England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, which were paraded in the Peerages and Court Guides, would have supposed that they had an ample choice before them: but the reader of this history knows better. The mortifying explanation—mortifying to the poor Earl—having been once given by me, I shall not again do so. Suffice it to say that Poppleton Hall, Hertfordshire, had its disadvantages; there they must keep a full establishment, and receive county company and other visitors—owing, as they did, much hospitality. "T was expensive work, also, at the watering-places; and expensive and also troublesome to go abroad at the Earl's advanced period of life."

Pensively ruminating on these matters one evening, they were interrupted by a servant bringing in a note, which proved to be from Titmouse—inviting them, in terms of profound courtesy and great cordiality, to honor Yatton, by making a stay there during as great a portion of the autumn as they could not better occupy. Mr. Titmouse frankly added, that he could not avoid acknowledging some little degree of selfishness in giving the invitation—namely, in expressing a hope that the Earl's presence would afford him, if so disposed, an opportunity of introducing him—Titmouse—to any of the leading members of the county who might be honored by the Earl's acquaintance; that, situated as Titmouse was, he felt an increasing anxiety on that point. He added, that he trusted the Earl and Lady Cecilia would consider Yatton, while they were there, as in all respects their own residence, and that he, Titmouse, would spare no exertion to render their stay as agreeable as possible. The humble appeal of Titmouse prevailed with his great kinsman, who, on the next day, sent him a letter, saying that his lordship fully recognised the claim which Mr. Titmouse had upon him as the head of the family, and that his lordship should feel very glad in availing himself of the opportunity which offered itself, of placing Mr. Titmouse on a proper footing of intercourse with the people of the county. That, for this purpose, his lordship should decline any invitations they might receive to pass their autumn elsewhere, &c. &c. In plain English, they jumped at the invitation.

It had emanated originally from Gammon, who, from motives of his own, had suggested it to Titmouse, bade him act upon it, and drew up the letter conveying it. I say, from motives of his own, Gammon was bent upon becoming personally acquainted with the Earl, and fixing himself, if possible, thoroughly in his lordship's confidence. He had contrived to ascertain from Titmouse, without that gentleman's being, however, aware of it, that the few occasions on which his (Gammon's) name had been mentioned by the Earl, it had been accompanied by slighting expressions—by indications of dislike and suspicion. Give him, however, thought he, but the opportunity, and he could very soon change the nature of the Earl's feelings toward him. As soon, therefore, as the Earl's acceptance of the invitation had been communicated to Gammon, he resolved to be one of the guests at Yatton during the time of the Earl's stay—a step, into the propriety of which he easily brought Mr. Quirk to enter, but which he did not, for the present, communicate to Titmouse, lest he should, by prematurely disclosing it to the Earl, raise any obstacle, arising out of an objection on the part of his lordship, who, if he but found Gammon actually there, must submit to the infliction with what grace he might. In due time it was notified on the part of the Earl, by his man of business, to Mr. Titmouse, (who had gone down to Yatton,) through his man of business, that the Earl, and a formidable portion of his establishment, would make their appearance at Yatton by a named day. The Earl had chosen to extend the invitation to Miss Macspleuchan, and also to as many attendants as he thought fit to take with him, instead of letting them consume their board-wages in entire idleness in town or at Poppleton. Heavens! what accommodation was required, for the Earl, for the Lady Cecilia, each of their personal attendants, Miss Macspleuchan, and five servants! Then there were two other guests invited, in order to form company and amusement for the Earl—the Marquis of Ganta-Jaunes de Millefeurs, and Mr. Tuft. Accommodation must be had for these; and to secure it, Mr. Titmouse and Mr. Gammon were driven almost to the extremities of the house. Four servants, in a sort of baggage-wagon, preceded the arrival of the Earl and Lady Cecilia by a day or two, in order to "arrange every thing;" and somehow or another, one of the first things that was done with this view, was to install his lordship's chief servants in the quarters of Mr. Titmouse's servants, who, it was suggested, should endeavor to make themselves as comfortable as they could in some little unfurnished rooms over the stables! And, in a word, before Mr. Titmouse's grand guests had been at the Hall four-and-twenty hours, there was established these the same freezing state and solemn ceremony which prevailed in the Earl's establishment. Down came at length, thundering through the village, the Earl's dusty travelling-carriage and four; himself, Lady Cecilia, and Miss Macspleuchan, within, his valet and Lady Cecilia's maid behind; presently it wound round the park road, crashing and flashing through the gravel, and rattling under the old gateway, and at length stood before the Hall door—the reeking horses pulled up with a sudden jerk, which almost threw them all upon their haunches. Mr. Titmouse was in readiness to receive his distinguished visitors; the carriage-door was opened—down went the steps—and in a few moments' time the proud old Earl of Dreddlington and his proud daughter, having entered the Hall, had become the guests of its flustered and ambitious little proprietor. While all the guests are occupied in their dressing-rooms, recovering themselves from the cramp and fatigue of a long journey, and are preparing to make their appearance at dinner, let me take the opportunity to give you a sketch of the only one of the guests to whom you are at present a stranger: I mean Mr. Tuft—Mr. VENOM TUFT.

Of hith an inexperienced mushroom-hunter, deceived at a distance, run up to gather what seemed to be a fine cluster of mushrooms, growing under the shade of a stately tree, but which, on stooping down to gather them, he discovers with disappointment and disgust to be no mushrooms at all, but vile, unwholesome—even poisonous fungi, which, to prevent their similarly deluding others, he kicks up and crushes under foot. And is not this a type of what often happens in society? Under the "cold shade of aristocracy," how often is to be met with—the sycophant?—Mr. Venom Tuft was one of them. His character was written in his face. Disagreeable to look at—though he thought far otherwise—he yet contrived to make himself pleasant to be listened to, by the languid and enervated fashionable. He spoke ever—

"In a leady's key,
With bathed breath and whispering humbleness."

His person was at once effeminate and coarse; his gesture and address were cringing: there was an intolerable calmness and gentleness about them at all times, but especially while laboring in his vocation. He had the art of administering delicate and appropriate flattery by a look only, deferential and insinuating—as well as by words. He had always at command a copious store of gossip, highly seasoned with scandal; which he collected and prepared with industry and judgement. Clever toadies are generally bitter ones. With sense enough to perceive, but not spirit enough to abandon their odious propensities, they are aware of the ignominious spectacle they exhibit before the eyes of men of the least degree of independence and discernment, and whose open contempt they have not power or manliness enough to resent. Then their smothered rage takes an inward turn; it tends to, and centres in the tongue, from which it falls in drops of scalding virus; and thus it is, that the functions of sycophant and slanderer are so often found united in the same miserable individual. Does a sycophant fancy that his patron—if one may use such a term—is not aware of his character and position? Would that he could but hear himself spoken of by those to whom he has last been cottoning! If he could but for one moment "see himself as others see him"—surely he would instantly wriggle out of the sight of man! But Mr. Tuft was not an everyday toady. Being a clever man, it occurred to him as calculated infinitely to enhance the value of his attentions, if he could get them to be regarded as those of a man of some ability and reputation. So reasonable a wish, as thus to rise to eminence in the calling in life to which he had devoted himself—viz. toadyism—stimulated him to considerable exertion, which was in time rewarded by a measure of success; for he began to be looked on as something of a literary man. Then he would spend his mornings in reading up, in those quarters whence he might cull materials for display in society at a later period of the day, when he could watch his opportunity, or, if none presented itself, make one, by diverting the current of conversation into the channel on which was the gay and varied bordering of his recent acquisitions. All his knowledge was of this gossiping pro hac vice character. He was very skilful in administering his flattery. Did he dine with his Grace, or his Lordship, whose speech in the House appeared in that or the preceding day's newspapers? Mr. Tuft got it up carefully, and also the speech in answer to it, with a double view—to show himself at home in the question; and then to differ a little with his Grace or his Lordship, in order to be presently set right by them, and convinced by them! Or when conversation turned upon the topics which had, overnight, called up his Grace or his Lordship on his legs, Mr. Tuft would break in by observing that such and such a point had been "put in the debate with admirable point and force by some one of the speakers—he did not recollect whom;" and on being apprised, and receiving a courteous bow from the great man entitled to the undesigned compliment, look so surprised—almost, indeed, piqued! Carefully, however, as he managed matters, he was soon found out by men, and compelled to betake himself, with tenfold ardor, to the women, with whom he lasted a little longer. They considered him a great literary man; for he could quote and criticize a great deal of poetry, and a good many novels. He could show that what everybody else admired was full of faults; what all condemned was admirable: so that the fair creatures were forced to distrust their own judgement in proportion as they deferred to him. He would allow no one to be entitled to the praise of literary excellence except individuals of rank, and one or two men of established literary reputation, who had not thought it worth their while to repel his obsequious advances, or convenient not to do so. Then he would polish the poetry of fine ladies, touch up their little tales, and secure their insertion in fashionable periodicals. On these accounts, and of his piquant little-tattle, no soirée or conversation was complete without him, any more than without tea, coffee, ice, or lemonade. All toadies hate one another; but his brethren both hated and feared Mr. Tuft; for he was not only so successful himself, but possessed and used such engines for depressing them. Mr. Tuft had hoped to succeed in being popped in by one of his patrons for a snug little Whig borough, (for Tuft happened to be a Whig—though, for that matter, he might have been, more advantageously, a Tory;) but the great man got tired of him, and turned him off, though the ladies of the family still secured him success to the dinner-table. He did not, however, make a very grateful return for such good-natured condescensions. Ugly and ungainly as he was, he yet imagined himself possessed of personal attractions for the ladies, and converted their innocent and unsuspecting familiarities, which had emanated from those confident in their purity and their greatness, into tokens of the ascendancy he had gained over them; and of which, with equal cruelty, folly, and presumption, he could afterward boast pretty freely. Till this came, however, to be suspected and discovered, Mr. Tuft visited a good many leading houses in town, and spent no inconsiderable portion of each autumn at some one or other of the country mansions of his patrons—from whose "castles," "halls," "abbeys," "prieories," and "seats" he took great pride in dating his letters to his friends. I must not forget to mention that he kept a book, very gorgeously bound and embellished, with silver-gilt clasps, and bearing on the back the words—"Book of Autographs;" but I should have written it—"Trophies of Toadyism." This book contained autograph notes of the leading nobility, addressed familiarly to himself—thus:

"The Duke of Walworth presents his compliments to Mr. Tuft, and felt particularly obliged by," &c.

"The Duchess of Diamond hopes Mr. Tuft will not forget to bring with him this evening," &c.

"The Marquis of M——— has the honor to assure Mr. Tuft," that &c.

"Dear Tuft,

"Why were you not at—House last night? We were dreadfully dull without you! X—so stupid!"—[This was from a very pretty and fashionable countess, whose initials it bore.]

"If Mr. Tuft is dead, Lady Dulcimer requests to be informed when his funeral will take place, as she, together with a host of mourners, intend to show him a last mark of their respect."

"Dear Tuft,

"The poodle you brought me has got the mange, or some horrid complaint or other, which is making all his hair fall off. Do come and tell me what is to be done. Where can I send the sweet suffering angel?—Yours,

ARABELLA, D——"

[This was from the eldest and loveliest daughter of a very great duke.]

"The Lord Chancellor presents his compliments, and begs to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Venom Tuft's obliging present of his little 'Essay on Greatness.'"

These are samples, taken at random, of the contents of Mr. Tuft's book of autographs, evidencing abundantly the satisfactory terms of intimacy upon which he lived with the great; and it was ecstasy to him, to see his glittering record of his triumphs glanced over by the envious admiring eyes of those in his own station in society. How he delighted to be asked about the sayings and doings of the exclusive circles! How confidentially could he intimate the desperate condition of a sick peer—an expected déclatrissement of fashionable folly and crime—or a move to be made in the House that evening: poor Tuft little suspecting (lying so snug in his shell of self-conceit,) how frequently he fell, on these occasions, among the Philistines—and was, unconsciously to himself, being trotted out by a calm sarcastic hypocrite, for the amusement of the standers-by, just as a little monkey is poked with a stick to get up and exhibit himself and his tricks. Such was Mr. Tuft, a great friend and admirer of "the Marquis," through whose influence he had procured the invitation from Titmouse, in virtue of which he was now dressing in a nice little room at the back of the Hall, overlooking the stables; being bent upon improving his already tolerably familiar acquaintance with the Earl of Dreddlington and Lady Cecilia, and also extracting from the man whose hospitality he was enjoying, materials for merriment among his great friends against the next season.

When the party had collected in the drawing room, in readiness for dinner, you might have seen Mr. Tuft in earnest conversation with the Lady Cecilia; Mr. Gammon standing talking to Miss Macspleuchan, with an air of courteous ease and frankness—having observed her sitting neglected by every body; the Earl conversing now with the Marquis, then with Titmouse, and anon with Tuft, with whom he appeared to be particularly pleased. Happening at length to be standing near Gammon—a calm, gentleman-like person, of whom he knew nothing, nor suspected that his keen eye had taken in his lordship's true character and capacity at a glance; that he would, in a few hours' time, acquire as complete a mastery over his said lordship, as ever the present famous hippodromist at Windsor, by touching a nerve in the mouth of a horse, reduces him to helpless docility and submission—the Earl and he fell into casual conversation for a moment or two. The air of deference with which Gammon received the slight advances of the great man, was exquisite and indescribable. It gave him clearly to understand that his lofty pretensions were known to, and profoundly appreciated by, the individual he was addressing. Gammon said but little; that little, however, how significant and decisive! He knew that the Earl would presently inquire of Titmouse who the unknown visitor was; and that on being told in the conceited and probably disparaging manner which Gammon knew Titmouse would adopt, if he supposed it would please the Earl, that "it was only Mr. Gammon, one of his solicitors," he would sink at once and for ever beneath the notice of the Earl. He resolved, therefore, to anticipate—to contrive that it should ooze out easily and advantageously from himself, so that he could see the effect it had upon the Earl, and regulate his movements accordingly. Gammon sat down before the fortress of the Earl's pride, resolved that, for all it appeared so inaccessible and impregnable, it should fall, however his skill and patience might be taxed in the siege. Till he had cast his piercing eye upon the Earl,

Gammon had felt a little of the nervousness which one may imagine would be experienced by Van Amburgh, who, on being summoned into the presence of majesty to give a specimen of his skill upon an animal concealed from him—of whose name and qualities he was ignorant—should summon all his terrors into his eye, and string his muscles to their highest tension; and, on the door being opened, turn with smiling scorn—if not indignation—from a sucking pig, a calf, an ass, or a chicken. Something similar were the feelings experienced by Gammon, as soon as he had scanned the countenance and figure of the Earl of Dreddlington. He quickly perceived that the dash of awe which he had thrown into his manner, was producing its due effect upon that most magnificent simpleton. Watching his opportunity, he gently introduced the topic of the recent change of ownership which Yatton had undergone; and in speaking of the manner in which Mr. Titmouse had borne his sudden prosperity—"Yes, my lord," continued Gammon, with apparent carelessness, "I recollect making some such observation to him, and he replied, 'very true, Mr. Gammon.'" Gammon finished his sentence calmly; but he perceived that the Earl had instantly withdrawn himself into his earldom. He had given a very slight start; a very little color had mounted into his cheek; a sensible hauteur had been assumed; and by the time that Gammon had done speaking, the space between them had been—as Lord Dreddlington imagined, unobservedly—increased by two or three inches. Gammon was a man—an able and a proud man—and he felt galled; but, "let it pass," he presently reflected—"let it pass, you pompous old idiot; I will one day repay it with interest." The Earl separated from him, Gammon regarding him as a gaudy craft sheering off for a while, but doomed to be soon sunk. Mr. Tuft, (who was the son of a highly respectable retired tobacconist in the north,) having ascertained that Gammon was only Mr. Titmouse's attorney, conducted himself for a while as though there were no such person in the room; but being a quick observer, and catching once or twice the faint sarcastic smile with which Gammon's eye was settled on him, he experienced a very galling and uneasy consciousness of his presence. The Marquis's superior tact and perception of character led him to treat Gammon very differently—with a deference and anxiety to please him, which Gammon understood thoroughly—in fact, he and the Marquis had many qualities in common, but Gammon was the man of power. During dinner he sat beside Miss Macspleuchan, and was almost the only person who spoke to her—in fact, he said but little to any one else. He took wine with Titmouse, with a marked but guarded air of confidence. The Marquis took wine with Gammon with an air of studied comeliness. The Earl's attention was almost entirely engrossed by Mr. Tuft, who sat next to him, chattering in his ear like a little magpie perched upon his shoulder. The Marquis sat next to the Lady Cecilia; for whose amusement, as far as his cautious tact would allow him, he from time to time drew out their little host. At length, in answer to a question by the Marquis, the Earl let fall some pompous observation, which the Marquis, who was getting very tired of the rapid monotony which pervaded the table, ventured to differ from pretty decisively. Tuft instantly sided with the Earl, and spoke with infinite fluency for some minutes: Gammon saw in a moment that he was an absurd pretender; and watching his opportunity, for the first time that he had interchanged a syllable with him, with one word exposing a palpable historical blunder of poor Tuft's, overthrew him as completely as a bullet from a crossbow dislodges a tomtit from the wall on which he is hopping about, unconscious of his danger: "T was a thing that there could be no mistake about whatever."

"That's a settler, Tuft," said the Marquis, after a pause: Tuft gulped down a glass of wine; and presently, with the slightly staggered Earl, became a silent listener to the discussion into which the Marquis and Gammon had entered. Obuse as was the Earl, Gammon contrived to let him see how effectually he was supporting his lordship's opinion, which Mr. Tuft had so ridiculously failed in. The Marquis got slightly the worst of the encounter with Gammon, whose object he saw, and whose tact he admired; and with much judgement permitted Gammon to appear to the Earl as his successful defender, in order that he might himself make a friend of Gammon. Moreover, he was not at all annoyed at witnessing the complete and unexpected discomfiture of poor Tuft, whom, for all his intimacy with that gentleman, the Marquis thoroughly despised.

However it might possibly be that his grand guests enjoyed themselves, it was far otherwise with Mr. Titmouse; who, being compelled to keep sober, was quite miserable. None of those around him were drinking men:—and the consequence was, that he would retire early to his bedroom, and amuse himself with brandy and water, and cigars, while his guests amused themselves with cards, billiards, or otherwise as best they might. He did, indeed, "stand like a cipher in the great account;" instead of feeling himself the Earl of Dreddlington's host, he felt himself as one of his lordship's guests, struggling in vain against the freezing state and etiquette which the Earl carried with him wherever he went, like a sort of atmosphere. In this extremity he secretly clung to Gammon, and reposed upon his powerful support and sympathy more implicitly than ever he had done before. As the shooting season had commenced, and game was plentiful at Yatton, the Marquis and Tuft found full occupation during the day, as occasionally did Mr. Gammon. Mr. Titmouse once accompanied them; but having contrived once or twice very nearly to blow his own hand off, and also to blow out the eyes of the Marquis, they intimated that he had better go out alone for the future—as he did once or twice, but soon got tired of such solitary sport. Besides—hares, pheasants, partridges—old and young, cock or hen—'t was all one—none of them seemed to care one straw for him or his gun, let him pop and blaze away as loud and as long, as near or as far off, as he liked. The only thing he hit—and that plump—was one of his unfortunate dogs, which he killed on the spot; and then coming up with it, stamped upon the poor creature's bleeding carcass, saying with a furious oath—"Why did n't you keep out of the way, you brute?"

The Earl was really anxious to perform his promise of introducing, or procuring Titmouse to be introduced, to the leading nobility and gentry of the county; but it proved a more difficult task than his lordship had anticipated—for Titmouse's early doings at Yatton had not yet been forgotten: some of the haughty Whig gentry joined with their Tory neighbors in manifesting their open contempt and dislike, for one who could so disgrace the name and station to which he had been elevated in the county; and the Earl had to encounter one or two somewhat mortifying rebuffs, in the course of the efforts which he was making for the establishment of his young kinsman.

There were some, however, whom mere political considerations—some whom deference for the Earl's rank, and unwillingness to hurt his feelings, and others from considerations of political interest—induced to receive the new squire of Yatton on a footing of formal intimacy and equality; so that his lordship's numerous drives were not entirely useless. The whole party at the Hall attended the Earl to church on the Sundays—entirely filling the square's pew and the adjoining one; their decorous conduct presenting a very edifying spectacle to the humble congregation, and suggesting a striking contrast between the present and the former visitors at the hall. Worthy Doctor Tatham was asked several times to dinner, at the Earl's instance, who treated him on such occasions with great though stately courtesy. The only person with whom the little doctor felt at ease, were Mr. Gammon and Miss Macspleuchan, who treated him with the utmost cordiality and respect. What became during the day of the two ladies, I hardly know. There was no instrument at Yatton: bagatelle-board, and novels from a circulating library at York, frequent rides and drives through the grounds and about the country, and occasional visits to and from one or two families with whom Lady Cecilia had a town acquaintance, occupied their day; and in the evening, a rubber at whist, or cribbage, or carté, with the Earl—sometimes, too, with the Marquis and Mr. Tuft, both of whom lost no opportunity of paying marked attention to Lady Cecilia, with a view of dissipating as far as possible the inevitable ennui of her situation, would while away the short evenings, very early hours being now kept at the Hall. 'Twas wonderful that two such men as the Marquis and Mr. Tuft could stay so long as they did at so very dull a place, and with such dull people. Inwardly, they both voted the Earl an insufferable old twaddler; his daughter a piece of languid insipidity; and one would have thought it daily more irksome for them to keep up their courtly attentions. They had, however, as may presently be seen, their objects in view.

As Gammon, a little to the Earl's surprise, continued apparently a permanent guest at the Hall, where he seemed ever engaged in superintending and getting into order the important affairs of Mr. Titmouse, it could hardly be but that he and the Earl should be occasionally thrown together; for as the Earl did not shoot, and never read books, even had there been any to read, he had little to do when not engaged upon the expeditions I have alluded to, but saunter about the house and grounds, and enter into conversation with almost any one he met. The assistance which Gammon had rendered the Earl on the occasion of their first meeting at dinner, had not been forgotten by his lordship, but had served to take off the edge from his pre-conceived contemptuous dislike for him. Gammon steadily kept in the background, resolved that all advances should come from the Earl. When, once or twice, his lordship inquired, with what Gammon saw to be only an affected carelessness, into the state of Mr. Titmouse's affairs, Mr. Gammon evinced a courteous readiness to give him general information; but with an evident caution and anxiety, not unduly to expose, even to the Earl, Mr. Titmouse's distinguished kinsman, the state of his property. He would, however, disclose sufficient to satisfy the Earl of Mr. Gammon's zeal and ability on behalf of Mr. Titmouse's interests, his consummate qualifications as a man of business; and from time to time perceived that his display was not lost upon the Earl. Mr. Gammon's anxiety, in particular, to prevent the borough of Yatton from being a second time wrested out of the hands of its proprietor, and returning, by a corrupt and profligate arrangement with Ministers, a Tory to Parliament, gave the Earl peculiar satisfaction. He was led into a long conversation with Mr. Gammon upon political matters: and, at its close, was greatly struck with the soundness of his views, the strength of his liberal principles, and the vigor and acuteness with which he had throughout agreed with every thing the Earl had said, and fortified every position he had taken; evincing, at the same time a profound appreciation of his lordship's luminous exposition of political principles. The Earl was forced to own to himself, that he had never before met with a man of Mr. Gammon's strength of intellect, whose views and opinions had so intimately and entirely coincided—were, indeed, identical with his own. 'Twas delightful to listen to them upon these occasions—to observe the air of reverence and admiration with which Gammon listened to the lessons of political wisdom that fell, with increasing length and frequency, from the lips of his lordship.

"Τον και απο γλωσσης μελιτος γλυκιων ρεεν αυτη."

Nor was it only when they were alone together, that Gammon would thus sit at the feet of Gamaliel: he was not ashamed to do so openly at the dinner-table: but, ah! how delicately and dexterously did he conceal from the spectators the game he was playing—more difficult to do so though it daily became—because the more willing Gammon was to receive, the more eager the Earl was to communicate instruction! If, on any of these occasions, oppressed by the multifariousness of his knowledge, and its sudden overpowering confluence, he would pause in the midst of a series of half-formed sentences, Gammon would be at hand, to glide in easily and finish what the Earl had begun, out of the Earl's own ample materials, of which Gammon had caught a glimpse, and only worked out the Earl's own, somewhat numerous, half-formed illustrations. The Marquis and Mr. Tuft began, however, at length to feel impatient at observing the way Gammon was making with the Earl; but of what use was it for them to interfere? Gammon was an exceedingly awkward person to meddle with; for, having once got fair play, by gaining the Earl's ear, his accuracy, readiness, extent of information upon political topics, and admirable temper, told very powerfully against his two opponents, who at length interfered less and less with him; the Marquis only feeling piqued, but Tuft also showing it. Had it been otherwise, indeed, it would have been odd; for Gammon seemed to feel a peculiar pleasure in demolishing him. The Marquis, however, once resolved to show Gammon how distinctly he perceived his plan of operations, by waiting till he and the poor Earl had reached a climax of absurdity, and then, with his eye on Gammon, bursting into laughter. Seldom had Gammon been more ruffled than by that well-timed laugh; for he felt found out! When the Earl and he were alone, he would listen with intense interest, over and over again, never wearied, to the Earl's magnificent accounts of what he had intended to do, had he only continued in office, in the important department over which he had presided, viz., the Board of Green Cloth; and more than once put his lordship into a soft flutter of excitement, by hinting at rumors which, he said, were rife—that, in the event of a change of ministers, which was looked for, his lordship was to be President of the Council. "Sir," the Earl would say, "I should not shrink from the performance of my duty to my sovereign, to what-over post he might be pleased to call me. The one you mention, sir, has its peculiar difficulties, and if I know any thing of myself, sir, it is one for which, I should say, I am peculiarly qualified. Sir, the duty of presiding over the deliberations of powerful minds, requires signal discretion and dignity, because, in short, especially in affairs of state—Do you comprehend me, Mr. Gammon?"

"I understand your lordship to say, that where the occasion is one of such magnitude and the disturbing forces are upon so vast a scale, to moderate and guide conflicting interests and opinions?"

"Sir, it is so; tantus componere lites, hic labor, hoc opus," interrupted the Earl, with a desperate attempt to fish up a fragment or two of his early scholarship; and his features wore for a moment a solemn, commanding expression, which satisfied Gammon of the away which his lordship would have had when presiding at the council-board. Gammon would also occasionally introduce the subject of heraldry, asking questions concerning that science, and also concerning the genealogies of leading members of the peerage, with which he safely presumed that the Earl would be, as also he proved, perfectly familiar; and his lordship would go on for an hour at once upon these interesting and vividly-exciting subjects.

Shortly after a luncheon one day, of which only Gammon, the Earl, and the two ladies, were in the hall to partake, Mr. Gammon had occasion to enter the drawing-room, where he found the Earl, sitting upon the sofa, with his heavy gold spectacles on, leaning over the table, engaged in the perusal of a portion of the work, then in the course of periodical publication, which had only that day been delivered at the Hall. The Earl asked Gammon if he had seen it, and was answered in the negative.

"Sir," said the Earl, rising, and removing his glasses, "it is a remarkably interesting publication, showing considerable knowledge of a very difficult and all-important subject, and one, in respect of which the lower orders of the people—say, I lament to be obliged to add, the great bulk of the middle classes also, are woefully deficient—I mean heraldry, and the history of the origin, progress, and present state of the families of the old nobility and gentry of this country."

The work which had been so fortunate as thus to meet with the approbation of the Earl, was the last monthly number of a History of the County of York, and of which work, as yet, only thirty-eight seven-and-sixpenny quarto numbers had made their appearance. 'Twas an admirable work, every number of which had contained a glorification of some different Yorkshire family. The discriminating patronage of Mr. Titmouse for this inestimable performance, had been secured by a most obsequious letter from the learned editor—but more especially by a device of his in the last number, which it would have been strange indeed if it could have failed to catch the eye, and interest the feelings of the new aristocratical owner of Yatton. Opposite to an engraving of the Hall, was placed a magnificent genealogical tree, surmounted by a many-quartered shield of armorial bearings, both of which purported to be an accurate record of the ancestral glories of the house of "TITMOUSE OF YATTON!" A minute investigation might indeed have detected that the recent flight of Titmouse, which were perched on the lower branches of this imposing pedigree bore nearly as small a proportion to the long array of chivalrous Drelincourts and Dreddlingtons which constituted the massy trunk, as did the paternal coat * (to which the profound research and ingenuity of Sir GORGEOUS TINTACK, the — king-at-arms, had succeeded in demonstrating the inalienable right of Tittlebat) to the interminable series of quarterings derived from the same source, which occupied the remainder of the escutcheon. At these mysteriously significant symbols, however, Mr. Titmouse, though willing to believe that they indicated some just cause or other of family pride, had looked with the same appreciating intelligence which you may fancy you see a chicken displaying, while hesitatingly clapping its foot upon, and quaintly cocking its eye at, a slip of paper lying in a yard, covered over with algebraic characters and calculations. Far otherwise, however, was it with the Earl, in whose eyes the complex and recondite character of the production evidently enhanced its value, and struck in his bosom several deep chords of genealogical feeling, as he proceeded, in answer to various anxious inquiries of Gammon, to give him a very full and minute account of the unrivalled splendor and antiquity of his lordship's ancestry. Now Gammon—while prosecuting the researches which had preceded the elevation of Mr. Titmouse to that rank and fortune of which the united voice of the fashionable world had now pronounced him so eminently worthy—had made himself pretty well acquainted with the previous history and connections of that ancient and illustrious house, of which the Earl of Dreddlington was the head; and his familiarity with this topic, though it did not surprise the Earl, because he conceived it to be every one's duty to acquaint himself with such momentous matters, rapidly raised him in the good opinion of the Earl, to whom, at length, it occurred to view him in quite a new light; viz., as the chosen instrument by whose means (under Providence) the perverse and self-willed Aubrey had been righteously cast down from that high place which his rebellious opposition to the wishes and political views of his liege lord, had rendered him unworthy to occupy; while a more loyal branch had been raised from obscurity to his forfeited rank and estates. In fact the Earl began to look upon Gammon as one whose just regard for his lordship's transcendent position in the aristocracy of England, had led him even to anticipate his lordship's possible wishes; and proceeded accordingly to rivet this spontaneous allegiance, by discarding with the most condescending affability on the successive noble and princely alliances which had, during a long series of generations, refined the ancient blood of the Drelincourts into the sort of super-sublimated ichor which at present flowed in his own veins. Mr. Gammon marked the progress of the Earl's feelings with the greatest interest, perceiving the increasing extent to which respect for him—Gammon—was mingling with his sublime self-satisfaction; and, watching his opportunity, struck a spark into the dry tinder of his vain imagination—blew it gently—and saw that it caught and spread. Confident in his knowledge of the state of the Earl's feelings, and that his lordship had reached the highest point of credulity, Gammon intimated, in a hesitating but yet impressive manner, his impression that the recent failure in the male line of the princely house of HOCH-STIFFELHAUSEN NARRENSTEIN DUMERLEINBERG * had placed his lordship, in right of the marriage of one of his ancestors, during the thirty years' war, with a princess of that august line, in a situation to claim, if such were his lordship's pleasure, the dormant honors and sovereign rank attached to the possession of that important principality. The Earl appeared for a few moments transfixed with awe. The bare possibility of such an event seemed too much for him to realize; but when further conversation with Gammon had familiarized his lordship with the notion, his mind's eye glanced to his old rival, the Earl of Fitz-warren: what would he say to all this? How would his little honors pale beside the splendors of his Serene Highness the Prince of Hoch-Stiffelhausen Narrenstein Dumerleinberg! He was not sorry when Mr. Gammon soon afterward left him to follow out, unrestrained, the swelling current of his thoughts, and yield himself up to the transporting ecstasies of anticipated sovereignty. To such a pitch did his excitement carry him, that he might shortly afterward have been seen walking up and down the Elm Avenue, with the feelings and the air of an old King.

Not satisfied, however, with the success of his daring experiment upon the credulity and inflammable imagination of the aspiring old nobleman—whom his suggestion had set upon instituting extensive inquiries into the position of his family with reference to the foreign alliances which it had formed in times past, and of which so dazzling an incident might really be in existence—it occurred to Mr. Gammon on another occasion of his being left alone with the Earl, and who he saw was growing manifestly more pleased with the frequent recurrence of them, to sink a shaft into a new mine. He therefore, on mere speculation, introduced, as a subject of casual conversation, the imprudence of persons of rank and large fortune 'evolving the management of their pecuniary affairs so entirely upon others—and thus leaving them exposed to all the serious consequences of employing incompetent, indolent, or mercenary agents. Mr. Gammon proceeded to observe that he had recently known an instance of a distinguished nobleman, (whose name he for very obvious reasons suppressed,) who, having occasion to raise a large sum of money by way of mortgage, left the sole negotiation of the affair to an agent, who was afterward proved to have been in league with the lender, (the mortgagee,) and permitted his employer to pay, for ten or twelve years, an excess of interest over what he might, with a little exertion, have obtained money for, which actually made a difference in his income of a thousand a year. Here, looking out of the north-east corner of his eye, the placid speaker, continuing unmoved, observed the Earl start a little, glance somewhat anxiously at him, but in silence, and slightly quicken the pace at which he had been walking. Gammon presently added in a careless sort of way, that accident had brought him into professional intercourse with that nobleman—[Oh, Gammon! Gammon!]<sup>1</sup>—whom he was ultimately instrumental in saving from the annual robbery that was being inflicted upon him. It was enough; Gammon saw that what he had been saying had sunk like lead into the mind of his companion, who, for the rest of the day seemed burdened and oppressed with it—or some other cause of anxiety; and, from an occasional uneasy and wistful eye which the Earl fixed upon him at dinner, he felt conscious that not long would elapse, before he should hear something from the Earl connected with the topic in question—and he was not mistaken. The very next day they met in the park, and after one or two casual observations, the Earl remarked that, by the way, with reference to their yesterday's conversation, it "did so happen"—very singularly—that the Earl had a friend who was placed in a situation very similar to that which had been mentioned by Mr. Gammon to the Earl; a very intimate friend—and the Earl would like to hear what was Mr. Gammon's opinion of the case. Gammon was scarcely able to refrain from a smile, as the Earl went on, evincing every moment a more vivid interest in behalf of his mysterious friend, who at last stood suddenly confessed as the Earl of Dreddlington; for, in answer to a question of Mr. Gammon, his lordship unwittingly spoke in the first person. On perceiving this, he got much confused, but Gammon passed it off very easily; and by his earnest, confidential tone and manner, soon soothed and reconciled the Earl to the vexatious disclosure he had made—vexatious only because the Earl had thought fit, so very unnecessarily, to make a mystery of an every-day matter.

BITING THE BITER.—"The other evening," says a London paper, "a well-known novelist, a man of great coolness and courage, was met by a stout fellow, who pulled out a poinard and demanded his purse. 'Capital!' the other exclaimed, 'I was just about to make the same demand on you—but come, as I find I have fallen in with one of ourselves, I'll give you a share of a prime job I have got in hand. Come along!' Deceived by this confidence, the real rogue joined the counterfeiter, and they stole along together till they were met by a patrol, into whose hands the good-natured friend unkindly lodged his associate.

BY QUIZ.

No. 1.—THE PUNCTUAL MAN.

At precisely a quarter of an hour before the clock strikes eight, every morning in the year, excepting only Sunday, Good Friday, and Christmas day, a neat dapper little man—seemingly habited in the same invariable suit of sober black, broad-brimmed hat, white neckcloth, tight inexpressibles, and large, easy, square-toed shoes, with the same little brown gingham umbrella in his hand, summer and winter, sunshine and shower—may be seen to emerge from a little, low, old-fashioned brick-built, but newly stucco-faced tenement, which, in house-agency parlance, would be described as located in a retired situation exactly three miles and three-quarters from the three bridges.

Aminadab Lightfoot—more familiarly known and recognized as "The Punctual Man," is a quiet, inoffensive, particular individual; one who has never been known to wear either a smile or a frown upon his face, or to utter an expression remarkable for its pleasantness or anger, for its dullness or its wit. He is a human mill-horse, beginning his rounds every morning at precisely the same moment of time, and directing his movements throughout the day from sheer habit as regularly as though he were governed by a chronometer, or actuated by the machinery of an automaton. Although estimating himself at a very low rate in the scale of human importance, he confers much greater benefit upon society than he has any conception of, he being made to serve the purpose of watch or clock, omnibus touter and time-keeper, and note of warning alike to the idle and to the industrious. For, at his presence, little boys shoulder their bags and trudge, whistling, to school; omnibuses rush from their stands, and conductors stun passengers with their vociferations of "Fleet street"—"Bank"—"Charing-cross"—"Elephant Castle,"—or whatever the point of destination may be; servant-maids beat mats upon steps and against walls, dispersing the previous day's accumulation of dust in copious showers upon passers by; pot-men commence their daily occupation of gathering in tarnished pots, and bawling for greasy, often-thumbed newspapers; butcher boys and baker lads instantly leave their games of pitch and toss, or "mivies," at the corners of streets, and start off to procure orders, or to deliver hot loaves; green grocers, coal retailers, and cat's-meat men issue abroad to follow their several vocations and halloo their varied cries to the disturbing of sick patients, awakening fractious children, and souring the tempers of nursery-maids who wish to loll and flirt; and of poor mothers who are compelled to drudge by stealth while the little ones sleep. Yes, Aminadab is the moral sun in his own small hemisphere, whose rising and setting actuates the whole of the animal world by which he is surrounded. The very quadrupeds, feline and canine, appear to regulate their cravings by his motions; for no sooner has he shut the door of his snugger, than, as if by a species of natural instinct, the whole vicinage becomes alive, teeming with these fourfooted creatures, anxiously awaiting the coming of the purveyor of their food. Unconscious of all this sensation, however, is our "punctual man," as he traverses the path-way crossing each street every day at precisely the same instant of time, and arriving at the termination of his journey at exactly the same tick of the clock.

At the same instant every morning does Aminadab awake from his slumbers, start from his couch, and array himself in the same, or similar articles of clothing; at the same minute sit down to his breakfast, and, as if by the striking of a stop-watch, measure the strength of his appetite; at the same moment swallow his last crust, and rise to brush his hat, and draw on his gloves, open the street-door, shut himself out (for the secret of his punctuality is, that every thing that it is possible for him to do he accomplishes, never leaving another to do for him that which he can execute for himself,) and at the same unvarying pace, peregrinate to the city.

It is so many years since "the punctual man" first took up his abode in that quarter, and commenced his perpetual round of punctuality, that no one can remember when first it began, or dream of its ever coming to an end; and so accustomed to seeing him pass at precisely the same instant, have all who domicile in his route become, that, although none save those who have constituted him their ideal, expressly watch for his passing, were he once to fail, a wheel of the world's machinery would seem to them to have been broken. And so true is it, that the constant practice of the one makes habituants of the many—that, although he has never been known to ride in his life, or to give a penny away in charity, every omnibus conductor and cab-driver hail him as he passes by, and every crossing-scraper appeals to him as he approaches; neither the one nor the other, at the same time, expecting a fare or a farthing, as he has made it a rule (and his charities are as extensive as they are punctually paid) never to ride when he can walk, or to give casual doles in the streets.

Arrived at his close, dingy, back office, looking out upon a dirty, formerly white-washed wall, one uniform system is pursued from hour to hour, and from day to day. Thus, the better coat is exchanged for a threadbare, time-honored garment—the same one which has been similarly used from time immemorial—the iron-safe unlocked, the account books opened and laid upon the well-worn desk, for they are things of deep mystery, which the young urchin who plays in the outer room and runs errands is never allowed to peep into or to touch; the stool adjusted, the fire stirred, (if in winter,) the pen nibbed, the office clock consulted, and the business of the day begun. Exactly as the clock warns for five in the evening, the books are re-closed and re-deposited, the safe re-locked, the coat re-adjusted, the hat re-brushed, the gloves again put in requisition, and at the first stroke of the hour, the office door opens, and Aminadab Lightfoot retraces his way to his suburban abode.

Aminadab is a solecism, a unit. He has neither friend nor relation, and for years past has never been known either to receive a visitor or to pay a visit. With the exception of his antiquated housekeeper, he has not an inmate in his abode—no dog, no cat, no—not even a canary, or a stray, half-starved mouse, as though he were afraid to harbor aught that might disturb his serenity, or interfere with that regularity of habit and manner which now seem almost to constitute one of the elements of his existence. Few know his name—none his age, origin, or occupation. The former, even by the most acute in divination, is a point that has long since been given up as hopeless. The latter, however, have more than once been the subjects of surmise. And "many a time and oft" has "La dame de Maison" been covertly questioned, or openly attacked, upon these and other matters, in vain. Although as chatty as old maids are wont to be upon "things in general," and "general things," yet upon all that relates to her master, no dumb creature can be more taciturn. Is he rich? Is he old? Is he happy? Is he a merchant? Is he a lawyer? Who is he? What is he? What does he do? Where does he come from? Does he read? Does he talk? Does he sing? Has he always been the same? Is his house inside a good house? Is the furniture handsome? Is it modern? Is it ancient?—are questions that have been often repeated, but never replied to. Thus much, however, has been obscurely hinted at. That he was once very poor, very inconsiderate, very irregular in his habits—that he was taken by the hand by a rich merchant—himself a "punctual man"—that he bade Aminadab copy his example, and promised that if he did, he would "make a man of him." That the advice being good, and the expectation better, the former was taken, and the latter realized—that many years afterward, the rich merchant, who had previously made Aminadab his clerk, had died, and left to his faithful servant, his fortune and his business. That this business declined and dwindled away—but, that notwithstanding it soon fell off entirely, Aminadab could not refrain, day after day, and week after week, from continuing his accustomed routine.

Not only in matters of business and civil relations is Aminadab worthy of his soubriquet, but in the performance of his religious duties he is still the same man of habit; and, in all faithfulness, let us add, something more. Every Sabbath morning as the clock indicates the approach of eleven, is he to be found occupying the corner of his little pew—which corner is not less worthily or regularly filled by his housekeeper in the afternoon; and every day of his life, does he, with the same exactitude, perform those duties of a religious character which are incumbent upon all God's intelligent creatures. We would not go the length of asserting that, as elsewhere, so in the sanctuary, he is regarded as little better than a time-piece, but we do verily believe that the organist never thinks of playing the first voluntary until he sees that Aminadab is seated, and that the parson would as soon expect not to preach at all, as to preach and not to "the punctual man."

That he thus contrives to avoid many of the ills of life, such as being too late for breakfast in the morning, and too late for tea in the afternoon, too late to transact his business, whatever that business may be, with efficiency, and too late to perform the duties of life with comfort and composure, must be confessed; yet, even this extreme punctuality has engendered habits, which, at times, occasion what to other mortals would be the causes of considerable annoyance. Thus, having in earlier life contrived to get through a three months' courtship, his very precision lost him a wife and gained him an action for breach of promise—on this wise. The wedding-day having been fixed, invariable custom prevailed, and at the very time he should have been placing the ring upon the fourth finger of the lady's left hand, he was nibbling his pen upon the first finger of his own. In another instance, it lost him a fortune of considerable worth; for having been suddenly summoned to the death-bed of a former friend, who desired to make him the sole depository of his wealth, in consequence of his not quitting his office till his wonted time, on his arrival at his friend's house, he found it shut up, the intended benefactor a corpse, and the will unexecuted. And, in a third instance, it occasioned his catching a very violent cold, from standing awhile at his door, in the midst of a snow storm, waiting for the return of his housekeeper from a neighboring gossip's, she having availed herself of the knowledge that it had, for once, been his intention to forego his usual custom, and to dine out. And thus is it clearly demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt, that not only has every good its evil, but that a veritable good may be turned into a positive evil.

ANECDOTE OF NAPOLEON.

The Emperor, on arriving at Brienne, made several inquiries after old Mother MARGARET: such was the appellation given to a good wife who occupied a cottage in the midst of the forest, to which the pupils of the military school had, in days of yore, made frequent excursions. NAPOLEON had not forgotten the name, and he learned with no less pleasure than surprise, that the good old dame was still in existence. Continuing his morning ride, he struck into the forest, galloped to the well-known spot, and having dismounted, unceremoniously entered the cottage. Age had somewhat impaired the old woman's sight, and the Emperor's person was much changed. "Good morning, Mother MARGARET," said NAPOLEON, saluting his hostess; "it seems you have no curiosity to see the Emperor?" "Yes, but I have; I should like of all things to see him, and I intend to take that basket of fresh eggs to Madame DE BRIENNE, that I may be invited to remain at the chateau, and so catch a glimpse of the Emperor. Ah! I shall not see him so well to-day as formerly, when he used to accompany his comrades to old Mother MARGARET's and call for a bowl of new milk. To be sure, he was not Emperor then, but no matter; the rest marched before him. He always made them pay me for my milk, eggs, brown bread, and broken crockery, and commenced paying his own share of the reckoning." "Then," replied NAPOLEON, with a smile, "you have not forgotten BONAPARTE?" "Forgotten him! Do you think one could forget such a steady, serious, melancholy like, young gentleman, so considerate too for the poor? I am a weak old woman, but I always foretold that the lad would turn out well." "Why, yes; he has made his way." At the commencement of this short dialogue, the Emperor had turned his back to the door, and consequently to the light; the narrow entrance thus blocked up, the interior of cottage was left in darkness. By degrees, however, he approached the old woman, and the light again penetrated from without. The Emperor, upon this, rubbing his hands together, assuming the tone and manners of his early youth—"Come Mother MARGARET," said he, "bestir yourself—some milk and fresh eggs; I am half dead with hunger." MARGARET stared at her visitor, and seemed as though endeavoring to recall her buried recollections. "Ha! ha!" said the Emperor, laughing; "how positive you were just now that you had not forgotten BONAPARTE! we are old acquaintances, dame!" Meanwhile, old MARGARET had fallen at the Emperor's feet. Raising her with unaffected kindness—"Have you nothing to give me, Mother MARGARET," said he; "I am hungry—as hungry as a student." The poor woman, beside herself with joy, hastily laid before her guest some fresh eggs and new milk. His repast finished, NAPOLEON forced his purse into the hands of his hostess, at the same time observing, "You recollect, MARGARET, I used to make every one pay his reckoning. Adieu! I shall not forget you," and as he again mounted his horse and rode away, the old Dame, weeping with excess of delight, and straining her eyes to catch a last look, could only recompense him with her prayers.

THE PARIS BALLS.

To be complete, a fête must have its characteristic, stamp, and meaning. There are fêtes, even in the grande monde, of very different kinds, and each has its merit and peculiar charm; this is the reason why balls that have no physiognomy, and that belong to none of the distinct kinds we shall attempt to describe, are prohibited in good company.

Will you, and can you give what we shall call the bal grandiose? In such case, manage matters on a grand scale; have, like the English Embassy, superb drawing rooms, magnificent galleries, corridors of flowers, innumerable lacqueys, and a supper table perpetually supplied; and, then, invite two thousand persons, English, Russians, French, Spaniards, and Germans; to fill up, people to animate and consume all that. It will be a splendid fairy scene, replete with dazzling illusions, a living panorama, wherein all the nations of Europe will be gloriously represented. Your guests will have illustrious personages to look at, interesting recollections to bring home. They will dance, chat, walk, and amuse themselves. They will certainly be a little fatigued. They will suffer from the orchestra's noise, the bustling of the crowd, and the brightness of the lights. They will be stunned, but they will be delighted, and will enthusiastically exclaim—"It is admirable! Never did I behold a finer fête!" The bal grandiose is, indeed, of all assemblies, the most highly valued; but it is not everybody that can pretend to give one. It requires gigantic proportions, and admits of no arrière pensée, no niggardliness, no bargaining. You must devote your whole residence to it; sacrifice all your treasure, the flowers of your hot-house, the pictures of your favorite drawing-room. That brilliant crowd must move about in all directions. Even your elegant retreat must afford a refuge to such as wish to fly the throng. At supper-time that nation of guests must at one glance be it not satiated, at least comforted, by the splendor of the banquet and the case of the service. They are famished only because they fear they will have nothing to eat; one perceives that there is much company at a ball only because one is in want of everything—of air, room, seats, and tables. What matters a multitude where space and abundance exist? Lay it down therefore, an as aphorism, that to prevent confusion at a fête there must be profusion.

A second kind of ball is the bal de vanité. This ball is generally very sumptuous, and of irreproachable elegance; but serious like vanity, and cold like affectation. To a bal de vanité everybody comes with a regret, and after accomplishing a sacrifice. One has stooped to meanness, in order to get herself invited; another has treated herself to a ball-dress, or some little diamonds, beyond her budget, and little diamonds are those that cost most. The master of the house scarcely knows the grand seigneurs he has invited, and the honor of whose attendance his gildings and hangings have deserved; he salutes them with an affected air; it is only by dint of self-importance that he succeeds in concealing his embarras. He feels confidence only when he sees them examine with disdainful envy the magnificence of his house. It is so flattering to be envied by people who make nothing of you! The bals de vanité are seldom animated, and not many are given. One is not amused, but one is pleased at them. Where you feel yourself selected, you feel of a superior nature to common nature; you may even fancy yourself at these balls of a more delicate nature, for you are chilled and easily catch cold at them; but you put up with that unpleasantness, and turn it to account by saying for a whole week to all such of your friends as were not asked to that bal d'élite, "I am very unwell ma chère; I caught a tremendous cold the other day at Madame de —'s ball." "What, were you there?" "Yes; it was charming."

Nevertheless, the bals de vanité have a peculiar feature which gives them a great value; a splendor well understood, and which seems habitual, an extreme recherche in details, are the characteristics of such sort of fêtes; but that extreme recherche itself is not destitute of tristesse, neither is that imposing splendor free from bitterness. One feels that all those fine things have the fault of being indispensable; they are the conditions of the treaty; erase those gildings, tear off those hangings, and all that bright company, so proud of having been admitted, and yet so kind as to have come, .... will disappear. When you think of that, all the richness which you at first beheld with admiration will ultimately appear to you ugly, ay, ugly, like .... a condition. Is there anything in the world uglier than a condition.

A third kind of ball is what we must call a bal indigène for want of another word. We mean by this expression a natural ball, given without effort, trouble, or pretension, in one's country, in one's quartier, at one's house, to one's society and family, according to one's fortune and station. For these fêtes the invitations are made by one's self, and one knows all the guests assembled in one's drawing-rooms. At those exceptional balls all know one another, and, as all have long known one another, none strive to deceive one another. Mothers do not conceal their ages, nor do they conceal their daughters'; what would be the use of it? The daughter is known to be twenty years old. At these balls nobody displays a fictitious splendor; your fortune is known within a centime; there is no hypocrisy, no insolence, everybody knows who you are and what has befallen you. As nobody has to play a part or maintain a lie, the consequence is that every guest appears to advantage, with all his esprit, gracefulness and good humor. Vivent les bals indigènes! they are a fatigue to nobody, not even to the mistress of the house, who has no other task than that of being as amiable, and courteous, and hospitable as she may be on any other day. Just ask Madame de Choi—, or Madame de Chast; you were at their houses last week. Those two balls were charming, they were the two prettiest fêtes of the year. Well, such is the bai indigène.

There is another sort of ball, neither more elegant, nor more distingué, because that is impossible; but more merveilleux, more exquisite, and more critically nice; it is the bai de garçon. Sometimes he that gives it is married and re-married, but that makes no difference in the denomination; if there be no wife to do the honors of the ball, it is a bai de garçon. Those fêtes are admirable, they have a peculiar stamp: pretty or handsome women only are to be seen at them; a free man has a right to do away with paquets—it is one of the blessings of his independence. His drawing-room is no longer a drawing-room; it is a list wherein the beauties of all countries come and combat; it is a struggle of elegance, a tournament with the fan, in which there are triumphs for all the combatants, since there are there judges and heralds determined on proclaiming victory on the side of each of them. As you know, in every quarter of Paris every elegant coterie has its queen of beauty, its Célimène par excellence, its fashionable woman. Well, at that incomparable ball all those rival sovereigns are in presence of one another, assembled, on that occasion only, in a glorious congress where their renown and the honor of their coterie is to be suitably upheld. What an emulation in dress and amiability. Fancy a magnificent bouquet, all whose intelligent flowers should select, in order to enrapture you, their loveliest hues and sweetest perfumes. The balls of Prince Tuff— are the most celebrated of this kind; the last was superb; what a number of lovely English women, of handsome Russians, and of graceful Parisians! How speedily one could guess at the fundamental thought of that assembly! How quickly one could see, on beholding those charming young women, that it was elegance and beauty that gave them the right to be there!

Among agreeable fêtes we shall also reckon the bals d'occasion, or bals de voyageurs. These have no pretension to splendid hangings and gilt wainscotings. It is a fête improvisée, animated, cheerful, and amusing, like all impromptu pleasures. The mistress of the house seems to say: "I am not at home; I am answerable for nothing here; I have selected the best I could in your Paris. If you think it bad it is your own fault. Why have you nothing finer? Come and see me at my palace at Naples, Vienna, St. Petersburg, or Madrid, and you may then judge of me. It is not a fête I give you; it is hospitality that I promise you. Remember but one thing of this soirée, it is the pleasure I shall every where have in receiving you." These bals d'occasion, given par extraordinaire, are sometimes so successful that one is obliged to give several more.

And the bai d'enfants? Oh! how delightful that is, especially since the fashion of real children is revived! It was but lately that there were no more children! Persons from six months to five years, old stile condescended to be children; but beyond five years, we beheld but pedantic or old people—little gentlemen six and a half years' old, already rather conceited, and extremely silly, disdaining their sisters, and scolding their mothers when they committed some blunders in English—petites maîtresses of six at most, wearing a mantelet, and tying a bonnet with the experience of an old coquette, criticising this, and depreciating that, with the aplomb of an old journalist. Really children had vanished, and we had but old people in miniature. The saying, as "grave as a councillor" had made room for "as grave as a schoolboy." Children were then so serious that one trembled when one offered them bombons. Thanks to heaven, the spirit of childhood has returned; and it was delightful the other night to see, in the fine drawing-room of Madame de Ch—, all those graceful little girls trip along, and all those pretty little boys gambol. Vainly did a solemn-looking dancing-master direct his huge spectacles on all those tiny feet, and striving to regulate their steps, and to keep their buoyant gaiety within the chains of a quadrille. His efforts were fruitless and the confusion adorable. Ah, depend upon it, a bai d'enfants is a charming thing, provided they be real children.

The bai de cour.... You know what that is now—a collection of bourgeois.

The bai, or rather soirée des célébrités!.... You are acquainted with that also; it is an admirable collection of supériorités; a cabinet of intellects. All hasten to it. One is easily amused; the very invitation is flattering, and we are always pleased where we are flattered.

We have, lastly, the bai forcé, the ball of necessity, which one gives from duty, and for the sake of one's position. This is of admirable harmony. Here every inconvenience is counterbalanced by a contrary inconvenience. The apartment is ill decorated.... but, on the other hand, it is ill-lighted. Here it is too warm, but, further on, a vast deal too cold. You perspire in the drawing-room, but freeze in the dining-room, which opens on an icy staircase. The band is indifferent.... but it cannot be heard—it is in the next room. The refreshments are not copious, but they are very bad. Fortunately there is not enough of them for every body. The danseurs are scarce.... but they are old. The danseuses are not pretty.... but they are badly dressed. One has not troubled oneself about procuring what constitutes an agreeable ball, such as handsome danseurs and lovely young danseuses; for the object is not to give an elegant fête, but to assemble people out of condescendence and obligation, such as superiors upon whom one depends, or influential people whom one wants, and people whom one wants are always ugly. In short, the bai forcé is triste and singularly ennuyeux; but it is over early, which is a bright compensation. And if the master of the house, when he takes his leave of you, looks as if he said—"I did not ask you for my amusement," when you return his salute you seem to answer—"I did not come to amuse myself."

This is, methinks, a pretty long catalogue of balls. The only one of them that we have forgotten is that we are going to this evening. Let us be off, for it is getting very late.—[Madame de Girardin.]

PELLETS FOR PROSERS.

ONE day, when the fêtes on Parnassus were ended, And Helicon dull for the rest of the year, Like other gay tourists, Apollo descended With Momus—to visit his votaries here! For whoever the other gods took to amuse them, They found them so learn'd, or so dull, or so prim, That sometimes they'd leave them—and sometimes they'd lose them;—

So he always took Folly to travel with him!

Having lasso'd two Pegasus-ponies—they bound them With sunbeams for traces—took stars for their seat; And thus, at each step flinging rainbows around them, They alighted, like sunset, in Marlborough-street! But there the old Temple they stopped at so often, Was shut in their teeth!—and 't was only in spite Of orders the strictest, they managed to soften The Porter—and sit in the shop for the night!

But Apollo who cares very little for sleeping, Tried over some "Chansons" that seemed rather new; While Momus, who always loved bindings—and peeping At pictures and Peers—looked the Annuals through! And often, when struck by some discord within it, Apollo would fling down his song with a sneer; While Momus cried out with delight ev'ry minute, "What a gem of a Print!—What a love of a Peer!"

So they got through the night;—and next morning they wander'd [find] Through all the new streets, and new squares they could And though Momus his whole stock of sympathy squandered, Apollo could scarce find a spot to his mind! There were altars to Reason, and temples to Science, But Poesy's minarets nowhere arose; And go where they would, still a look of defiance Glared on them from some hideous statue of—PROSE!

When they came to St. Stephen's, they quickened their paces, "For here," said the god, "in the brightest of days, Though banished from all polished temples and places, Prose ever found worshippers loud in her praise!" Folly showed him a statue;—"Ah! yes," said Apollo, "That's one of my martyrs they knocked on the head; Prose's gibbet for Genius!—least others should follow, And scatter round diamonds where they drop but lead!"

They crossed a broad stream—hoping still to discover Some garden or grove where a shrine might appear; And they asked a pale youth whom they took for a lover, But who was a dull Prose-ite—"What building is here? It seems much enlarged—and we should know its features." "T is Bedlam,"—the Earth-born replied with a bow—"But we've added the wings for poor moonstricken creatures Called poets—the law does not tolerate now!"

Now, altho' they had heard that "Reform" was effected, They knew not till then of one clause the Bill had, Wherein 't was expressly laid down and directed All poets should thenceforth be treated as mad! For Prose in a speech full of radical glories, Assured them that Verse,—unless driven to the wall, Meant, one day or other, to bring back the Tories, Old feelings—old fashions—Old Sarum and all!

Thus they wandered along till the nightfall was closing; And still, as they listened to each one that pass'd, High and low, young or old, they were all of them prose-ing, Good full-weighted prose—of our own English cast! And once a poor youth as he gazed up to Heaven, With eyes lit with more than th' exact standard light, Was led to the station-house,—orders being given To take up all star-gazers—be whom they might!

But the worst case of all was a poor little maiden Who sat at her casement,—her eyes fixed above, And whose lips,—for you saw that her heart was o'erladen, Murmured some little song about "Moonlight and Love!" For they learned that an anti-Apollo informer, That night,—and in Prose's own lead-colored Fly, Least her warm little brain might grow, possibly, warmer, Shut her up in a convent of Prose-ites—close by!

"By my wings!" said Apollo, "with this sort of fuel No wonder my altars grow black in the sun; We thought, in Olympus, their poor-laws were cruel, But their poor-laws beat them,—a thousand to one!" "By my bauble!" said Momus, "I think the thing glorious; A poet was always a pauper—at best; But now we shall have the twin-brothers uproarious,— And poor-law, and poor-law, both set at rest!"

So they went for their ponies, but found them so beaten, They scarcely could flutter a step from the door; For nor sonnet nor song had the little bloods eaten, Since they left their own stables,—full two days before! And instead of returning in rainbows and glories, They arrived out of humor—out of sorts—out of breath! Like a couple of prose-ridden Pegasus-tories, Whom earth's vile reformers had worried to death!

When they heard, in Olympus, on what sort of diet The party had lived,—and our state here on earth,— "But how," cried they all, "were their women so quiet, Sustained but on love and on song—since their birth?" But they told them,—tho' Prose's attorneys were bringing Their actions by dozens,—to stop every ear, That one of the SHERIDAN SWANS was still singing, And THAT was the cause of our quiet down here! Athenaeum Club, Feb. 23, 1841. P.H.

CHOKING OFF A LAWYER.—The best and most effectual check ever given to a verbose pettifogger occurred in a well known western city, and is within our own knowledge as a fact. Much against his will, a shrewd, plain spoken, straight forward citizen was called from his business and forced upon a jury to pronounce verdict over some trivial point of litigation. He sat some time patiently until he got the merits of the case and saw that the matter was just worth the toss of a red cent, and far worthier of being so decided than thrust into a court of justice. Yet a pedantic looking small lawyer got up, having an ostentatious display of law books before him, and giving every indication that he was going to commence a prolix fanfaronade, a kind of forensic oratory for which he was somewhat celebrated among the different justices courts and other bars of the place.—After several pompous Ames and Amos, he commenced—

"Gentlemen of the jury"—

"Look here," said our jurymen, rising and pulling out his watch—"I've just got one remark to make before you go on. If you talk more than five minutes I'll give my verdict against you! Now you see the less you say the better."

The lawyer took the hint, consented to be choked off, and was rewarded by the paltry verdict he wished to gain.—[Picayune.]

TO A CHILD.

BY JOANNA BAILLIE.

Whose imp art thou, with dimpled cheek,
And curly pate, and merry eye,
And arm and shoulder round and sleek,
And soft and fair?—thou urchin shy!

What boots it who with sweet caresses
First called thee his—or squire or hind?
Since thou in every wight that passes,
Dost new a friendly play-mate find.

Thy downcast glances, grave but cunning,
As fringed eye-lids rise and fall;
Thy shyness, swiftly from me running,
Is infantine coquetry all.

But far a-field thou hast not flown:
With mocks and threats, half hissed, half spoken;
I feel thee pulling at my gown,
Of right good will thy simple token.

And thou must laugh and wrestle too,
A mimic warfare with me waging;
To make, as wily lovers do,
Thy after kindness more engaging.

The wilding rose, sweet as thyself,
And new-cropt daisies are thy treasure:
I'd gladly part with worldly pelf
To taste again thy youthful pleasure.

But yet, for all thy merry look,
Thy frisks and wiles, the time is coming
When thou shalt sit in cheerless nook,
The weary spell or horn-book thumbing.

Well; let it be! through weal and woe,
Thou know'st not now thy future range;
Life is a motley, shifting show,
And thou a thing of hope and change.

FUSILI.—The following anecdote respecting Fuseli's extravagance as a painter, was related to me by poor Charles Stothard:—He called one day on Fuseli, and found him very busy. A canvas so large as to fill one side of his painting room was before him—the work far advanced. In one of the lower corners might be seen a bit of the end of a boat. At the top of the picture, in the opposite corner, a bit of the top of a rock, darkness and water between. Stretched right across the whole canvas, one peaked toe just touching the boat, the uplifted arm, on the other side, just touching the rock above, was seen the flying figure of a man of proportions as colossal as the canvas, all the muscles of his form marked as strongly as if they had been bared by the dissecting knife; his eyes flaring, his mouth open, his hair standing on end. "Mr. Fuseli," said Charles Stothard, "what have we here?"—"That is William Tell, jumping out of de boat," exclaimed Fuseli, in a stentorian voice, flourishing in one hand the pallet, and in the other the pencil. "Bless me, Mr. Fuseli, where will he alight when landed?"

THE JEWEES.—Fontanes asked Chateaubriand, "if he could assign a reason why the women of the Jewish race were so much handsomer than the men;" to which Chateaubriand gave the following truly poetical and Christian one:—"The Jewesses," he said, "have escaped the curse which alighted upon their fathers, husbands, and sons. Not a Jewess was to be seen among the crowd of priests and rabble who insulted the Son of God, scourged him, crowned him with thorns, and subjected him to ignominy and the agony of the cross. The women of Judea believed in the Saviour, and assisted and soothed him under afflictions. A woman of Bethany poured on his head precious ointment, which she kept in a vase of alabaster. The sinner anointed his feet with perfumed oil, and wiped them with her hair. Christ, on his part, extended his mercy to the Jewesses. He raised from the dead the son of the widow of Nain, and Martha's brother, Lazarus. He cured Simon's mother-in-law, and the woman who touched the hem of his garment. To the Samaritan woman he was a spring of living water, and a compassionate judge to the woman in adultery. The daughters of Jerusalem wept over him; the holy women accompanied him to Calvary, brought balm and spices, and weeping sought him in the sepulchre. 'Woman, why weepest thou?' His first appearance after the resurrection, was to Mary Magdalene. He said to her, 'Mary.' At the sound of his voice, Mary Magdalene's eyes were opened, and she answered, 'Master.' The reflection of some very beautiful ray must have rested on the brow of the Jewesses."

A COFFEE-HOUSE DINNER.—Oh, what a sum of suffering is represented in the term! Who has forgotten the slice of watery cod, apparently boiled in the weeds which serve for garniture; with a large blob of bookbinder's paste, in which crude oysters were stuck? For condiment, soy with flies in it, or anchovy, which will not pour; and cayenne, whose heat has faded, while the grains have consolidated. Two or three long kidney potatoes a l'eau, and thoroughly saturated with the simple element in which they were boiled. To follow, according to custom, the slice of a cow's hide, by courtesy styled a steak, tough and black, but set off with lumps of yellow fat, the sight whereof would distress an Esquimaux. Add to this a substance resembling mixed lamp-black and grease, for gravy. After the struggle with the steak, if the guest had a tooth left in his head, he, perhaps, was mad enough to order a tart; which was composed of the third of an apple cut into alices, keeping shape perfectly, and defying the operation of baking, by a vigorous constitutional curdly—covered with a pale, dry crust, ready to part from the dish at the slightest instance, as weary of the stale connexion. Next, a cheese, more biting than bitten, which had felt warmth, and whose coatings were beautifully glazed, and delicately powdered with dust. To these delicacies, add the menstium of a pint of hot and distasteful compound, drunk only because it was put in a decanter and to be paid for; and, lastly, that enormity of enormities, THE BILL:—

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 3, 1841.

REMARKS ON CLIMATE, AND ESPECIALLY THAT OF THE HARBOR OF NEW-YORK.

The influence of climate on man, its agency in the production and alleviation of disease, its effects as a moral power, and its universal importance in the economy of the physical condition of our earth, develop a theme interesting and extensive for consideration.

To pursue an inquiry into so varied and important a subject with any degree of success, requires a mind devoted, patient, elastic, capable of analysis and deduction, and one well furnished with data, obtained from long and laborious observation. In its various departments, it embraces the whole extent of physical science; and so extensive, indeed, is it, that it would require years and folios to unfold its various windings. The object of the present remarks is necessarily confined to the more prominent topics in relation to the subject; and we shall present only a brief summary of facts in reference to the climate, soil, &c., of the surrounding region of country.

CLIMATE, in ordinary parlance, signifies simply the peculiar temperature of localities; in a more extended application of the term it embraces, not only the temperature, but all combined and collateral agencies—the characteristic features of the country, its position on the terrestrial space, its nature, soil, productions, &c.

The varieties of circumstantial detail, gathered from observation, indicate the necessity of classification as the best means to deduce the relative intensity of the several agents in operation. There seems to be, indeed, a certain natural distribution of climates, and these have been from time immemorial known as the Torrid, the Temperate, and the Frigid. No classification, however, can be definite, as the situation of a country does not necessarily indicate climate, and the temperature, hygrometric state, &c., are so much altered and modified by the surface formation, as in many cases even to eclipse the climatic peculiarities incident to a latitude. This common division of the earth by zones seems, however, a fit basis on which to found a classification, and would be complete, did temperature depend solely on the position of the sun. The several modifications and their causes may become subordinate divisions. The principal modifications are produced by the ocean, the great lakes, mountains, and the state of irrigation from rivers and canals which a country endures. The constitution of the soil, the state of cultivation, &c., may be considered as collateral influences, and perhaps of little importance in a general view of the subject. Each of these divisions may be subdivided again into classes—thus:

Class 1. Regions on the borders of the ocean;
“ 2. “ “ “ large lakes or inland seas;
“ 3. “ in the vicinity of lofty mountains;
“ 4. “ in the interior, unmodified by elevations, &c.
And again these classes may be reduced to subdivisions or orders, founded on the peculiarities of the geological structure of the location, and further by sections derived from minor peculiarities. Such an arrangement seems to be rational, and though in many cases insufficient and inaccurate, would facilitate the acquisition of climatic varieties. Cultivation, it is admitted on all hands, is a great moderator of all climates. This country is said to have lost a great share of its intensity, since the emigration and toil of the white man; and Germany, which in the times of Cæsar was extremely cold, is now one of the most temperate countries of Europe.

New-York properly belongs to Div. 2, Temperate. Class 1—on the sea-board; and it may be proper now to state a few of the peculiarities of its climate. This portion of the United States is situated on the sea-board of the Atlantic, in latitude 40° 42' 40" N—Longitude 74° 1' 5", and consequently is open to all the influences of a sea-board location—the frequent changes of weather, the boisterousness of the sea-winds, the moist state of the atmosphere, &c. The effects of such climatic influences is strongly marked and recognized in the details of the Register's "Reports of Burials in the City and County." It is perhaps the most inveterate climate on the continent. The various degrees of temperature will be seen in the following tabular view, to which reference will be made throughout these remarks:

The above tables are all furnished from an average of ten years, (1831–40,) and it has been thought proper to exhibit them before entering further into the subject. The collateral objects of meteorological observations will be added as an appendix to what may be said on the subject.

The location of New-York, as before remarked, exposes it to all the vicissitudes of weather. The country round about is chiefly level; the soil, vegetable in its origin, is black and rich and is under the highest state of cultivation. It is about seven miles from the main ocean, and is well irrigated by numerous large rivers and streams intersecting its beautiful and picturesque scenery. The peculiar influence of the sea-board as a modifier of the distribution of annual temperature is satisfactorily ascertained by comparing it with the averages of places remote from the ocean. As an example, let us take New-York and the interior remote from the sea in the same parallel of latitude: the annual mean temperature of New-York is 52.57, with a range in the several years of 10°; that of the interior is about 48.99—the former being an average of 10 years, the latter of 5 years. The figures representing New-York may be considered a high ratio, as the mean annual is in general represented at about 46° or 49°, which is probably the truth; so that the slight difference perceived is immaterial as a test of region influences. The differences between the extremes of these two localities is 35°—that of New-York being 99°, and the interior 134°. The distribution of heat into the several quarters in the two places is thus:

	1st Quarter.	2d Quarter.	3d Quarter.	4th Quarter.
New-York. ....	31.75	57.18	69.11	42.27
Interior. ....	21.89	48.91	75.26	50.40

In the former the mean temperature of winter is 9° 86 higher than the latter; that of spring 8° 27 higher; of summer 6° 15 lower; and of winter 8° 13 lower. This contrast is seen plainer by comparing the mean difference of the means of summer and winter: it being on the sea-board 27° 36; in the interior 53° 37. Thus it will be seen that localities beyond the region of the ocean are subject to greater extremes of temperature; on the sea-board the equalizing property of the water is apparent. In the former region the winds are never so changeable, and storms are unfrequent; whereas, on the oceanic range the winds display a great influence, and assist in a great measure to modify the seasons. Regions on the sea-board are subject to greater moisture both in the way of rains and dews—the weather is more cloudy. In the interior the prevailing weather is fair and dry, and is characterized by great range of temperature in comparison to the ocean region. The following view of the proportions of each in the two regions will sufficiently show the contrast:

	Fair	Cloudy	Variable	Rain	Snow	Foggy
Sea-board .....	227	138	47	71	13	9
Interior .....	216	149	0	46	29	0

The annual quantity of rain that falls at any one place seems, according to Humboldt, to be proportioned to the different latitudes, decreasing from the Equator to the poles; and that celebrated traveller has furnished an average calculation of the respective apportionment—thus:

Latitude.	Mean annual depth of rain.
80°	80 inches.
60°	60 do
40°	40 do
20°	20 do

These, however, cannot be constant: for it is a well-known fact that more rain falls in mountainous than level districts, and that the sea-board is partially exempt from heavy rains. The annual quantity of rain and snow measured in the gauge at New-York is about 48–41 inches. The greatest quantity falls on the 2d and 4th quarters: February and October seem to be the most settled months of the year, and are subject to fewer downfalls or storms. The amount of snow falling at any one place is regulated, according to Scoresby, by the mean temperature. This, however, will scarcely be tenable. We have before us two places in the same latitude; in one it snows 13 and in the other 29 days in the year, and no doubt the quantity is twice as large in the latter. Snow depends more on the distribution of heat among the seasons, and the direction of the winds, than any other causes. In New-York snow in general appears when the wind is easterly, or from the ocean.

Electrical phenomena are also modified by climate in the interior,—where the extremes are far apart, thunder storms are of rare occurrence, but in the ocean region, where the electrical fluid is conveyed from the earth to the clouds through a moist atmosphere, the storms are comparatively frequent, and very violent. In the first quarter, when the air is dry and frozen, it is uncommon to experience a storm of thunder, (the average of New-York being only 0–6.) As the spring advances in the second quarter the hygrometric state of the atmosphere increases, and the ratio of storms becomes greater, (amounting to 17–3, average,) and the same ratio is sustained in the third quarter. The winter averages about 2.

The brilliant coruscations of the Aurora Borealis, or as the Shetlanders term it, "the merry dancers," is sometimes seen in great splendor in these regions. The appearance is not very frequent, compared with more northern latitudes, as in Siberia or Lapland, where it often lends its aid to guide the traveller at night. It is generally looked for in the winter and spring, and more particularly in the months of October and February, when the atmosphere is driest. Whether this electric phenomenon exerts any influence on the weather or weather the source of its appearance, is a question not yet decided.

The nature of the soil exerts a very material influence on the health and habits of man and his destiny. Formed from the decay of vegetable matter, and the gradual attrition of rocky formations, it will not seem wonderful that it should influence thus the economy of man and animals: they derive their sustenance from this source, and all their functions will be adapted or habituated to its peculiarities. The soil about N. Y. is in general rich and highly cultivated: in some districts the earth is made up of sandy loam, and in others of marsh and swampy land. The aggregate, however, is par excellence good and fruitful. The physical aspect of the surrounding country is generally even, or at most diversified by gentle undulations of surface, which renders the location exposed to all the boisterousness of an unprotected sea-board. There are extensive salt marshes on the Jersey shore, but it would be unreasonable to attribute to them any deleterious effect on N. Y.

Among its numerous articles of vegetation this climate fosters many powerful medicinal and highly poisonous plants, which are indigenous. About the city, however, the lands are chiefly laid out for garden purposes or pasture for cattle, and are commonly considered free from miasmatic emanations. The diseases which affect New York are not peculiar: the greatest item, however, in the bills of mortality arises from consumptions and other lung complaints—the offspring of a severe climate, exposure and inattention in matters of dress to sudden vicissitudes. In the summer months lesions of the stomach and bowels are the most fatal: then cholera, dysentery, diarrhoea, &c. devastate the city and fill the grave yards. Fevers are most prevalent about the equinoctial periods, or when there is great moisture or heavy foggy weather; they are chiefly inflammatory, degenerating in their progress to typhus. The intermittent fevers are annihilated as indigenous from these parts under the influence of improved drainage and cultivation. In some parts of Long Island and Staten Island, 8 or 10 miles distant, however, this frightful type of disease is prevalent, especially where there are wild lands and marshes unrecovered. In the year 1523, when the intermittent was raging in these places, this city was entirely free from the scourge. It is worthy of remark here, that one-seventh of the deaths in the city are from phthisis pulmonalis and about two-thirds from other lesions of the thoracic viscera—the highest average in the world. The total deaths recorded are about 1 in 37 of the population annually.

Before concluding these remarks, a list of several of the principal places in Europe and elsewhere will be added, in order that a comparison may be drawn as to the difference of the mean temperature of the months and the mean annual range in each. The mean difference stands thus:

	Mean diff. of month.	Mean range of year.
Pisa .....	5° 75	64°
Naples .....	5° 08	60°
Nice .....	4° 74	62°
Rome .....	4° 39	62°
Madeira .....	2° 40	23°
England .....	3° 05	75°
Fort King (Fa.) .....	4° 28	75°
Fort Marion .....	3° 55	66°
Fort Brooke .....	2° 97	37°
Key West .....	2° 44	37°

The above table may be useful in the choice of a residence for consumptive patients, as it is well known that that climate is preferable where the range is least. Madeira seems to be best calculated for such, as the range is nominal, and the temperature remarkably equal and uniform. The range of New-York is 99°, and is consequently a bad position for a consumptive patient, and this, with its peculiarly moist atmosphere, is the cause of the large ratio of deaths from that disease in the city. In addition may now be appended a small table intended to display the duration of winter in each of the ten years to which it refers:

	First Ice formed.	First Snow fell.	Last Ice formed.	Last Snow fell.
1831.....	Oct. 20...	Nov. 3...	April 10...	April 30
1832.....	Nov. 3...	Dec. 12...	April 10...	Mar. 17
1833.....	Oct. 31...	Dec. 15...	Mar. 29...	Mar. 1
1834.....	Oct. 30...	Nov. 15...	May 15...	April 25
1835.....	Nov. 13...	Nov. 27...	April 18...	April 16
1836.....	Oct. 26...	Nov. 24...	April 12...	April 13
1837.....	Oct. 14...	Nov. 14...	May 1...	April 4
1838.....	Oct. 31...	Oct. 31...	April 17...	April 24
1839.....	Nov. 20...	Nov. 10...	Mar. 31...	April 17
1840.....	Oct. 26...	Nov. 18...	Mar. 26...	April 1

The earliest formed ice in the ten years, was on October 14, 1837; the last formed ice, May 15, 1834: consequently, the extreme duration of frost is 213 days, or about 7 months. The mean duration of winter is about 164 days, or about 5½ months. R. S. F.

NEW-YORK AND VIRGINIA.—The Albany Evening Journal of Monday contains a message from Gov. Seward to the Legislature relative to the late controversy between New-York and Virginia, to which are added the Legislative proceedings in Virginia and Mississippi in relation thereto.

We have not room to republish all that the Journal contains on this subject, but annex a part of Gov. Seward's message.

"On the 24th of February last, I issued a requisition to the Executive of Virginia for the surrender of Robert F. Curry, a fugitive from justice, charged with an aggravated crime of forgery. His Excellency, the Governor of Virginia, admits the regularity of the requisition, and acknowledges that the fugitive has been arrested, and is in actual custody in that Commonwealth, upon the charge contained in the requisition. Nevertheless, he deems it proper to make his compliance with the requisition dependent upon a reversal of the decision heretofore made by the Executive of this State in the case before referred to, and to detain the fugitive in custody six months, to afford time to the Executive of this State to reconsider that subject. By the documents transmitted, it will be seen that I have deemed it my duty, under these extraordinary circumstances, to inform the Governor of Virginia, without delay, that the decision in question cannot be reversed.

It will belong to the Legislature to decide whether the law that seems to have given offence to the Legislature of Virginia shall be repealed: but I trust it will not be deemed improper for me to state, that although I supposed the trial by jury was already effectually secured to persons claimed as fugitive slaves without the passage of the act in question, and therefore believed it unnecessary, yet I cheerfully deferred in that respect to the better judgment of the Legislature, and approved the law, the repeal of which is thus demanded. In my judgment, the law could not now be repealed, and especially under the singular circumstances presented, without raising a presumption that the Legislature intended to deprive our own citizens, or other persons claimed as fugitive slaves, of the right trial by jury. Believing that the right is invaluable as a protection to personal liberty, is peculiarly proper in cases where persons are exposed to the loss of liberty without even a charge of crime, and that it is important to every human being within our jurisdiction, in proportion to the humbleness and defencelessness of his condition, I cannot recommend the repeal of the act. If it became my place to speculate concerning the probabilities of legislative action, and if I supposed it possible, which I certainly do not, that any disposition existed in the Legislature to repeal the act, I should deem it my duty to remonstrate against the measure.

Unwilling to leave any ground for an expectation in regard to the Executive of this State, that convictions of duty which have prevailed, notwithstanding the very elaborate arguments presented by the Executive and Legislature of Virginia, can be removed by any injurious measures adopted by that State, I deem it proper to repeat, in the most solemn manner, that the humble individuals who are pursued by the Governor of Virginia as felons, for the offence of being seamen on board a ship in which a negro seceded himself in order to escape from slavery, if they yet remain in this State, are under the protection of its Constitution and laws, and cannot be surrendered to the State of Virginia by Executive authority, on the pretence set up for that purpose, without a deliberate violation of both, and that this conviction, adopted after most mature and impartial deliberation, and strengthened by subsequent reflection, is in no degree affected by the recent proceedings of the authorities of Virginia.

Without intending any disrespect to the State of Virginia, and cheerfully leaving its authorities to adopt all such proceedings as may seem to them right and proper in regard to the subject, I avail myself of the occasion to declare that measures of retaliation, injury and reprisal, are deemed equally unworthy the dignity of this State, and inconsistent with its federal relations. The Executive of this State, therefore, will not, although such a course has the sanction of the example of his Excellency the Governor of Virginia, offer large rewards to induce persons to seize within the jurisdiction and in violation of the laws of Virginia, fugitives from the justice of this State, requisitions for whose delivery to the authorities of this State have been denied by the Executive of Virginia, but will be content to put forth the legal powers with which he is entrusted. The Executive of this State will not appeal to supposed interests and sympathies in other States, and attempt to combine one portion of the Union against another, but will cheerfully abide for his cause the test of time and free investigation. The constitutional demands of the Executive of Virginia upon the Executive of this State will in all cases be allowed as fully as if the Governor of Virginia met his own obligations in the same manner, nor will measures of retaliatory legislation be recommended. On the contrary, the Executive of this State, confiding in the Constitution and laws of the United States as affording ample remedies for any injuries the citizens of this State may suffer from unconstitutional proceedings on the part of the State of Virginia, is satisfied that it may be safely left to the magnanimity of Virginia, and her own experience of the injurious consequences of those proceedings, to secure an early relinquishment of them, and a due acknowledgment and performance of all her constituted obligations.

NEW-YORK AND VIRGINIA.—The Richmond Whig of Monday, contains a minority report of the Virginia Senate, protesting against "Bayly's Bill"—which bill contains the provisions for non-intercourse between the two States after May, 1842—and proposing some "less objectionable and more effective plan of action." The same paper contains a letter from acting Governor Patton to Gov. Seward, in which the former announces his purpose to surrender Curry on the requisition of the latter.

Gov. Patton's letter is temperate, yet able and spirited. We quote its concluding paragraphs:—

"It is in no spirit of menace, but from an anxious desire to preserve harmony between the States and prevent collisions which must necessarily impair the value and stability of the Union, if they do not endanger and finally destroy it, that I assure your Excellency that the State of Virginia cannot acquiesce in, and will not submit to, those aggressions of New-York, which have occasioned the existing controversy between those two great Commonwealths.

I therefore accompany this communication, informing you of the fact that your demand for the surrender of the fugitive from your State is granted, with an earnest protest against those aggressions, and an anxious and respectful appeal to you, and through you to the State whose organ you are, to review the positions you have taken, and by a magnanimous abandonment of erroneous and untenable opinions and measures, restore those harmonious relations between the States, which it is alike the interest and duty of us all to endeavor to perpetuate."

IOWA.—Although this young and rapidly increasing Territory is beginning to attract the attention of the people in the Atlantic States, yet there are comparatively few east of the Alleghanies who have any definite conception of its vast mineral wealth, or its aptitude for agricultural and commercial pursuits.

Eight years ago this fertile region was the hunting ground of the savage. He skirted every stream where now is heard the woodman's axe. The neat "cabin" of the settler and the wide fields are now covering the fertile plains, where, but yesterday, the war horse of Black Hawk snuffed the breeze of battle.

Our attention has been, for the last few years, attracted to the young republic of Texas, yet the great mass of our people seem to have been unconscious that a young territory has sprung into existence upon the western shore of the Mississippi, and containing already a population of about 50,000 souls; a country which, if we regard it in its physical aspect, or the intelligent and enterprising character of its population, affords the most convincing proof that she will, ere long, occupy a high place in the national confederacy. These reflections have suggested themselves upon a hasty glance of an interesting volume, entitled "Sketches of Iowa, or the Emigrant's Guide," published by J. H. Colton, Merchants Exchange. The author, John H. Newhall, Esq., has long been a resident of that interesting country—and his ample opportunities for minute observation, and extensive research, have enabled him to give a highly interesting description of the agricultural and mineral resources of this hitherto comparatively unknown and unappreciated region.

Such a work must be highly important to the emigrant, the legislator, and the tourist—as it delineates, in a comprehensive view, the elements that will, ere long, constitute the wealth and greatness of this interesting portion of our wide domain. We perceive that Mr. N. has the strong and decided testimony of the Governor and Surveyor-General, as to the fidelity of his delineations—in which opinion we heartily concur—and as it occupies new ground, we recommend a perusal to all those who desire to become more familiar with the unbounded resources of our common country.

NATIONAL BANK.—A citizen of Indiana has given, in the National Intelligencer, the project of a National Bank, of which the following is the outline:—"Capital $15,000,000, owned by citizens of the United States; one-half the stock to be paid at the organization, and the residue in one, two, and three years; to have not less than ten nor more than twenty branches; to be the agent of the Government, and receive the deposits on paying an equivalent; to be expressly prohibited from lending money, trading in stocks, or dealing in anything but money and exchange, and this only at fixed moderate rates, according to distance; and the Directors to be personally responsible for correct management. The Government to appoint agents to examine the Bank and each branch at least once a year; monthly statements of the condition of the Bank to be published; and such other regulations to be made as experience has shown to be proper."

FROM SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The Rochester Daily Advertiser is indebted to Hatch's Express for Sandwich Island papers (the Polynesian,) to October last, brought by the Elizabeth, Capt. Wood. They contain a variety of particulars respecting the Exploring Expedition, which we have before received. A law has been enacted by the sovereigns of the Hawaiian Islands, of which a translation is published. The first section is as follows:

1. If any man take potatoes, sugar-cane, melons, or any other article of food, and transform it to an intoxicating liquor, and drink it, he shall be fined one dollar, and if he do the like again, the fine shall be two dollars, and thus the fine shall be doubled for every offence even to the utmost extent.

A ship yard at Honolulu, owned by Messrs. Robinson, Lawrence & Holt, is described as fitted for the repair of vessels of all descriptions, where the work is done by excellent workmen, and at reasonable price.

ARREST OF RAIL-ROAD ROBBERS.—We learn from the Albany Evening Journal that the robbers who have been long preying upon travelers on the Syracuse and Auburn Rail-Road are at length arrested. This was accomplished by the prompt and determined action of three gentlemen who were robbed on Saturday.

The names of the individuals thus arrested are Richard Graves, collector on the Auburn and Syracuse Rail Road, and George Wall, porter for the Syracuse and Utica Rail Road. The latter, it appears, has already been twice in the States' Prison. The confessions of Wall show that a large amount of money and valuables have recently been stolen by himself and his friend Graves.

¶ The city of Paris has at length succeeded in procuring water from an Artesian well, which has for several years been in progress at Grenelle, at an expense of 160,000 francs. The boring instrument, after having reached the enormous depth of 560 metres, (1837 English feet,) reached the water, which immediately sprang up in abundance to the top of the bore. This operation has resolved a highly interesting geological problem, and proves that a body of water exists under the green chalk strata which forms the bed of the environs of Paris.

¶ A thunder storm passed over the village of Newburgh on Friday night the 26th, and the rain fell in torrents. The lightning struck the roof of a house in Fishkill, near the residence of Dr. James Rumsey. It broke and splintered the rafters and passed down through the floors to the cellar, scattering the earth and boards in every direction. The house was occupied by Wm. Bennet, whose family were sleeping on two feather beds about ten feet apart on the ground floor. They were uninjured, though several planks of the floor were torn up in the centre of the room and some furniture was destroyed.

MCLEOD CASE.—We understand from very good authority that Mr. Webster is of the opinion that a plea to the jurisdiction in this case will be perfectly valid and relieve the question from all its embarrassments. The object of Mr. Crittenden's proposed journey to Lockport was to sustain this plea.

UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.—The Madisonian states that the despatches received by our Government by the Caledonia from Great Britain, are of entirely a pacific character, and although there had been some excitement in England on account of the arrest of McLeod, yet the public mind was becoming more quiet.

INSTITUTION FOR THE BLIND.—The managers of the New-York Institute for the Blind have made their fifth annual report to the Legislature of the State. At the commencement of the past year the number of pupils in the Institute was sixty-nine; at its close seventy-two—forty-six males and twenty-six females. There still remain many vacancies under the state laws. Sixty of the pupils read, and learn arithmetic, geography and grammar; fifteen are taught writing; twenty, logic; five, geometry; and four, algebra. Twenty-five read fluently. Two of the females have not learned to read, from their sense of touch not being sufficiently acute. During the past year two public concerts of music have been given, in which the performance was by the pupils. Eighteen of the male pupils are instructed in the mode of making willow baskets, and four are instructed in weaving. Eight of the females are instructed in the manufacture of band-boxes and other paste boxes. Seven hundred and ninety-three band-boxes and four hundred square boxes, of different sizes, are now on hand. The expense of the institution, including all ordinary disbursements of every kind, were $13,111 52; its ordinary receipts during the same time were $11,739 50.

NAVAL.—United States ship Decatur, Capt. Ogden, sailed from Buenos Ayres Jan. 2, for Montevideo:

The United States exploring squadron was at Oahu, October 16.

The U. S. frigate Macedonian, bearing the broad pennant of Commodore Wilkinson, and sloop-of-war Levant, Captain Fitzhugh, sailed from Pensacola on 1st inst. on a cruise.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

WASHINGTON, March 29th.

General Harrison is confined to his chamber by a severe attack of bilious pleurisy. For several days of last week he had felt somewhat indisposed: yet he continued to devote himself to business, early and late, with his customary activity and diligence. About noon on Saturday, he was seized with an ague which continued for an hour and a half, and was followed by febrile symptoms accompanied with severe pain in the side. Dr. Miller and Dr. May, two distinguished physicians, were immediately summoned, and had recourse to active remedies—cupping, calomel, &c. Under their skilful treatment, the President found great relief, and to-day he appears so much better, that if he continues to improve as rapidly, we may hope he will be able to attend to business in the latter part of the week. The attack was, no doubt, greatly aggravated by the exciting scenes he has gone through during the last month, and the exhausting cares attendant upon the station he holds. With tranquillity and repose, his vigorous constitution will quickly regain its former tone. The attendance of Mrs. Harrison, upon her father-in-law, has been incessant, and marked by a devoted affection that increases the esteem with which she is universally regarded. Owing to the General's ill-health, the usual evening receptions at the White House have been suspended for the present.

The Secretary of State received intelligence on Saturday that Mr. Le Roy, the father of Mrs. Webster, was so ill that a fatal termination was expected. He and his lady set out yesterday morning for New York, but with scarcely a hope of seeing their venerable relative alive. Those who know that Mr. Webster is scarcely less distinguished for sensibility of heart, than for his vast and comprehensive intellect, will readily appreciate the motives that caused him to absent himself from this city at such a time. Mr. Fletcher Webster is, at present, Acting Secretary of State, and discharges the duties in a highly satisfactory manner.

Previous to his departure, Mr. Webster instituted a committee of examination and inquiry for the purpose of obtaining correct information as to the state of progress of the public works in this city, and the degree of skill, fidelity, and economy with which they are carried on; and especially whether the power of dismissing and employing has been exercised with any reference to the political opinions of those who have been employed or dismissed, or for any other political or party object. The Circular addressed by the Secretary to the Commissioners is another proof that the administration intends to adhere to the principles professed by the Whigs when out of place.

The laborers on the public works have made grievous complaints that a tyrannical proscription was extended to them:—and it is notorious that whole bands have been occasionally sent off to Baltimore just on the eve of an election to help the cause of Jackson and Van Buren in the Monumental City. If these Commissioners do their duty, a vast field of abuse and corruption will be exposed.

The Attorney General returned last evening; and appeared, to-day, in the handsome apartments provided for his office in the new Treasury Building. He was immediately besieged by a crowd of visitants curious to know what he thought of the case of McLeod. Mr. Crittenden found his business had greatly multiplied in his absence, and he speedily got rid of his questioners, one after another, with as much courtesy as their importunity would allow. Will people never learn to reflect that a Cabinet Minister must be left with some little time for himself, and for affairs of State, and cease to haunt him, and oppress him with their idle talk?

Mr. Crittenden will make report to the President, probably, to-morrow. He is satisfied that McLeod will be able to prove an alibi.

The work of appointments and removals will be suspended for a while. But there are several which, it is understood, have been determined upon, although they have not yet been announced. Col. Charles S. Todd will be Minister to Austria. Thomas Munroe, Esq., who was removed by Gen. Jackson, during the ruthless proscription of 1829, from the office of Postmaster of this city, will be restored to that post. The Post Office at Baltimore, it is said also, will be filled by Mr. Thomas Finlay of that city.

THE EXTRA SESSION.

WASHINGTON, March 30, 1841.

Speculation is already active and busy, I perceive, as to the measures which are likely to be presented at the Extra Session of Congress; and, you may easily imagine, that they are the objects of anxious inquiries and consideration in the political circles of the Metropolis.

THE "COMMONS" HOLDING THE PURSE-STINGS.

At the first session of a thoroughly Whig Congress, the public may be assured that the great abuse so much in vogue under the two last Administrations of originating financial projects in the Senate will be corrected, and the Constitutional practice restored of introducing all bills of that character in the "Commons"—in the House of Representatives. This will be an important reform, gratifying to all who are anxious to preserve the spirit of our own Constitution, and who acknowledge the wisdom of the old English rule on the subject.

FUNDING OF MR. VAN BUREN'S PUBLIC DEBT.

The House of Representatives, then, will take the lead; and, among the first things done, probably, will be the FUNDING OF THE PUBLIC DEBT bequeathed to the Administration of General Harrison by Mr. Van Buren. There are FIVE MILLIONS of Treasury Notes to be redeemed: then there are various debts and obligations, the payment of which was postponed or evaded in various ways, and on different pretexts, amounting, it is estimated at the Treasury Department, to upwards of five millions or more. Here is a debt of at least TEN MILLIONS OF DOLLARS, incurred under the Administration of President Van Buren, for which he and his cabinet and party are responsible; and which the dignity of the Government, good faith and common honesty, require should be provided for without delay. I say nothing at present of the claims against the Government, public and private, which ought to have been provided for by the last Administration, because they were not incurred under it. I notice only those obligations which were created while Mr. Van Buren was in power.

OPENING OF NEW BOOKS.

The public debt of the late administration being provided for, the administration of General Harrison will open NEW BOOKS. It will be necessary to furnish the Treasury with means to meet its proper liabilities and engagements. The Secretary of the Treasury, it is understood, has arrived at the conclusion that there will not be funds to meet the actual wants of the Government beyond the first of August.

It is calculated that a revenue of from two and a half to three millions of dollars can be raised from the customs by taxing articles which are now duty free, or increasing the rate upon others which bear a very light duty. This would not only not violate the Compromise Act, but would be confirmatory of it—for there is in that enactment an express provision, contemplating the very exigency that now exists, and allowing an increase of taxation in case of a deficiency of revenue to meet the wants of the Government. Mr. Benton himself has concurred in this view of the Compromise Bill, and of the propriety of resorting to the conditional provision I have mentioned, in the present state of the treasury.

To raise revenue from customs, however, is a slow process; and it may be found actually indispensable to supply the immediate wants of the Government, and preserve the national faith, to put the Treasury in possession of additional funds, without the delay incident to a tariff. Should this be the case, a loan will unquestionably be the policy of the Whigs—to borrow the money requisite on United States bonds.

While these supply bills are under consideration in the House, the Senate, it is probable, will be occupied with matters intimately related to their beneficial operation throughout the country. The Sub-Treasury system will be laid low, by the repeal of the Act creating it; and this great incumbrance upon the financial operations of the Government and the country being removed, a bill for the establishment of a National Bank will be speedily introduced.

The Literary World.

ALDA, THE CAPTIVE. By Agnes Strickland, author of "Lives of the Queens of England," &c. Published and for sale by Charles R. Francis, Broadway.

This is a tale illustrative of the benign and saving influences of the Christian religion. Alda, a young maiden of the blood royal of Britain, is carried a captive to Rome, after the last fatal battle of her relative, the warrior-queen Boadicea. Fierce, haughty, and high-spirited herself, Alda becomes the slave of a haughty Roman lady, Lælia, the daughter of her captor. In the service of the same lady there is also a Jewish captive maiden, Susanna, who has embraced the faith of Christ, and who becomes the affectionate friend, and sympathising comforter of the British princess, whom she converts from Druidism to Christianity; though it is long before the proud and revengeful spirit of Alda can be subdued to the meek, forgiving, and loving precepts of the gospel. The tender friendship of the captive maidens, fellow-sufferers, fellow-believers, fellow-worshippers, is terminated by the death of the meek Susanna; after which Alda is no longer able to submit to the tyranny and cruelty of her mistress, and the Roman superior slaves who exercise their malice upon the "Barbarian girl." She flies from Rome, and is protected by a Briton, the leader of a party of banditti, who had been a general under her father. Her lonely life in that mountain-wilderness where the flock of ewes and goats which she tends furnish her subsistence, and her endeavors to win her rude but generous benefactors from their native idolatry to the faith of the Christians, is very sweetly described. Alda, in her solitary wanderings, discovers a Christian colony of new converts driven to seek a refuge in the mountains; but, though enjoying occasional religious communion with them, she refuses to join their community, and is still alone in her solitude when the caprice of Nero and the arts of enemies drive from the capital, to this wilderness, the Roman general who had made her a prisoner, and his haughty daughter, her late mistress and oppressor, fugitives and helpless. Lælia, the Roman lady, believes that now the season for revenge has arrived, and that she and her father will be at once betrayed to their enemies, who set a rich reward upon their heads, by her former ill-treated slave. But Alda is now a Christian, whose duty is forgiveness, and whose law is love. She conceals the Roman general and his daughter from their enemies in her grotto, comforts and cherishes them; and when the father sinks and dies, the slave-girl becomes the sole friend and stay of the noble Roman lady. The latter is slowly won to Christianity by her own afflictions, and by witnessing its blessed fruits in the heart and life of the British princess, her friend and instructress. Together they nobly suffer, willing martyrs for the divine faith, which had changed, purified, and exalted their natures. Alda, in brief, is an exceedingly well written and beautiful story of a pure and ennobling tendency.

LIFE OF JOHN JAY. By Henry B. Rowland.
[Vol. 129 Harper's Family Library.]

There is evidently a growing disposition in the American people to study their past history, and to know more of those illustrious men to whom the country is most largely indebted for its liberties, and the blessings of every kind which it enjoys. We rejoice to see this: it is an indication that we are not ungrateful, and that we are willing to be instructed by the wisdom and experience of our forefathers. Had we been more guided by their counsels than we have been, we should probably have escaped some of the disasters under which we now labor. Of all our celebrated men, there are none, perhaps, whose lives may be studied to greater advantage than those of Jay and Hamilton. We hope that these biographies will be extensively circulated and read. They will do much good, by inculcating sound opinions and right views in regard to many questions of the deepest national interest.

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF SOCIETY IN THE BARBAROUS AND CIVILIZED STATES; an essay toward discovering the origin and course of human improvement, by W. Cooke Taylor, Esq., LL. D. R. A. S. of Trinity College, Dublin.

D. Appleton & Co., 200 Broadway, are publishing such elegant books—so tastefully and correctly printed, on such immaculate paper, and in such neat bindings, that we are almost disposed to withdraw the praise which we have elsewhere awarded, rather exclusively, to the Boston publishers, and make a grand exception in their favor. A few days since we received Schlegel's Philosophy of History—two beautiful volumes—and here we have two others quite as worthy of approbation, both for the style in which they are produced, and for their elevated literary character.

We are rejoiced that so excellent a house has taken in good earnest to this order of publications, and we hope with all our hearts that they may meet with adequate encouragement. If they do not, we may well despair of the taste and judgment of our fellow-citizens.

Of the present work, an adequate idea may be formed by the following sentence from the author's preface: "The design of it is to determine, from an examination of the various forms in which society has been found, what was the origin of civilization; and under what circumstances those attributes of humanity which in our country become the foundation of social happiness, are in another perverted to the production of general misery."

We are glad that Appleton & Co. are so faithful in their republications, and forbear insulting the author and the American public by employing an editor here to botch, and alter, and curtail, and spoil.

ESSAYS BY R. W. EMERSON. Boston—James Munroe & Co. 1 vol. 8vo. pp. 303.

We are indebted for an early copy of this book to Collins, Keese & Co., by whom it is for sale in this city. It is issued in that exquisite style—that richness of paper, printing and binding—which so famously distinguishes the issues of the Boston press above any others in the country.

With the name and fame of Ralph Waldo Emerson, people in the New England states are sufficiently familiar. He is known most favorably by a little work, entitled, "Nature," which abounds in original, striking and lofty thoughts. Latterly, he has distinguished himself in a particular manner by his editorship of the "Dial," and by his occupation of the throne of the Transcendentalists. He is a great admirer of Carlyle; and his exceeding respect of the genius of that wonderful writer has led him, it may be averred with reason, into an almost servile imitation.

Yet object, as every-day persons may, to the peculiar phraseology and curious manner of Mr. Emerson, there must be a universal consent yielded to the assertion, that he is gifted with extraordinary powers—that his mind is full of a strange and beautiful light, which it sheds over every sentence. The book before us will be read and pondered, and deeply enjoyed by some, and cast aside by others into whose hands it may fall. As for ourselves, we must say, that we anticipate a huge delight in reading these essays; and we strenuously urge upon those who love the joy of elevated thoughts, to get the book and try it. If they fail in deriving any true pleasure from it—why, then let them doubt themselves rather than the author. The following are the titles of the Essays. Among them will be found one that is Carlylesque, and very transcendental. I. History. II. Self-Religion. III. Compensation. IV. Spiritual Laws. V. Love. VI. Friendship. VII. Prudence. VIII. Heroism. IX. Over-soul. X. Circles. XI. Intellect. XII. Art.

THE ELECTIONS IN CANADA.—The most serious and in many instances fatal consequences have followed the late elections in Canada. The papers in that province are very fond of trumpeting every petty disturbance that occurs in the United States as an instance of the instability and inefficiency of republican governments. What do they now say of themselves? Read the following leading article from the Kingston Herald of March 23.

We regret to be compelled to state, that the elections in many parts of the province have not been carried on with that degree of peace and moderation which was necessary to ensure a fair expression of public feeling. And we believe, until a different system of voting be established, in some districts it will be impossible to maintain order long enough to get the sentiments of more than half the qualified electors. Several polls should be simultaneously opened in different sections of the counties, thereby enabling back settlers to exercise the franchise with convenience, and would prevent a very great body of persons congregating at one point. This plan has been tried in the county of Leeds with complete success.

It almost universally happens that when the tory candidates have a majority of votes, while the contests are going on, no disturbances take place; but the moment they find themselves losing ground, then a riot commences—and the Reformers, supposing (very rightly) that they would not be encouraged by the Returning officers, and the magistrates who generally make themselves conspicuous in those times, offer no resistance, and are very often severely beaten—sometimes, indeed, life is taken. When that day shall have arrived in which the people of this Province can independently select their law-makers, without jeopardizing their lives, we shall sincerely rejoice. But while the Returning Officers, the Justices, and the Constables, are selected from the ranks of the tories, we shall never look for justice to Canada, or liberty to her people. Look at the first Riding of York: two houses completely torn to pieces by a tory mob, and Mr. Price, the liberal candidate, a lawyer of Toronto, threatened, if caught, to have his liver taken out and roasted before his face. What demons could have thought of anything more atrocious and revolting! One noted bully had a pistol, loaded with ball, taken from him at two different times, and yet he was not arrested by the authorities. This is truly a land of liberty! liberty to break the peace at any rate.

In the city of Toronto, the bludgeon men took possession of the poll and kept it every succeeding day throughout the contest; they likewise smuggled up their friends through a trap door leading into the cellar. The same course was pursued in Lenox and Addington: a back door to the building in which the polling took place, was guarded by Mr. Cartwright's friends, encouraged and supported by many of the magistrates of the District, and when any person wished admittance, "who do you vote for?" was asked in a whisper by the man inside. "Mr. Cartwright." "Then come in." But if one of the opposite party came up, the door was slammed in his face. When this unfairness was pointed out to the Returning Officer, by a very respectable freeholder, (by the person from whom we derive our information, and whose word is as creditable as that of any man in the District,) the former very "high, impartial and uncomprising" gentleman told him very crabbedly that when he wanted any information from him, he would ask him for it, or similar language.

In the county of Rouville, in Lower Canada, three individuals have been sacrificed to the violence of the mob! We are sick of recording such scenes.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE has addressed a letter to M. St. Clair Clarke, William S. Murphy and Hudson M. Garland Esqs., informing them that they were appointed by the President a Committee of examination and inquiry into the public works now in progress in Washington. The committee are instructed to inquire concerning the persons employed, the prices paid, &c. &c. We like the justice and magnanimity exhibited in the following paragraphs:

If you have any reason to suppose that any one has been guilty of misconduct, you will state the charge to him and give him an opportunity to answer it; and will report no evidence of which the party shall not have had notice.

You will inquire into no man's political opinions or preferences; but, if it be alleged that any person, having the power of employing and dismissing laborers, has used that power, either in employing or dismissing, with any reference to the political opinions of those who may have been employed or dismissed, or for any political or party object whatever, or in any other way violated his duty for party or election purposes, you will inquire into the truth of such suggestions; and if you find reason to think it well-founded, in any case, you will state the particular facts and circumstances on which your opinion is formed.

HODGE'S STREAM FIRE ENGINE.—On Saturday last, several experiments were made with this engine in front of the City Hall and in presence of the members of the Common Council; the result of which seems to show that a new era in the extinguishing of fires may commence whenever our corporation see fit to ordain it.

The two principal trials of the engine were as follows: A stream of one inch and a half diameter was thrown at an angle of 45 degrees to a point of 120 feet perpendicular elevation. This stream would have gone far above any elevation where fire is likely to occur, and the body of water thrown was equal to what four of our ordinary engines could discharge: a prodigious result, certainly; and one that bids fair to exclude the present engine from use altogether.

At the second trial a stream of two inches was thrown to a perpendicular height of seventy feet, the engine being at the time worked to only two thirds of its power! Now, as seventy feet is still above the elevation of an ordinary fire, and as the engine to throw the water seventy feet was not taxed to its full force, it may be assumed that the machine is capable of throwing a stream of three or four inches to the height of forty feet; and it is evident that such a stream would reach and almost instantaneously extinguish any fire that could possibly occur in our city.

We do not know the expense of one of these engines, but it is very safe to estimate that the cost of the forty or fifty engines now owned by the Corporation, must be equal to some four or five of the steam machines; and it is equally safe to assert that four or five of the latter would do the work of a hundred of the former, and much more; because the steam engine can do with ease what the common engine cannot do at all—viz. extinguish a fire at an elevation of 80, 100, and even 120 feet from the ground. Besides, when these steam-engines are once constructed, there is little comparative expense in working them; and there would, then, be no necessity for legislative action about the organization and recompense of fire companies.

THE EXILES:
A TALE OF NEW ENGLAND.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

[The incidents upon which the following ballad has its foundation occurred about the year 1600. Thomas Macey was one of the first, if not the first white settler of Nantucket. A quaint description of his singular and perilous voyage, in his own handwriting, is still preserved.]

The Goodman sat beside his door
One sultry afternoon,
With his young wife singing at his side
A quaint and goodly tune.

A glimmer of heat was in the air,—
The dark green woods were still;
And the skirts of a heavy thunder-cloud
Hung over the western hill.

Black, thick, and vast, arose that cloud
Above the wilderness,
As some dark world from upper air
Were stooping over this.

At times, the solemn thunder pealed,
And all was still again,
Save a low murmur in the air
Of coming wind and rain.

Just as the first big rain-drop fell,
A weary stranger came,
And stood before the farmer's door,
With travel soiled and large.

Sad seemed he, yet sustaining hope
Was in his quiet glance,
And peace, like autumn's moonlight, clothed
His quiet countenance.

A look, like that his Master wore
In Pilate's council hall:
It told of wrongs—but of a love
Meekly forgiving all.

"Friend! wilt thou give me shelter here?"
The stranger meekly said;
And, leaning on his oaken staff,
The Goodman's features read.

"My life is hunted—evil men
Are following in my track;
The traces of the torturer's whip
Are on my aged back.

"And much, I fear, 't will peril thee
Within thy doors to take
A hunted seeker of the Truth,
Oppressed for conscience sake."

Oh kindly spoke the Goodman's wife—
"Come in, old man!" quoth she,—
"We will not leave thee to the storm Whoever thou may'st be."

Then came the aged wanderer in,
And silent sat him down;
While all within grew dark as night
Beneath the storm-cloud's frown.

But while the sudden lightning's blaze
Filled every cottage nook,
And with the jarring thunder-roll
The loosened casements shook,

A heavy tramp of horses' feet
Came sounding up the lane,
And half a score of horse, or more,
Came plunging through the rain.

"Now, Goodman Macey, ope thy door—
We would not be house-breakers;
A rueful deed thou 'st done this day,
In harboring banished Quakers."

Out looked the cautious Goodman then,
With much of fear and awe,
For there, with broad wig drenched with rain,
The Parish Priest he saw.

"Open thy door, thou wicked man,
And let thy pastor in,
And give God thanks, if forty stripes
Repay thy deadly sin."

"What seek ye?" quoth the Goodman—
"The stranger is my guest;
He is worn with toil and grievous wrong—
Pray let the old man rest."

"Now, out upon thee, canting knave!"
And strong hands shook the door,
"Believe me, Macey," quoth the Priest,—
"Thou 'lt rue thy conduct sore."

Then kindled Macey's eye of fire:
"No priest who walks the earth,
Shall pluck away the stranger-guest
Made welcome to my hearth."

Down from his cottage wall he caught
The match lock, hotly tried
At Preston-pans and Marston-moor,
By fiery Ireton's side;

Where Paritan, and Cavalier,
With shout and psalm contended;
And Rupert's oath, and Cromwell's prayer,
With battle-thunder blended.

Up rose the ancient stranger then:
"My spirit is not free
To bring the wrath and violence
Of evil men on thee:

"And for thyself, I pray forbear,— Bethink thee of thy Lord,
Who healed again the smitten ear,
And sheathed his follower's sword.

"I go, as to the slaughter led:
Friends of the poor farewell!"
Beneath his hand the oaken door,
Back on its hinges fell.

"Come forth, old gray-beard, yea and nay;"
The reckless scoffers cried,
As to a horseman's saddle-bow
The old man's arms were tied.

And of his bondage hard and long
In Boston's crowded jail,
Where suffering woman's prayer was heard,
With sickening childhood's wail,

It suits not with our tale to tell:
Those scenes have passed away—
Let the dim shadows of the past,
Brood o'er that evil day.

"Ho, Sheriff!" quoth the ardent Priest—
"Take Goodman Macey too;
The sin of this day's heresy,
His back or purse shall rue."

And Priest and Sheriff, both together
Upon his threshold stood,
When Macey, through another door,
Sprang out into the wood.

"Now goodwife, as thou lovest me, haste!"
She caught his manly arm:—
Behind, the parson urged pursuit,
With outcry and alarm.
Ho! speed the Maceys, neck or nought,—
The river course was near:—
The plashing on its pebbled shore
Was music to their ear.

A gray rock, tasseled o'er with birch
Above the waters hung,
And at its base, with every wave,
A small, light wherry swung.

A leap—they gain the boat,—and there
The Goodman wields his oar:
"Ill luck betide them all!"—he cried,—
"The laggards upon shore."

Down through the crashing under-wood,
The burley Sheriff came:—
"Stand, Goodman Macey—yield thyself; Yield in the King's own name."

"Now out upon thy hangman's face!"
Bold Macey answered then,—
"Whip women, on the village green,
But meddle not with men."

The Priest came panting to the shore,—
His grave, cocked hat was gone:
Behind him, like some owl's nest, hung
His wig upon a thorn.

"Come back—come back!" the Parson cried,
"The Church's curse beware."
"Curse an' thou wilt," said Macey, "but Thy blessing prithe spare."

"Vile scoffer!" cried the baffled Priest,—
"Thou 'lt yet the gallows see."
"Who's born to be hanged will not be drowned," Quoth Macey, merrily;

"And so, sir Sheriff and Priest, good bye!"
He bent him to his oar,
And the small boat glided quietly
From the twain upon the shore.

Now in the West, the heavy clouds
Scattered and fell asunder,
While feebler came the rush of rain,
And fainter growled the thunder.

And through the broken clouds, the sun
Looked out serene and warm,
Painting its holy symbol-light
Upon the passing storm.

Oh, beautiful! that rain-bow span
O'er dim Crane-neck was bended:—
One bright foot touched the Eastern hills,
And one with Ocean blended.

By green Pentucket's southern slope
The small boat glided fast,—
The watchers of "the Block-house" saw
The strangers as they passed.

That night a stalwart garrison
Sat shaking in their shoes,
To hear the dip of Indian oars,—
The glide of birch canoes.

They passed the bluffs of Amesbury,
And saw the sunshine glow
Upon the Powwow's winding stream,
And on the hills of Po.

The fisher-wives of Salisbury,
(The men were all away,)
Looked out to see the stranger oar
Upon their waters play.

Deer-Island's rocks and fir-trees threw
Their sunset-shadows o'er them,
And Newbury's spire and weathercock
Peered o'er the pines before them.

Around the Black Rocks on their left,
The marsh lay broad and green;
And on their right, with dwarf shrubs crowned
Plum Island's hills were seen.

With skilful hand and wary eye
The harbor-bar was crossed:—
A plaything of the restless wave,
The boat on ocean tossed.

The glory of the sunset heaven
On land and water lay,—
On the steep hills of Agawam,
On cape, and bluff, and bay.

They passed the gray rocks of Cape Ann,
And Gloucester harbor bar:
The watch-fire of the garrison
Shone like a setting star.

How brightly broke the morning
On Massachusetts' Bay!
Blue wave, and bright green island,
Rejoicing in the day.

On passed the bark in safety
Round isle and headland steep—
No tempest broke above them,
No fog-cloud veiled the deep.

Far round the bleak and stormy Cape
The vent'rous Macey passed,
And on Nantucket's naked isle,
Drew up his boat at last.

And how, in log-built cabin,
They braved the rough sea-weather;
And there, in peace and quietness,
Went down life's vale together;

How others drew around them,
And how their fishing sped,
Until to every wind of heaven
Nantucket's sails were spread;

How pale Want alternated
With Plenty's golden smile;
Behold, is it not written
In the annals of the isle?

And yet that isle remaineth
A refuge of the free,
As when true-hearted Macey
Beheld it from the sea.

Free as the winds that winnow
Her shrubless hills of sand—
Free as the waves that batter
Along her yielding land.

Then hers, at Duty's summons,
No loftier spirit stirs,—
Nor falls o'er human suffering
A readier tear than hers.

God bless the sea-beat island!—
And grant for evermore,
That Charity and Freedom dwell,
As now, upon her shore!

ON HEROES, HERO-WORSHIP, AND THE HEROIC IN HISTORY.

Six Lectures.

BY THOMAS CARLYLE.

LECTURE I.....THE HERO AS DIVINITY.

We have undertaken to discourse here for a little on Great Men, their manner of appearance in our world's business, how they have shaped themselves in the world's history, what ideas men formed of them, what work they did: On Heroes, namely, and on their reception and performance; what I call Hero-worship and the Heroic in human affairs. Too evidently this is a large topic; deserving quite other treatment than we can expect to give it at present. A large topic; indeed, an illimitable one: wide as Universal History itself. For, as I take it, Universal History, the history of what man has accomplished in this world, is at bottom the History of the Great Men who have worked here. They were the leaders of men, these great ones; the modellers, patterns, and in a wide sense creators, of whatsoever the mass of men contrived to do or to attain; all things that we see standing accomplished in the world are properly the outer material result, the practical realisation and embodiment of Thoughts that dwelt in the Great Men sent into the world: the soul of the whole world's history, it may justly be considered, were the history of these. Too clearly it is a topic we shall do no justice to in this place!

One comfort is, that Great Men, taken up in any way, are profitable company. We cannot look, however imperfectly, upon a great man, without gaining something by him. He is the living light-fountain, which it is good and pleasant to be near. The light which enlightens, which has enlightened the darkness of the world: and this not as a kindled lamp only, but rather as a natural luminary shining by the gift of Heaven; a flowing light-fountain, as I say, of native, original insight, of manhood and heroic nobleness; in whose radiance all souls feel that it is well with them. On any terms whatsoever, you will not grudge to wander in such neighborhood for a while. The Six classes of Heroes, chosen out of widely distant countries and epochs, and in mere external figure differing altogether, ought, if we look faithfully at them, to illustrate several things for us. Could we see them well, we should get some glimpses into the very marrow of the world's history. How happy, could I but, in any measure, in such times as these, make manifest to you the meanings of Heroism; the divine relation (for I may well call it such,) which in all times unites a Great Man to other men; and thus, as it were, not to exhaust my subject, but so much as break ground on it! At all events, I must make the attempt.
